THE

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

17. EDWARD V.

[1483] AFTER the death of Edward IV. the prince his eldeſt ſon, between twelve and thirteen years of age, was proclaimed king by the name of Edward V. The reign of this prince was ſhort and unfortunate, if the two months and twelve days that he bore the title of king, and which were wholly ſpent in depriving him of the crown even before he ſolemnly received it, ought not rather to be deemed an inter-regnum. However, as during that ſhort ſpace he was generally acknowledged for ſovereign of England, hiſtorians have made no ſcruple to rank him among the kings. The whole ſubject of this reign conſiſts only of the means uſed by the duke of Gloceſter to diſpoſſeſs the young king his nephew, and place himſelf on the throne. But before I enter upon the relation of theſe deteſtable practices, it will be neceſſary to ſhew the ſtate of the court of England before the death of Edward IV.

Elizabeth Woodville, who from a ſubject was become queen by her marriage with Edward, held the firſt rank at court, as well by the privileges common to all queens, as by her great credit. From the time of her marriage, ſhe had acquired an influence over the king, which ſhe preſerved to the day of his death. Her birth, by her father's ſide, was not very conſiderable[a]: but her mother, who had been wife of the famous duke of Bedford, was of the houſe of Luxemburgh, illuſtrious for the princes, kings, and emperors it had given to Europe. So, conſidering Elizabeth as derived from thence, it is not at all ſtrange ſhe ſhould have a great ſoul, and think herſelf as worthy to command as the nobleſt lords of England. However, as being queen gave her no right to interpoſe in the public affairs, ſhe artfully aſſumed it by her aſcendancy over the king. Though Edward often proved falſe to her, ſhe bore it with patience, and without any ſigns of uneaſineſs. Edward, charmed to find himſelf at liberty to purſue his inclinations without danger of continual reproaches, repaid this moderation with all ſorts of condeſcenſions, which the queen knew how to improve. The advancement of ſir Richard Woodville, her father, to the honour of Earl Rivers[b], and the marriage of her brother with the richeſt heireſs of the kingdom, were the firſt proofs ſhe gave of her power. After that, Edward heaped honours and riches upon the family, even to the deſiring to marry his brother-in-law Anthony to the king of Scotland's ſiſter[c], as appears in the Collection of the Public Acts. When the prince of Wales was of age to have a governor, that lord, become earl Rivers, was intruſted with that high office. The queen forgot not her own children by her former huſband ſir John Grey of Groby: Thomas Grey, her eldeſt ſon, was made marquis of Dorſet, governor of the Tower, and keeper of the king's treaſures; Richard Grey, his brother, was created a baron, and had a conſiderable poſt about the prince of Wales.

If the queen had confined her favours to her ſons, her father, and her brother, there would have been no reaſon to think it very ſtrange; but it cannot be denied that ſhe made an ill uſe of her power by cauſing to be created peers many perſons who would have had no pretenſion to that honour, if they had not been protected by her favour. This gave occaſion to the diſtinction in thoſe days between the Ancient and the New nobility. But if this diſtinction redounded not to the honour of the laſt, that diſadvantage was amply repaired by the places of honour and profit procured them by the queen. By degrees, ſhe had, as it were, baniſhed the ancient nobility from the court, where appeared ſcarce any but lords of the new creation, all attached to the queen. It was much the ſame in all the reſt of the kingdom, where the moſt conſiderable poſts were filled by ſuch as the queen knew to be her creatures. Her aim was to preſerve her power during the king's life, and in caſe ſhe ſurvived him, to ſecure the government of the kingdom in her ſon's name, when he ſhould be on the throne. But, by a fatality very common to the beſt contrived projects, this very thing proved the occaſion of her own and her family's ruin.

The queen having thus openly declared againſt the ancient families, it is eaſy to conceive ſhe was not beloved. Accordingly, ſhe took all poſſible care to hinder the lords, whom ſhe did not like, from having the king's ear. Mean-while, it was not in her power to expel the court three lords of the ancient nobility, whom the king loved becauſe they had done him ſignal ſervices: theſe were Henry Stafford, duke of Buckingham, William Haſtings, and Thomas Stanley.

The firſt, who was of a very ancient family[d], had, moreover, the advantage of being deſcended from a daughter of Thomas of Woodſtock, duke of Gloceſter, ſeventh ſon of Edward III. and enjoyed the office of high-conſtable.

The lord Haſtings[e] was high-chamberlain. The king had a ſingular affection for him, becauſe of his conſtant loyalty, of which he had given proofs in the time of his adverſity, particularly when he was forced to fly into Holland. This lord was extremely attached to the king's perſon, but loved not the queen; if he paid her any reſpect, it was with reluctance, and ſolely out of complaiſance to the king his maſter.

The lord Stanley[f], of an ancient family, was in the ſame diſpoſitions: he was devoted to the king, without making much court to the queen.

The king's concubines held likewiſe a conſiderable rank at court, by reaſon of their influence over him. There were three eſpecially, of whom Jane Shore alone was concerned in the events of this new reign: ſhe was wife to a citizen of London, whom Edward had debauched and taken from her huſband. She was ſurprizingly beautiful, and withal of a generoſity very uncommon in perſons of her character. The king was as much in love with her temper as her beauty. He never heard her ſpeak ill of any perſon, nor ever perceived her to try to prejudice him againſt any man whatever. If ſhe importuned him ſometimes, it was in behalf of the unfortunate. When ſhe had done a good office, ſhe ſcorned to take a reward, being unwilling to give occaſion to think ſhe acted from a motive of intereſt. And, therefore, ſhe had amaſſed but few riches, in compariſon of other concubines, whoſe greedineſs can never be ſatisfied.

The duke of Gloceſter, the king's brother, was embarraſſed between the two parties formed at court and in the kingdom. The only way to pleaſe the king, was to make court to the queen. But on the other hand, the duke perceiving the queen's aim was to ingroſs the government in caſe the king happened to die, could not be attached to her, without forfeiting the attention of the ancient nobility, of which he might one day ſtand in need. As he was naturally a great diſſembler, he reſolved to make his court quickly to the queen, but in private he joined with the duke of Buckingham, the lord Haſtings, and the lord Stanley.

It is needleſs to ſay much of the two young princes the king's ſons, the eldeſt of whom was but twelve, and the duke of York, his brother, but nine years old when their father died. It will ſuffice to ſay, that before Edward IV. was ſeized with the diſtemper that laid him in his grave, he had ſent the prince his eldeſt ſon, with the earl Rivers his governor, into Wales to appeaſe ſome commotions [g]. The young duke of York remained at court with the queen his mother.

Edward ſaw with ſome concern the two parties that were formed in his court: but his affection for the queen not ſuffering him to hold the balance even, he took no care to prevent the conſequences. So long as he enjoyed his health, he imagined that during his life he ſhould be always maſter of both, and by ſtrengthening the nobility, hinder the old from being able to prejudice the queen and her children after his death. But when he came to die, he beheld this diviſion in another light: he conſidered that he left for ſupport to his houſe only new families, which had not had time to eſtabliſh themſelves, and owed all their authority and credit entirely to his favour, of which they were going to be deprived. This thought affecting him greatly, he conſidered how to repair his error, and in his preſent condition found no better way than to perſuade the two parties to be reconciled for his ſake. Weak expedient! which could hardly produce the deſired effect. The regard for a dying king, never beloved by the ancient nobility, was little capable of extinguiſhing their hatred and envy of the queen's relations, which unhappily had been ſo much fomented. However, before he expired, Edward had at leaſt the ſatisfaction to ſee this reconciliation, which he thought ſincere, becauſe of the ſeeming readineſs and chearfulneſs wherewith both parties conſented to his requeſt. The lord Rivers being abſent, the queen his ſiſter paſſed her word for him; and the marquis of Dorſet, her eldeſt ſon, as repreſenting the family of Grey, embraced the duke of Buckingham and the lord Haſtings, who were the heads of the oppoſite party. The duke of Gloceſter being then at York upon the king's affairs, had it not in his power to obſtruct the reconciliation, which indeed would have been very much to his prejudice had it been ſincere.

As ſoon as Edward's eyes were cloſed, the two parties, forgetting their mutual proteſtations of friendſhip, thought only of gaining the advantage one of another. Mean-while, they unanimouſly agreed to proclaim the deceaſed king's eldeſt ſon by the name of Edward V. That done, each took ſuch meaſures as were thought moſt proper to attain his ends. The chief point was to become maſter of the king's perſon, in order to govern in his name. The queen hoped to maintain and even to increaſe her authority, during the king her ſon's minority; and the other party ſaw themſelves irrecoverably loſt, if the young prince was once in the hands of his mother. However, thus far the advantage was entirely on the queen's ſide. Immediately after the death of the king her huſband, ſhe had diſpatched a courier to the lords Rivers her brothers with the news: ſhe told him withal in the letter, that ſhe believed it abſolutely neceſſary for him to raiſe forces in Wales and the adjoining counties, to enable him to conduct the new king ſafely to London, in order to his coronation.

On the other ſide, the duke of Buckingham and the lord Haſtings ſent an expreſs to the duke of Gloceſter [h], acquainting him with the king's death and the queen's meaſures: and withal repreſenting to him, that being the king's uncle by the father's ſide, the government of the realm belonged to him during the minority; but if he did not prevent the queen it would be in vain to expect afterwards to obtain his due right: in fine, that at all adventures they offered him a thouſand men well armed, and ready to march at the word of command.

It is very difficult to judge, whether before the death of Edward IV. the duke of Gloceſter had thoughts of mounting the throne to the prejudice of his nephews: but it is ſcarce to be doubted that he formed his deſign the moment he heard of his brother's deceaſe. All his after proceedings too plainly appear to be conſequences of a ſcheme laid to compaſs that end. As for the lord Haſtings, his ſole intention was certainly to take the government out of the hands of the queen and her relations. His conſtant attachment to Edward IV. would never have ſuffered him to be concerned in a plot to dethrone his ſon. As for the duke of Buckingham, his conduct is more ambiguous: beſides his hatred to the queen and her family, he had always preſerved a particular regard for the duke of Gloceſter, which gives occaſion to ſuſpect he had joined with him at firſt in the deſign to place him on the throne. However, the hiſtorians aſcribe to him (at leaſt in the beginning of this reign) the ſame intention only with the lord Haſtings, namely, to remove the queen from the government of the king's perſon and of the realm. Be this as it will, the duke of Gloceſter, upon news of the king's death, ſent back the expreſs with orders to deſire the duke of Buckingham and the lord Haſtings to come and confer with him at Northampton.

Theſe two lords, with ſome others of their party repairing to the place appointed, the duke of Gloceſter in a long ſpeech, demonſtrated to them the great and impending danger, if the queen was poſſeſſed of the government. He told them, "They would be expoſed to the mercy of an imperious woman, and of the two families of Rivers and Grey, newly raiſed by the king his brother, who would never think themſelves perfectly ſafe, till thoſe whom they conſidered as their rivals and enemies were deſtroyed. That the late king had kept them by his authority within ſome bounds, but when they ſhould be poſſeſſed of the ſupreme power in the name of the young king, nothing would be capable of curbing their inſolence. He added, that no perſon had more right, or was more concerned than himſelf to take care of the affairs of the kingdom, during the minority of the king his nephew. That every one knew his conſtant attachment to the king his brother, and therefore his tender affection for his children ſuffered him not to leave them to the mercy of thoſe who had never appeared to have any other view than their own advancement. That for theſe reaſons he was reſolved zealouſly to apply himſelf to promote to the utmoſt of his power the good of the nation and the honour of his nephew, principally by giving him an education that ſhould render him capable of treading in the ſteps of his illuſtrious anceſtors. But that he could not hope to execute ſuch a project without the aſſiſtance of all honeſt men, and particularly of thoſe to whom he was ſpeaking, who, without doubt, had like him no other view than the nation's welfare and glory. That he had aſſembled them to conſult upon what was to be done in the preſent emergency, being reſolved not to proceed without their advice."

This ſpeech meeting with applauſe, all the lords entered into a ſerious debate concerning the means to become maſter of the king's perſon. To ſucceed by force was extremely difficult: the lord Rivers had not only aſſembled a good number of troops, but it would have been alſo very eaſy for him to conduct the king to London before they were in condition to prevent it: beſides they would have given him too great an advantage, if without any apparent neceſſity they had begun ſo ſoon to take up arms. Such a ſtep would have infallibly cauſed the people to ſide with their enemies, and been looked upon as tending to obſtruct the king's coronation. Theſe conſiderations made the lords reſolve to uſe policy. To that end they agreed, that they ſhould continue to ſhew a great zeal for the king, in order to deprive the queen of all pretence to raiſe forces, or keep thoſe on foot that were aſſembled by the lord Rivers. That the duke of Gloceſter ſhould try to perſuade her to diſmiſs theſe troops as uſeleſs. That in caſe he ſucceeded, it ſhould be endeavoured to become maſter of the king before his arrival at London; but if on the contrary the queen was bent to keep thoſe forces, ſhe was to be amuſed with negotiations till her deſigns could be openly oppoſed.

The conference being ended, the lord Haſtings poſted to London, where his preſence was neceſſary, by reaſon of his great intereſt in the city. Preſently after, the duke of Gloceſter ſent the queen a lettter [i] of condolance upon the king's death, expreſſing an extreme affection for the young prince his ſucceſſor, and an extraordinary reſpect for her. After this beginning, he told her, "He beheld with great joy, all hearts united in the ſame ſentiments, which made him hope that the king his nephew would paſs his minority in a perfect tranquillity. That for his part he would do all that lay in his power to keep the people in the obedience due to their ſovereign, by giving them himſelf an example of unlimited ſubmiſſion. That he did not queſtion ſhe would likewiſe contribute to cauſe all the king's ſubjects to enjoy the peace and quiet they had reaſon to expect. That therefore he took the freedom to adviſe her to uſe her endeavours to diſpel the old jealouſies among the great men, and confirm by her prudence the reconciliation lately made before the king her huſband's death. That his advice was, that without affection or prejudice, care ſhould be taken to reward

[g] The prince was then at Ludlow in Shropſhire, that by his preſence he might compoſe the diſorders of the Welſh; who, though not in actual rebellion, yet were grown ſo unruly and diſobedient to their governors and ſuperiors, that the magiſtrates, with all their power, were not able to ſuppreſs the diſſenſions and diſorders, robberies and wrongs committed by them. Moor, p. 481.

[h] He was then at York, to keep all things quiet in thoſe parts. Compl. Hiſt. Moor, p. 482.

[i] Sir Thomas Moor does not ſay, that he ſent the queen ſuch a letter, but only that he ſecretly and by divers means cauſed the queen to be perſuaded, that it was unneceſſary and would be dangerous for the king to come to London with an army of attendants. See in Hall, fol. 5. He and his aſſociates ſent letters; but it was to the lord Rivers, and others of the queen's friends that were about the king's perſon. Idem. fol. 6.

And

merit wherever it was found, that no man might juſtly complain of being neglected for mere party-concerns. That this was chiefly to be endeavoured, leſt by acting otherwiſe, diviſions, which ought to be buried in eternal oblivion, ſhould be renewed. That therefore he could not forbear telling her, he was ſurprized to hear that lord Rivers was gathering forces to conduct the king to London, ſince they ſeemed to be entirely needleſs. That he was really convinced of the goodneſs of her intention, but it was to be feared, this proceeding would be ill-conſtrued. That troops, raiſed upon the frivolous pretence of providing for the king's ſafety, when none appeared to give him any diſturbance, could not but breed ſuſpicions in the oppoſite party lately reconciled. That the precautions ſeveral lords would undoubtedly take, to ſcreen themſelves from the miſchiefs they would have reaſon to dread, were the natural and conſequent fruits of theſe ſuſpicions. That therefore to avoid a groundleſs peril, and by a needleſs precaution the peace of the whole kingdom was endangered. That when once theſe ſuſpicions ſhould take root, and two armies be on foot in the kingdom, God alone knew what might be the event. That for theſe reaſons, of which doubtleſs ſhe perceived the ſtrength, he adviſed her to diſmiſs her troops, that all the nobles of the realm might come without fear and ſuſpicion, to pay their reſpects to their young ſovereign, and contribute, each according to his power, to the preſervation of peace and union in the ſtate."

The queen very imprudently followed the advice of which ſhe perceived not the venom. She thought it was the ſooner to be complied with, as it came from a brother-in-law, who had always been firm to the intereſts of the late king, and ſtill ſhewed himſelf very zealous for her and her children. During Edward IVth's life, the duke of Gloceſter had been very reſpectful to the queen, ſo that ſhe had no reaſon to ſuſpect him. Beſides, there was not in his letter a ſingle word to induce her to think he intended to diſpute the government with her. In fine, ſhe conſidered, the duke could not aſpire to the crown, without ſupplanting two nephews, and five nieces, who were not in his power. This alone would have been capable to remove her ſuſpicions, ſuppoſing ſhe could have entertained any. So, believing herſelf ſufficiently ſupported, ſince the duke of Gloceſter expreſſed ſo great an attachment to her intereſts, ſhe wrote to the lord Rivers her brother, that ſhe thought it proper, he ſhould diſmiſs his troops, for fear of raiſing jealouſies without occaſion. The earl immediately obeyed her orders, and keeping only the king's domeſtics, began his journey to conduct him to London.

The young king approaching Northampton, the dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham, who had brought into the town nine hundred armed men [k], went to meet him and ſaluted him very reſpectfully. In diſcourſing with the lord Rivers, they told him, the town of Northampton was ſo full of ſtrangers, and ill provided with proviſions and other conveniences, that it would be very incommodious for theirs, and the king's retinue to lodge in that place. Then they adviſed him to carry the king to Stoney Stratford which is but twelve miles further in the road to London. They added, for their part, they would return to Northampton, and wait upon the king in the morning, before he ſat out. Upon parting, one of them propoſed to the earl, in a free and eaſy manner, as if it had been a ſudden thought, to go and paſs the night with them at Northampton, whilſt the king reſted at Stoney Stratford. The earl not ſuſpecting their deſign, complied with the kind invitation. He was even glad of an occaſion to cement their mutual reconciliation, by this mark of confidence.

The three lords being come to Northampton, ſpent the evening together in perfect harmony, with mutual proteſtations of friendſhip and offers of ſervice. Bed-time being come, the earl Rivers withdrew to his lodgings. But the other two paſſed the reſt of the night in conſulting what was to be done, ſince the earl had indiſcreetly put himſelf into their hands. Their conſultation being ended, they ſecured the keys of the inn where they lodged, under colour that they would be the firſt that ſhould attend the king in the morning. For the greater precaution, they ſent a good number of men to line the way, and ſuffer no perſon whatever to enter Stony Stratford. At break of day they were ready to mount, whilſt the lord Rivers was ſtill in bed. Mean-time, one of his people waking him, and telling him, the dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham were ready to depart, and that no body was ſuffered to go out of the inn, he immediately put on his cloaths, to know the reaſon of that proceeding. But he found them in a very different diſpoſition from that wherein he had left them ſome hours before. Upon his approach they began to quarrel with him [l], taxing him with alienating the king's affection from his moſt faithful ſubjects, adding, they ſhould take care to prevent the like practices for the future. The earl began to return a calm anſwer to this accuſation, but refuſing to hear him, they committed him to the cuſtody of ſome of their ſervants, and mounting their horſes rode away to the king.

They found the young prince ready to depart, and paying him their reſpects re-mounted in order to attend him. Before they were out of the town, they quarrelled with the lord Richard Grey, the king's half-brother, and charged him that jointly with the marquis of Dorſet his brother, and the lord Rivers his uncle, he had conſpired to become maſter of the king's perſon: and that the marquis of Dorſet had moreover taken out of the Tower the treaſure committed to his cuſtody by the late king. Whereupon the king ſaid, that for what concerned the marquis of Dorſet he could ſay nothing, but would anſwer for the conduct of the lord Rivers and the lord Grey, ſince they had been continually with him. To this the duke of Buckingham replied, they had taken care to conceal their plots from his highneſs, which however were not the leſs certain. At the ſame time, he ordered his people to arreſt the lord Grey, with ſir Thomas Vaughan and ſir Richard Hawſe, and inſtead of proceeding to London, carried the king back to Northampton [m]. The ſame or next day the priſoners were conducted to Pomfret caſtle [n], the governor whereof was the duke of Gloceſter's creature. The king appeared extremely concerned for the diſgrace of his brother and uncle, as well as for the violence to his own perſon. But he had no way to free himſelf from his new governors, but his tears, which were little regarded. Meanwhile they paid him outwardly all the reverence uſually paid to a ſovereign, in order to blind the eyes of the people by theſe marks of reſpect and ſubmiſſion.

The news being brought to the queen, ſhe perceived her error in relying on the duke of Gloceſter, and ſuſpected immediately that he would not ſtop there, and that he had formed deſigns ſtill more deſtructive to the royal family. So, finding herſelf deprived of the aſſiſtance of her brother and ſons, as well as of their counſels, ſhe ſaw no other refuge, than with the duke of York her ſon and the reſt of her family to take ſanctuary in Weſtminſter-Abbey [o].

The lord Haſtings, then at London, hated the queen, as I obſerved, but loved the king and all Edward IVth's family. It is true, he was engaged in Gloceſter's and Buckingham's plot, but it was with a belief that it tended only to hinder the queen from aſſuming the government, which he thought juſt and reaſonable. He had intelligence in the night of what had paſſed at Northampton, and inſtantly ſent the news to Dr. Rotherham the archbiſhop of York and lord chancellor, aſſuring him withal, he had no reaſon to be alarmed: that the king's perſon was in no danger, and very ſhortly what had happened would turn to the welfare of the kingdom. The archbiſhop riſing that moment went to the queen, and carried the great ſeal along with him. He found her in a diſconſolate condition, ſitting upon the ground, lamenting her own and her children's fate, whilſt her domeſtics were buſy in carrying ſuch goods as were neceſſary into the ſanctuary. He endeavoured to comfort her, telling her what the lord Haſtings had declared to him. But he found her very backward to believe, that any good could come from ſuch an enemy. Then the prelate to give her hope, told her, the king's perſon was ſafe, ſince the duke of York his brother was not in the power of thoſe whom ſhe conſidered as her enemies. He added, if they ſhould be ſo audacious as to put the king to death, or give the crown to another, he aſſured her he would immediately crown the duke of York. In fine to give her all poſſible aſſurance of his fidelity, he left the great ſeal with her. But reflecting afterwards upon his error, in reſigning ſo precious a pledge committed to him by the late king, he ſent for it again as ſoon as he came home.

Mean-while, the whole city of London was in commotion. Several citizens had even taken up arms, not knowing what might be the event of the news they had juſt received, which probably was very much aggravated. The lord Haſtings being ſenſible, that an inſurrection at London might break the meaſures of his friends at Northampton, inſtantly came into the city, and as his credit was great among the citizens, he aſſured them that the king was in no danger: that indeed the earl Rivers, the lord Grey, and ſome others were arreſted for conſpiring againſt the dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham, but would be brought to a legal trial: that however, it was no juſt reaſon for them to take up arms, and it was to be feared they would be called to an account for the tumult, if they did not lay down as readily as they had taken them up. The citizens ſuppoſing the lord Haſtings to be perfectly informed, by reaſon he was of the duke of Buckingham's party, retired to their houſes, being unwilling to concern themſelves with the quarrels of the great men.

Shortly after, the dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham conducted the king to London, paying him all the reſpect due to his dignity. As they travelled along, they cauſed a report to be ſpread, that the lord Rivers and the reſt of the priſoners at Pomfret had intended to kill them; and their ſervants ſhewed the people barrels of arms, which were ſaid to be found among the baggage of the conſpirators. The news of the extraordinary reſpect paid the king, flying to London before his arrival, the city grew more quiet, becauſe there was reaſon to believe, there had been no attempt upon the king's perſon or dignity. At his approach, the people went out in crowds to receive him, and the young king entered the city[p], attended by a great number of lords, and particularly by the duke of Gloceſter, who followed him bare-headed[q]. He was lodged in the biſhop's palace, to ſhew the citezens the great confidence placed in them, and that his ſafety only was conſulted[r]. This management entirely removed the ſuſpicions againſt the duke of Gloceſter, raiſed by the Northampton affair.

The rejoicings for the king's ſafe arrival being ended, it was neceſſary to think of ſettling the government during his minority, which was to laſt ſeven years. The moſt natural way would have been to call a parliament, as was practiſed after the death of Henry V. But as, during a parliament, all other authority would have ceaſed, till the government was regulated, the duke of Gloceſter did not think fit to part with the power he had acquired by ſeizing the king's perſon. Indeed he might have expected, that the parliament would confer on him the dignity of protector of the realm, ſince he was the only prince of the blood capable of holding the reins of the government. But at the ſame time the care of the young king's perſon and education would have been certainly committed to others. It is a conſtant and very juſt rule not to truſt a minor king to thoſe that may be gainers by his ruin. But this was what the duke of Gloceſter feared above all things. He reſolved to continue maſter of the king's perſon, otherwiſe it would have been very difficult to accompliſh his deſigns. Theſe conſiderations made him think it more agreeable to his intereſts to call a great council, and not ſummon a parliament till he had ſecured the crown. This council, conſiſting chiefly of the ancient nobility and the duke of Gloceſter's friends, declared him protector of the king and kingdom, uſurping a privilege belonging only to the parliament. But as I have often obſerved, it is eaſier to cauſe the parliament to confirm what is done, than induce it to do what is deſired.

The ſeizing of the king's perſon, and the getting himſelf declared protector, were the two firſt ſteps by which the duke of Gloceſter intended to mount the throne. Each had its fair and foul ſide. In the firſt place, after the death of Edward IV. the queen and her relations having no right to ſeize the government of the realm, it could not be thought ſtrange that the duke of Gloceſter ſhould aſſume near the king the rank to which he was intitled by his birth. But his fraud and violence to the queen's relations gave occaſion to ſuſpect he had formed deeper deſigns. In the next place, nothing was more natural than to ſee the king's uncle protector of the realm. But at the ſame time, his affecting to obtain that dignity, without vouchſafing to call a parliament, and his chuſing to be annexed to the office of protector of the realm, that of protector of the king, which ſhould have been ſeparated from it, was an extraordinary proceeding, which might have raiſed juſt ſuſpicions. And yet the conſequence was not perceived till it was too late to prevent it. But for fear theſe irregularities might open people's eyes, the duke took care to conceal himſelf under the vail of an extraordinary zeal for the king his nephew's intereſts, and a great reſpect for his perſon.

As ſoon as the duke was declared protector, he took the great ſeal from archbiſhop Rotheram, who had given him a very plauſible pretence, and delivered it to the biſhop of Lincoln[s]. The duke of Buckingham and the lord Haſtings were confirmed in their places; but there were great alterations made in all the reſt of the poſts, the new protector putting in his own creatures in the room of the queen's, who filled them before. Though the lord Haſtings was not truſted with his principal deſign, he did not deſpair of gaining him, when his affairs ſhould be more advanced. Beſides, Haſtings was a mortal enemy to the queen and her family, and had a great intereſt in London. This was ſufficient then, for without knowing it, he could be ſervicable to the protector in executing his projects, which it was not yet proper to diſcover.

To proceed with any appearance of ſucceſs in his deſign, it was neceſſary for the duke of Gloceſter to have the young duke of York in his power as well as the king his brother. To dethrone or murder the king would have been to no purpoſe, ſo long as the duke of York was out of reach. For he would ſtill have had the ſame thing to act over again. In order to accompliſh that deſign, he moved in the council, whether it would not be requiſite to get the duke of York out of the queen's hands, and place him with the king his brother. He made upon this occaſion a very long ſpeech, wherein, after teſtifying an extraordinary zeal for the royal family, and confirming what he ſaid with a great oath, he diſplayed the reaſons which required the young prince's removal from the queen. The firſt was, "That the queen's flying to ſanctuary without any apparent danger to herſelf or family, could not but be conſtrued as an affront to the government. In the ſecond place, her ſole aim muſt have been to raiſe diſturbances by making the people believe the king was in danger, ſince no other conſequence could be inferred from her conduct. That therefore it was neceſſary to undeceive the people, by procuring the duke of York, and cauſing him to be educated according to his quality. That the more viſible the queen's malice was, the more it ſhould be endeavoured to prevent its effects. That it was manifeſt, ſhe was ſtriving to form in the kingdom a party capable of ſetting her at the head of affairs, as ſhe was in the late reign. That it was with difficulty and great chance, that they were freed from the imperious rule of that princeſs and her family; but if the king ſhould happen to die, the realm would be again plunged into the ſame calamities, ſince ſhe had the lawful heir in her power. On the other hand, it was neceſſary to conſider what foreigners would ſay when they heard, that whilſt one of Edward IV's ſons was crowned, the other was forced to keep in ſanctuary. That it would be diſhonorable to the government to ſuffer themſelves to be thus braved by a woman, who had attempted to cauſe the king's council to be conſidered as enemies of the royal family. That beſides, the king being young and wanting ſome diverſion, he could not have a more agreeable companion than his own brother, and there was no reaſon to keep them aſunder. In fine, it would be indecent to proceed to the coronation in the abſence of the duke of York the ſecond perſon in the ſtate, who, having an evident right to be preſent, could not be debarred of it without injuſtice. Upon all theſe accounts, he concluded that a truſty perſon ſhould be ſent to the queen, to deſire her to deliver the duke of York to the king his brother. He added, that, in his opinion, the cardinal biſhop of Canterbury[t], was the propereſt perſon for that office. That if, notwithſtanding all the archbiſhop's arguments, ſhe ſhould obſtinately keep the young prince with her, and perſiſt in her groundleſs ſuſpicions, he ſaw no reaſon why the council ſhould not take him away by force. This was his opinion, and he deſired every member of the council to ſpeak his own with freedom."

The cardinal readily took upon him to acquaint the queen with the council's pleaſure, but by no means approved the motion of violating the privilege of ſanctuary. He ſaid, the church of Weſtminſter was conſecrated five hundred years ago, by St. Peter himſelf, who deſcended from heaven[u], attended by multitudes of angels. That no king of England had ever dared to violate that ſanctuary, and that ſuch an attempt would certainly draw down the juſt vengeance of God upon the whole kingdom.

The duke of Buckingham replied with great warmth to part of the cardinal's ſpeech. He ſhewed that ſanctuaries were intended only to protect ſuch as had reaſon to fear oppreſſion and violence, and not to countenance frivolous and malicious ſuſpicions, detrimential to the king and kingdom. After many ſharp reflections againſt the queen, he enlarged upon the abuſes of ſanctuaries, particularly as they afforded thoſe who fled thither means to eſcape. He added, though the duke of York was neither guilty nor oppreſſed, there was room to fear the queen his mother would carry him out of the kingdom, which might one day give the queen opportunity to invade England, by the help of ſome foreign prince, upon frivolous pretences, which would never be wanting. In fine, after alledging ſeveral other reaſons, he agreed with the protector to take the duke of York by force out of the ſanctuary, if the queen refuſed to deliver him freely. This matter being taken into conſideration, the opinion of the protector and the duke of Buckingham prevailed, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of moſt of the eccleſiaſtics there preſent.

The cardinal being come to the queen[v], uſed all poſſible arguments to induce her to comply, and to perſuade her that neither the king, not herſelf, nor the duke of York, were in danger. He ſpoke with the greateſt aſſurance, as he was ſatisfied of the truth of what he ſaid, never ſuſpecting the duke of Gloceſter of having ill deſigns. For, as to the violence uſed to the queen's relations, he conſidered it as no great hurt. Beſides, as he was ignorant whether they were innocent, he did not think it any great injuſtice to detain them ſome time in priſon, in order to prevent their diſturbing the kingdom by their immoderate ambition. But all his eloquence was not capable to perſuade the queen, who plainly ſaw in the duke of Gloceſter's conduct too much reaſon to ſtrengthen her fears. At laſt, the cardinal perceiving his arguments were fruitleſs, told her, that the council, apprehenſive of her carrying the prince her ſon out of the kingdom, had reſolved to take him by force out of his ſanctuary, if ſhe obſtinately inſiſted upon keeping him there. The queen hearing theſe menaces, dwelt upon the privileges of ſanctuaries, which was entirely needleſs, ſince ſhe ſpoke to a prelate who was thoroughly convinced of the ſame. At length, ſeeing herſelf preſſed to obey the council's order, ſhe freely declared to the cardinal the real cauſe of her fears. She told him, ſhe could not help ſuſpecting the duke of Gloceſter of having deſigns deſtructive to the royal family, which he could not accompliſh without having both the brothers in his power; and that the only means to preſerve the king, was to keep the duke of York out of their uncle's reach. The cardinal growing warm at this diſcourſe, replied, ſince ſhe obſtinately terrified herſelf with vain and groundleſs ſuſpicions, he would ſay no more upon that head. That being only ſent by the council, and the buſineſs not concerning him in particular, he would preſs her no farther, leſt he ſhould give her occaſion to think him in the plot ſhe apprehended. That however, he ſaw with grief her ill opinion of the members of the council: that ſhe muſt believe them to be either void of underſtanding, not to perceive what ſhe fancied ſhe ſaw ſo plainly, or elſe ſo wicked as to lend their aſſiſtance to the duke of Gloceſter. That for his part, he believed he might confidently affirm, the duke had never entertained ſuch a thought; and that the council would be very ſorry to ſee themſelves taxed with treachery or extreme imprudence. The good cardinal, to remove the queen's fears, ſaid nothing but what he really thought, becauſe he was not in the protector's confidence. Accordingly the queen felt herſelf very much ſhaken by the aſſurances of a perſon of his character. It was apparent, that if the council intended to deceive her, they would not have made him their inſtrument; and yet ſhe could not lay aſide her fears. Mean while, ſhe ſaw the cardinal ready to return, and herſelf going to be expoſed to the violence of her enemies, and obliged to do by force what was civilly deſired. So, ſuddenly reſolving to give up the young prince, ſhe caught him in her arms, tenderly took her leave of him, and with a ſhower of tears delivered him to the cardinal, who brought him to the protector. As ſoon as he ſaw his young nephew, he ran to him with open arms[w], to embrace him, and give him marks of a feigned affection, telling him, he would always be to him inſtead of a father. Then he carried him to the king, who, without knowing how he came there, was overjoyed at his company. A few days after, the protector found ſome excuſe to convey them both to the Tower[x], whereas before they lodged in the heart of the city at the biſhop's palace[y].

It is generally believed, that hitherto the duke of Glouceſter had not communicated his moſt ſecret thoughts to the duke of Buckingham, nor truſted him with them till after he had the two princes in his power. Buckingham mortally hated the queen and her family, becauſe it was through their means that the late king refuſed to give him poſſeſſion of certain lands in Herefordſhire, to which he laid claim[z]. His hatred had even paſſed to the king's perſon, though he had not dared to ſhew it. He had joined with the duke of Glouceſter, to deprive the queen and her relations of the government of the realm, during the king's minority; but it is not believed, his thoughts had gone any farther. For as he wanted only to preſerve or increaſe his credit, a minority ſeems to have been more for his purpoſe than the government of a grown king, ſuch as the duke of Gloceſter. However, as he was a man of ill principles, it was not difficult for the protector to engage him in his plot, by the hopes of a reward. It is ſaid, he promiſed not only to procure him the lands he deſired, but alſo to give him part of the late king's wardrobe, to furniſh his houſe in a ſtately manner, and ſecure to his heirs the office of high conſtable, of which he was in poſſeſſion[a]. Be this as it will, the duke of Buckingham ſo engaged in the project to ſet the protector on the throne, that from thenceforward he appeared no leſs eager than the protector himſelf to accompliſh it. The thing being reſolved, the queſtion was only how to put it into execution.

From that time the conferences between the duke of Gloceſter and his truſty friends became more frequent than before. They debated the principal difficulties that might occur in the execution of the deſign, and the means to ſurmount or prevent them. In ſhort, they came to the following reſolutions, which were conſidered as the plan whereon they were gradually to proceed. 1. As the ſtrongeſt oppoſition was probably to be expected from the queen, it was reſolved to diſpatch the priſoners at Pomfret, in order to deprive the royal family of their chiefeſt ſupport. The lord Haſtings, to whom this deſign was imparted, readily gave his conſent, though he knew not the protector's real motive to put theſe lords to death. 2. It was agreed to endeavour to engage in the plot the propereſt perſons to accompliſh it, that is in other words, villains capable of any undertaking, without regard to honour, juſtice, or conſcience. 3. It was judged neceſſary to find ſome foundation to ſupport the duke of Gloceſter's pretenſions, that the people might be amuſed with ſome appearance of reaſon. 4. As it was no leſs requiſite to keep the plot ſecret till matters were ripe for execution, it was reſolved ſtill to ſhew publicly a ſettled deſign to cauſe the king to be crowned, till it was no longer neceſſary to diſſemble. 5. Laſtly, It was agreed, that the lord Haſtings ſhould either be gained or diſpatched out of the way. One of the two ſeemed abſolutely neceſſary, conſidering his great intereſt with the people of London.

This plan being laid, the protector wrote to ſir Richard Ratcliff governor of Pomfret and his creature, to behead, on a day appointed, the four lords that were under his cuſtody.

After that, he applied himſelf particularly to gain ſir Edmund Shaw, then mayor of London, and ſucceeded to his wiſh. The mayor engaged in the plot his brother John Shaw, a famous preacher, and Pinker, monk and provincial of the Auguſtine fryars, who were much eſteemed by the people. To theſe the protector joined Richard Cateſby, a particular friend and confident of the lord Haſtings.

By means of theſe men, the protector's ſecret council reſolved to ſpread among the people the reaſons which might ſtrengthen his pretenſions. This ſeemed very difficult, ſince there were three princes and ſix princeſſes before him, namely, the king, the duke of York his brother, Edward the IVth's five daughters, the earl of Warwick, ſon to the late duke of Clarence, and Margaret his ſiſter. One ſingle expedient ſeemed proper and ſufficient to deſtroy the rights of theſe princes and princeſſes; which was to intimate that Edward IVth's children were all baſtards, and Edward himſelf and the duke of Clarence his brother, not ſons of the late duke of York. To exclude Edward's children, it was reſolved to urge the validity of his pretended marriage-contract with Elizabeth Lucy before he eſpouſed Elizabeth Woodville, from whence it followed, that the children by the laſt marriage were ille-z It was no leſs than half the earldom of Hereford, and the lands belonging to it (which were then in the crown) He claimed them, as being deſcended from Ann daughter of Thomas of Woodſtock, who had married Eleanor, one of the youngeſt daughters and co-heireſſes of Humphrey de Bohun earl of Hereford. gitimate. This pretenſion was to be proved by the ducheſs of York's teſtimony, who had uſed that argument to hinder the king her ſon from marrying ſir Richard Woodville's daughter. Philip de Commines ſays, the biſhop of Bath and Wells then affirmed, that he married Edward IV. to a lady called Eleanor Talbot, before he eſpouſed the queen; that it was done without witneſs, and the king had ſtrictly charged him never to mention it to any perſon whatever. But we do not find in the Engliſh hiſtorians, that the duke of Gloceſter, at the time we are ſpeaking of, made uſe of this reaſon, which however would have been more plauſible than that taken from Edward's marriage with Elizabeth Lucy. For Edward had taken precautions with regard to this laſt, as was obſerved in the hiſtory of his reign, whereas the firſt had been unanſwerable, being ſupported by the evidence of the very biſhop that pretended to officiate. It is therefore unlikely the duke of Gloceſter ſhould neglect ſo great an advantage. But it may very well be that Philip de Commines was wrong informed, or at leaſt miſtaken in the name of the king's miſtreſs.

Mean-while, as it was not eaſy to prove Edward's pretended marriage with Elizabeth Lucy; and as, on the contrary, the biſhops had declared there was no mutual contract, the protector's council judged that the other point ſhould be chiefly inſiſted upon, namely, that Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence were not ſons of the late duke of York. Thereby were excluded, at once, the poſterity of theſe two princes, and then the duke of Gloceſter was next heir. To ſupport this aſſertion, it was reſolved to plead the duke of Clarence's own teſtimony, who, as was pretended maintained that Edward IV. was illegitimate. Moreover ſome of the late duke of York's ſervants were already ſuborned, who took care to ſpread divers reports which confirmed what was intended to be intimated to the people. They gave out, that the ducheſs of York had taken to her bed certain perſons perfectly reſembling Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence, and that the duke of Gloceſter alone was ſon to the duke of York.

As for the earl of Warwick and his ſiſter, another way was uſed to exclude them, namely, the attainder of the duke of Clarence their father, which, as they pretended, rendered them incapable of inheriting at all. Thus, the duke of Gloceſter did not ſcruple to accuſe his own mother of adultery. But this was one of the leaſt crimes which cleared his way to the throne, ſo blinded was he by his ambition.

Every thing being thus prepared, the protector feigned to haſten the king's coronation. For that purpoſe he appointed a particular council, which was to meet every day [b], and regulate the ceremonies. He took care to compoſe this council of ſuch lords as were moſt attached to Edward IVth's family, among whom the two archbiſhops, the biſhop of Ely [c], the lord Haſtings, and the lord Stanley were the principal. At the ſame time, he had another council conſiſting of his creatures, which alſo met regularly [d], but whoſe conſultations were only how to defer the coronation, and place the protector on the throne.

The lords appointed to haſten the coronation, quickly perceived all their orders were retarded by obſtacles from another quarter. On the other hand, they were ſurpriſed, that the protector ſeldom ſuffered the king to be ſeen; that the young prince had but very few attendants, whilſt the protector's houſe was full of unneceſſary people, and a crowd of courtiers, who were always well received and careſſed. Theſe things, joined to the affected delays of the coronation, began to breed ſuſpicion in thoſe who were really friends to the king's perſon. The lord Stanley, a man of deep penetration, was the firſt to diſcover his fears of the protector's ill deſigns. He freely ſpoke his mind to his fellow-counſellors, and declared, he did nor like the duke of Gloceſter's proceedings: that the other council which ſo frequently met, and whoſe reſolves could not be known, was to him very ſuſpicious. That therefore it was his opinion, they ſhould think betimes of means to prevent the miſchiefs which might happen. This advice was prudent; but the lord Haſtings, ſtill prepoſſeſſed that the protector thought only of humbling the queen's party, removed all theſe ſuſpicions. He affirmed there was no danger from the other council; and would pawn his life, that if any thing were tranſacted there detrimental to the king and the ſtate, he ſhould be inſtantly informed of it by one of the members who was entirely devoted to him. He meant Cateſby his friend and confident [e]. But he did not know that Cateſby betrayed him, and was therefore truſted by the duke of Gloceſter. So Stanley and the other lords of the ſame party preferring the lord Haſtings' aſſurances to their own judgment, took no meaſures to ſtop the protector's progreſs, which they might eaſily have done, had they endeavoured it in time.

Mean-while, the duke of Gloceſter, knowing what a firm friend the lord Haſtings was to the king, thought it time to execute the project he had formed about him, that is, to engage him in the plot, or deſtroy him. To that end, he ordered Cateſby to ſound him, but with all the caution imaginable, for fear of diſcovering the deſign before he was ſure to be gained. Cateſby having put the lord Haſtings upon diſcourſing of ſtate affairs, told him, people talked very much of the duke of Gloceſter's title to the crown preferably to Edward IV's children, and many were perſuaded the title was not groundleſs. That it was openly ſaid, it were to be wiſhed the reaſons alledged in his favour were good, ſince it would be more advantageous to the nation to be governed by a man than by a child. That, for his part, he had not yet examined the matter, and ſhould be glad firſt to know his opinion. Haſtings, not ſuſpecting his friend, diſcloſed all his thoughts, and imparted to him the lord Stanley's ſuſpicions of the duke of Gloceſter. He added, he had rather ſee the ruin and deſtruction of the protector and the duke of Buckingham, than the late king's children deprived of their right. That if he perceived any plot in favour of the duke of Gloceſter, he would employ his credit, his eſtate, and his very life, to prevent its ſucceeding. This reply was immediately carried to the protector by the treacherous Cateſby, with many aggravations, to promote the lord Haſtings' deſtruction for fear he ſhould one day diſcover his treachery.

The duke having thus ſounded the lord Haſtings, was greatly embarraſſed. He paſſionately deſired to gain that lord, knowing how ſerviceable he could be to him. But for that very reaſon he could not help fearing him, if he perſiſted in his attachment to the king. To free himſelf from this uneaſineſs, he ordered Cateſby to ſound him once more. Cateſby ſpeaking a little too plainly in his ſecond converſation with Haſtings, and not doubting that his treachery was known, told the protector, that not only he had nothing to hope from that quarter, but was to expect to find in Haſtings a profeſſed enemy. Whereupon the protector reſolved to diſpatch him, looking upon him now as his real adverſary.

This reſolution being taken, he called a council at the Tower [f], under colour of finiſhing the affairs of the king's coronation. He came himſelf at nine o'clock in the morning, with a chearful countenance, courteouſly ſaluting all the lords, as if he had nothing in his mind that gave him the leaſt uneaſineſs. After that, he went out, and deſired the lords of the council to continue their deliberations in his abſence.

About an hour after he returned with an angry countenance, knitting his brows, biting his lips, and ſhewing all poſſible ſigns of the perturbation of his mind. Remaining ſome time without ſpeaking, he broke ſilence with theſe words: "My lords, what puniſhment do they deſerve who have plotted againſt my life?" The lords not immediately anſwering, the lord Haſtings replied, "Whoever was guilty of ſuch a crime ought to be puniſhed as a traitor." "It is, anſwered the duke, that ſorcereſs my ſiſter-in-law, with her accomplices." Theſe words aſtoniſhed many of the council who favoured the queen, being afraid the accuſation concerned them. But the lord Haſtings was far from any ſuch fear. All knew he was ſworn enemy to the queen, and conſequently there was no likelihood of his joining with her in ſuch a deſign. Beſides, he had lately approved of the order ſent to Pomfret, to behead the lords priſoners, who were to be executed that very day. After a ſhort pauſe, the protector, unbuttoning his left ſleeve, ſhewed the council his arm, dried and withered, ſaying, with extreme emotion, "See what that ſorcereſs, and Shore's wife have done by their witchcrafts. They have reduced my arm as you ſee, and my whole body would ſoon have been the ſame, if by God's mercy their infamous plot had not been diſcovered." Theſe words cauſed a greater ſurprize than the former, the whole council knowing the duke's arm had long been in that condition. Beſides, if the queen had framed ſuch a project, Jane Shore would have been the laſt perſon ſhe would have imparted it to, ſince of all women ſhe moſt hated her. The lord Haſtings, who ſince Edward's death had kept Jane Shore, perceiving ſhe was involved in the accuſation, could not forbear to ſhew how much he doubted her being guilty, by ſaying, "if they had committed ſuch a crime, they deſerved to be puniſhed." Then the protector raiſing his voice, What, ſays he, doſt thou anſwer me with Ifs and Ands, as if I forged this accuſation? I tell thee they have conſpired my death, and thou thyſelf art acceſſary to the crime," As he ended theſe words, he ſtruck the table twice with his fiſt, and immediately the room was filled with armed men. As ſoon as they were in, the protector turning to the lord Haſtings, ſaid to him, "I arreſt thee for high treaſon." "Who me, my lord?" anſwered Haſtings. "Yes thee, traitor," replied the protector: at the ſame he delivered him to the cuſtody of the ſoldiers. During the buſtle, one of the ſoldiers would have cleft the lord Stanley's ſkull with a battle-ax: but he avoided part of the blow by ſinking under the table, however he was dangerouſly wounded. Probably the ſoldiers had orders to kill him as it were by chance, under pretence he would have defended the lord Haſtings. It is not hard to gueſs, why the protector deſired to be rid of him. Be this as it will, having miſſed his aim, Stanley was arreſted with the archbiſhop of York and the biſhop of Ely, it being the protector's intereſt to put it out of their power to hurt him, whom he knew to be zealouſly affected to the young king. As for the lord Haſtings, he would ſcarce give him time to make a ſhort confeſſion to the next prieſt that came, ſwearing, "He would not dine till his head was ſtruck off." Accordingly, he was beheaded upon a log which was found on the green before the Tower chapel, the time fixed by the protector being too ſhort to erect a ſcaffold. Hiſtorians enlarge upon ſundry preſages he had of his death. But though ſuch kind of remarks may have their uſe, when the facts are very certain, I ſhall paſs them over in ſilence[g]. It ſuffices to obſerve only, that the lord Haſtings died the ſame day and hour that the Pomfret priſoners[h] were executed, to whoſe death he greatly contributed.

The lord Haſtings being dead, the protector judged it neceſſary to palliate ſo haſty and illegal an execution, for fear the Londoners ſhould take fire upon hearing it[i] and for that purpoſe, ſent for the lord mayor and aldermen. In the mean while, he and the duke of Buckingham put on two old ruſty coats of armour. The mayor being come to the Tower, the protector told him, the lord Haſtings and ſome others had conſpired to take away his life, and he had no intelligence of the plot till ten o'clock that morning: that the fact being fully proved, the king and council had thought neceſſary to execute him immediately, by reaſon they were informed, a great number of people were all ready to riſe in his favour: that the conſpiracy had put his perſon in extreme danger, and forced him to harneſs himſelf in old ruſty armour for his defence: that he had ſent for him to inform him of the truth, that he might, when he acquainted the Londoners with the ſudden execution, take care to appeaſe or prevent the commotions which ill-affected people might raiſe in the city. The mayor and aldermen eaſily perceived the protector did not tell them the whole truth; but not daring to expreſs their doubt, they withdrew, aſſuring him his orders ſhould be obeyed.

What the protector had ſaid to the mayor and aldermen, was only to prepare the people to receive a proclamation, publiſhed in the city two hours after the death of the lord Haſtings. The king, in whoſe name it was publiſhed, was made to ſay in it, "That the lord Haſtings had conſpired to ſeize his perſon, in order to govern the kingdom as he pleaſed, and to kill the protector, and the duke of Buckingham. That to prevent the deſign, he was forced by advice of his council, to cauſe the criminal to be immediately puniſhed, and that never man more deſerved to die. That it was he that perſuaded the late king to do ſo many things contrary to the rights and privileges of the people. That he had endeavoured to debauch him by his perſuaſions and example, and had laid the night before with Shore's wife, the accomplice of all his crimes, and particularly of that for which he was executed." There were ſeveral other things in the proclamation, tending to leſſen the people's affection and compaſſion for the lord Haſtings, and to ſhew that his death was a judgment upon him. It was obſerved, that the proclamation was elegantly compoſed, and fairly written on parchment, though publiſhed ſo very ſoon after that lord's death. This bred a ſuſpicion that it was ready prepared[k] in order to be publiſhed immediately after the execution. Accordingly, it produced but little effect.[l]

As Jane Shore was accuſed of being an accomplice of the lord Haſtings, the protector was obliged to proceed againſt her. So, giving orders[m] to arreſt her, he commanded her to be brought to the Tower, where ſhe was examined before the council. The duke of Gloceſter accuſed her himſelf of intending, by her ſorceries, to waſte his fleſh by degrees, and conſpiring with the lord Haſtings to aſſaſſinate him. But beſides that he could alledge nothing in proof of theſe accuſations, ſhe made ſo good a defence, that the council could find no reaſon to condemn her. However, as the protector was unwilling ſhe ſhould eſcape without puniſhment, ſhe was ſued for incontinency, as being guilty of leaving her huſband, and living with other men. Theſe were facts ſhe could not deny, ſince the whole court was witneſs, ſhe had been kept by the late king, and afterward by the lord Haſtings. Whereupon ſhe was delivered over to the biſhop of London, and condemned by the eccleſiaſtical court to do open penance in St. Paul's church in a white ſheet, with a wax taper in her hand, before all the people.[n]

The late executions at London and Pomfret without any proceſs, the impriſonment of the archbiſhop of York, the biſhop of Ely, and the lord Stanley, left no room to queſtion the duke of Gloceſter's deſigns. Hitherto, he had given ſome colour to his conduct; but after theſe violent proceedings, there was no way to hide his intentions. Every one ſaid to himſelf, theſe unjuſt doings could not but end in the king's deſtruction. But people durſt not tell their thoughts to one another, ſuch a terror was there every where ſpread. They, who could have taken meaſures to oppoſe the Protector's deſigns, were dead or in priſon; and if there were any left capable to make him uneaſy, the example of thoſe who had been treated with ſo much barbarity, was ſufficient to cauſe them to act with circumſpection. They plainly ſaw the imminent danger, if they did but ſeem to perceive what was contriving.

Fear and conſternation having thus ſeized the great men, the Protector and the duke of Buckingham thought it was time to diſcover their deſigns.[o] There remained but one difficulty, and that was to get the Londoners to approve of the intended change. This was no eaſy matter. Indeed, private perſons may ſuffer themſelves to be corrupted, and if any are too obſtinate, they may be diſpatched as the lord Haſtings had been ſerved. But how to perſuade a whole nation they ought to approve of manifeſt acts of injuſtice, wherein they themſelves have no intereſt, there are but two ways to ſucceed. The firſt is to oblige them through fear, to feign to believe what they do not believe; the other, to gain thoſe in whom they put any confidence, that they may by degrees be brought to what is deſired. After ſeveral conſultations, the Protector and the duke of Buckingham reſolved to uſe theſe two means; the firſt whereof had already begun to have a very great effect. For the ſecond, they agreed, that, by emiſſaries, it ſhould be continued more than ever to be ſpread among the people, that Edward the Fourth's children were illegitimate, and their father himſelf and the duke of Clarence his brother where not the duke of York's ſons. That theſe rumours ſhould be ſupported by a ſermon of Dr Shaw, whoſe eloquence was applauded by the whole city.

Theſe meaſures being taken, the doctor mounted the pulpit one Sunday morning at Paul's Croſs, and preached upon theſe words, "Baſtard ſlips ſhall take no deep root[p]." He began with ſhewing the bleſſings God uſually beſtowed on the fruits of the marriage-bed, and the calamities which on the contrary fell upon the children born out of wedlock. He did not want examples of both, as well in ſacred as prophane hiſtory. Then he enlarged on the noble qualities of the duke of York, ſlain in the battle of Wakefield, and ſhewed how happy the Engliſh would be to have a ſovereign of the race of that great prince. From thence he took occaſion to remark, that it was to be feared, the reign of Edward V. would be fatal to England, ſince he was born of an illegitimate marriage. Moreover, that neither Edward IV. nor the late duke of Clarence were ſons of the great duke of York, as was certainly known from officers of his houſhold, witneſſes of the ducheſs their mother's ſcandalous life. That ſhe had taken to her bed, in the ſight of all her ſervants, men whom the two brothers perfectly reſembled: but that the duke of Gloceſter alone could truly be called the duke of York's ſon. That beſides, Edward IV. was not lawfully married to his queen, ſince he had before plighted his faith to the lady Elizabeth Lucy, as could be ſhewn by good evidences. That conſequently his children could be no better than baſtards. That therefore the duke of York's real poſterity was not to be looked for either in the children of Edward or of the duke of Clarence, and that their race would infallibly periſh, becauſe "baſtard plants ſhall take no deep root." But my lord protector, continued he, raiſing his voice, that noble prince, the pattern of all virtue, carries in his countenance, in his air, in his carriage, in his ſoul, the perfect image of his illuſtrious father. At theſe words, it was deſigned, the duke of Gloceſter ſhould appear, in hopes that the people, moved by the preacher's eloquence, would ſalute him king. But the duke happening to ſtay a little too long, the Doctor had begun another ſubject, when he ſaw him entering, which however he left, and repeated the ſame words before-mentioned, whilſt the duke was preſſing through the crowd to come to his place. But inſtead of hearing the cry of Long live King Richard! as he expected, he perceived, all kept a ſullen ſilence, the people deteſting the baſeneſs of the preacher, inſtead of applauding his eloquence. The ſermon being ended, the doctor went and hid himſelf for ſhame, neither durſt he ever ſhew his face again in the world. It is ſaid he died preſently after with grief at his ill ſucceſs, and for loſing the eſteem of his audience.

Shaw's ſermon not producing the deſired effect, other means were to be uſed; for the protector had proceeded too far to recede. So the duke of Buckingham, being a fine ſpeaker, took upon him to harangue the people, imagining, a polite ſpeech would be more ſucceſsful than Shaw's methodical ſermon. To that purpoſe, the lord mayor had orders to aſſemble the aldermen, common-council, and principal citizens, at the Guild-Hall [q]. Which being done, the duke of Buckingham came to the aſſembly [r], and taking his place near the mayor, told the people, he was come from the council, to acquaint them with a matter of the greateſt importance to the whole kingdom, but eſpecially to the inhabitants of London. His ſpeech ran at firſt upon the calamities endured by the people of England in the laſt reign. He aggravated in a very violent manner, the cruelty, avarice, and incontinency of Edward IV. and endeavoured, to the utmoſt of his power, to render him odious. Then, he put his audience in mind, the Sunday before, that excellent man, Dr. Shaw, had clearly proved to them, that Edward was not lawfully married to his queen, and conſequently their children were baſtards: that neither Edward himſelf, nor the duke of Clarence his brother, were the duke of York's ſons; and to the proofs alledged by the doctor, he himſelf could add many more, did not his reſpect for the protector hinder him upon dwelling upon the ducheſs his mother's looſe life: that for theſe reaſons, the lords of the council, and the commons of the realm, particularly the northern counties, had declared, that a baſtard ſhould not ſit on the throne of England, and petitioned, that the crown ſhould be adjudged to the duke of Gloceſter, only ſon of the late duke of York: that indeed there was reaſon to fear the magnanimous duke would refuſe the offer; but on the other hand, it was to be hoped, all the people, and eſpecially the inhabitants of London, uniting with one accord, he would be prevailed with to take upon him the burden of the government, too weighty for a child: that upon all theſe conſiderations, he required them in his own, and the name of the lords of the council, to declare their intention. Here he ſtopped in expectation to hear the people cry, "Long live King Richard;" but every one ſtood ſpeechleſs, ſo great was their ſurpriſe to hear ſo unjuſt a propoſal. The duke, ſurpriſed in his turn at ſo unexpected a ſilence, aſked the mayor the reaſon; who replied, perhaps they did not well underſtand him. If that is the caſe, anſwered the duke, I will make myſelf better underſtood. Then raiſing his voice, he repeated the ſenſe of what he had ſaid in other words, with a gracefulneſs and eloquence worthy a nobler ſubject. But the people ſtill kept a profound ſilence. The duke in confuſion that his rhetoric ſhould produce ſo little effect, talked ſome time in a low voice with the mayor, to conſult with him what was to be done. At length the mayor told him, perhaps the people were ſilent becauſe they were uſed to be harangued only by the recorder, who was the mouth of the city. Whereupon he commanded the recorder [s] to ſpeak to the people, which he did with great reluctance. However, he ſo managed his ſpeech, that without any addition of his own, he repeated to the people the ſubſtance of what the duke had ſaid. He concluded, with requiring the people [t] to give a poſitive anſwer, whether they would have the duke of Gloceſter for king or not? At theſe words there was a confuſed murmur in the aſſembly; and as it was yet uncertain whether the people anſwered Ay or No, ſome of the duke of Buckingham's ſervants, who had ſlipt in amongſt the crowd, cried out, "Long live king Richard!" Some of the citizens who had been bribed, but would not venture to begin, ſeconded the cry, and the apprentices, with the rabble that ſtood near the door, followed their example, and throwing up their hats in token of joy, cried out, "King Richard! King Richard!" The duke of Buckingham plainly perceived, the cry came from the rabble without, and not from the principal citizens in the hall. Nevertheleſs he commanded ſilence, and reſuming his ſpeech, ſaid he was overjoyed to ſee ſo general and unanimous an approbation to his propoſal. "Wherefore, continued he, my good friends, I deſire you to meet me here to-morrow about this time, that we may all go together, and preſent our humble petition to his highneſs, and intreat him to condeſcend to our requeſt." Then the mayor diſmiſſing the people, the citizens returned to their houſes with tears in their eyes, and grief in their hearts, without daring to ſhew it, for fear of offending thoſe whoſe intereſt it was to have it concealed.

Next day the duke of Buckingham, with the mayor, aldermen, and many other perſons of the cabal, came to the protector's palace [u] and ſent a meſſage to him, that the magiſtrates of London deſired an audience. The protector ſcrupled to appear, pretending to fear, that ſuch numbers were aſſembled for no good deſign. Whereupon the duke of Buckingham obſerved to the mayor and thoſe about him, that his highneſs was not conſcious of their intent, intimating thereby, that he was not concerned in the tranſactions of the foregoing day. At length, upon the repeated deſire that his highneſs would be pleaſed to grant an audience, he came forth with ſigns of great miſtruſt, and as not daring to approach ſuch multitudes for fear of ſome miſchief [w]. Then the duke of Buckingham, without giving the mayor time to ſpeak, briefly ſet forth the grievances of the nation in the late reign. After that, he ſaid to the protector, the people had found no better way to free themſelves from their evils, than to pray his highneſs to aſſume the royal authority, which of right belonged to him. He added, the mayor and aldermen of London, whom he ſaw there, were come to petition in the name of all the people, who were united in the ſame intention.

The duke of Gloceſter ſeeming ſurpriſed at the propoſal, anſwered, "He was convinced that all he had heard was true: but he had ſo great a veneration for the memory of the late king his brother, and ſo tender an affection for his children, as out-weighed all the crowns in the world, and therefore he could not comply with their requeſt. However he willingly pardoned their petition, and thanked them for their affection: but adviſed them to be obedient to the ſovereign under whoſe dominion they lived. That for his part, he would continue to the utmoſt of his power to give the king his nephew ſuch counſels, as he ſhould judge moſt conducive to render his kingdom flouriſhing, and his people happy, as he believed he had hitherto done, to the ſatisfaction of all the world."

The duke of Buckingham ſeeming diſſatisfied with this anſwer, murmured ſome words to himſelf expreſſing his diſcontent, and at length deſired leave to ſpeak once more; and having obtained it, he plainly told the protector, "That all the people were unanimouſly reſolved not to acknowledge for king any of Edward IVth's children: that they had proceeded too far to recede, and therefore if he would not receive the crown, the people would be forced to offer it to one who would not refuſe it." At theſe words the protector began to be a little more compliant, and at laſt ſpoke to the people in this manner: "Since I ſee the whole kingdom is reſolved not to ſuffer Edward's children to reign, for which I am extremely concerned, I am fully convinced, the crown can of right belong only to me, who am the undoubted ſon of the late duke of York my father. To this title is now joined the free election of the lords and commons of the realm, which of all titles I ſhall conſider as the chief and moſt effectual. From theſe conſiderations I graciouſly receive your petition, and inſtantly take upon me the government of the two kingdoms of England and France, the former to be governed and defended, and the latter by God's help, and my people's aſſiſtance, to be ſubdued." At the cloſe of the ſpeech was heard a great ſhout of "Long live king Richard III!" The comedy being over, the people retired to their homes, making upon this occaſion ſuch reflections as were ſuggeſted by their underſtandings, intereſts or paſſions.

18. RICHARD III. Sirnamed Crook-Back.

[1483] THE duke of Gloceſter having attained his ends by ſuch extraordinary ways, and in ſpite of all the obſtacles that oppoſed his ambition, was proclaimed the 22d of June [a], by the name of Richard III. He might have been crowned the next day, ſince the preparations for Edward the Vth's coronation were finiſhed: but he delayed the ceremony till the ſixth of July, expecting the arrival of five thouſand men, which he ſent for out of the north, becauſe he did not entirely confide in the citizens of London.

During that interval, he gave the great ſeal to the biſhop of Lincoln [b], one of his favourites. On the 18th of June he conferred the office of earl marſhal upon the lord John Howard [c], and the next day the title of duke of Norfolk. The day following he commiſſioned him to exerciſe the office of high-ſteward during the coronation. A few days after, he created Thomas Howard his ſon, earl of Surrey, William Berkley earl of Nottingham, and the lord Lovel one of his confidents, viſcount of the ſame name [d].

Thomas Rotheram archbiſhop of York and the lord Thomas Stanley, who were impriſoned the day the lord Haſtings was executed, were releaſed at the ſame time, and the new king made the lord Stanley lord ſteward of the houſhold. It was not from a motive of affection or confidence, but out of fear that the lord Strange his ſon [e], who was beginning to levy forces in Lincolnſhire [f], ſhould raiſe commotions, the conſequences whereof he much dreaded.

As for Dr. Morton biſhop of Ely, who was arreſted the ſame day, the king deſigned not to do him the ſame favor. But the univerſity of Oxford, of which that prelate was member, having preſented a petition in his behalf, he did not think proper wholly to reject it, at a time when he wanted to gain the affection of his new ſubjects. However, as he mortally hated that biſhop, he could not reſolve to releaſe him entirely. He only took him out of his confinement in the Tower, and committed him to the duke of Buckingham's cuſtody, who ſent him to the caſtle of Brecknock in Wales. He was a man of mean parentage [g], but having ſtudied at Oxford, where he had taken his doctor's degree, was ſo eminent for his learning and parts, that he was taken from thence and made privy-councellor by Henry VI. The revolution which had placed Edward IV. on the throne made no alteration in his fortune. Edward, it is likely, pleaſed with his complaiſance, continued him in the ſame poſt and promoted him to the biſhopric of Ely. From thenceforward he was wholly attached to that prince, which drew on him Richard's hatred, who put him under confinement the ſame day the lord Haſtings was beheaded, for fear his affection to the late king's family ſhould lead him to oppoſe his deſigns. The ſixth of July, the coronation of the king and queen was performed with great ſolemnity [h]. All the peers of the realm were preſent for fear of being ſuſpected by the new king, whoſe jealous temper was well known. Margaret counteſs of Richmond, wife of the lord Stanley and mother of the earl of Richmond detained in Bretagne, held up the queen's train.

Richard enjoyed but two years and two months the crown he had ſo ardently deſired. He ſpent his whole reign in deviſing means to ſupport himſelf in the throne, which having mounted by bloodſhed and other crimes, he endeavoured to keep poſſeſſion by the ſame methods, but all his meaſures proved ineffectual, Divine Providence being pleaſed to blaſt projects, founded wholly upon injuſtice, violence, and the ſubverſion of the laws. The preſent circumſtances ſeemed however to be very favourable for him. The Lancaſtrian family was quite extinct in England. Henry earl of Richmond, the only branch of that houſe, was in the hands of the duke of Bretagne, who had promiſed Edward IV. to hinder him from going out of his dominions. Margaret his mother ſhewed no inclination to proſecute her rights. Beſides, ſhe was ſubject to a huſband whom Richard had attached to his intereſt by one of the moſt conſiderable poſts at court. As to the princes and princeſſes of Portugal and Caſtile, deſcended from Philippa and Catherine of Lancaſter, daughters of John of Gant, they were too remote to diſturb the new king. In fine, there was not a lord in the kingdom that ſeemed to have credit enough to excite inſurrections, the civil war having ſwept away great numbers and entirely deſtroyed many ancient families. As for thoſe that were ſtill left, Richard hoped to win them by favours, as he had already gained the duke of Buckingham, the duke of Norfolk, the lord Stanley, and ſome others. As for the Yorkiſts attached to the family of Edward IV. namely, the Woodvilles, Greys, and others of the new nobility, he had already diſpatched ſome, in the laſt reign, and the reſt were fled. The queen-widow was ſtill with her five daughters in ſanctuary, from whence ſhe durſt not ſtir, and where ſhe ſeemed unable to hurt him. The marquis of Dorſet her ſon had likewiſe taken ſanctuary, and ſir Richard Woodville had abſconded. In a word, Edward V. and the duke of York his brother were in the Tower, where ſince the 27th of June, Richard had taken care to place as governor ſir Robert Brackenbury his creature. Thus, nothing ſeemed capable to ſhake the new monarch's throne.

Mean-while, to be provided againſt whatever might happen, he formed the project to ſecure Caſtile and Portugal, the archduke Maximilian, who governed the Low-countries in the name of Philip his ſon, France and Bretagne, from whence he feared his enemies might procure ſome aſſiſtance. In fine, to break all the meaſures which the friends of Edward the IVth's family might take againſt him, he reſolved to murder his nephews young king Edward V. and the duke of York his brother. Theſe were Richard's firſt projects to preſerve his crown, which created him no leſs uneaſineſs after poſſeſſion than whilſt he was labouring to obtain it.

To execute all theſe reſolutions, the 12th of July, he appointed for his embaſſador to Caſtile, Barnard de la Force, with orders to renew the ancient alliance with queen Iſabella and Ferdinand king of Arragon her huſband. The next day he gave the like commiſſion to Thomas Hutton, to treat of the prolongation of the truce with Francis II. duke of Bretagne. Probably Hutton had ſecret inſtructions to endeavour to procure the earl of Richmond, or at leaſt to renew the treaty upon that ſubject between Edward IV. and the duke. Three days after, he appointed commiſſioners to treat with France concerning ſome breaches of the truce, in order to have occaſion to confirm it.

Theſe meaſures being taken, nothing remained but to execute the principal article, the murder of his two nephews. For that purpoſe, he reſolved to remove from London, that their death happening in his abſence, he might be the leſs ſuſpected. With this view he departed from London to viſit ſeveral counties, under colour of reforming certain abuſes introduced to the great detriment of the people. His progreſs into the north was particularly neceſſary to curb the inſolence of the troops he had ſent for from thence, and who after their return had committed great outrages. But before he proceeded to York, he made ſome ſtay at Gloceſter, not to be too far from London, whilſt his orders concerning his nephews were executing.

The duke of Buckingham, his intimate friend and confident, attended him to Gloceſter. He had loaded that lord [g] Biſhop Morton was not of mean parentage. He was ſon of Richard Morton, a gentleman of Bere in Dorſetſhire; whoſe grandfather was Robert Morton, of Morton in Nottinghamſhire, of a very ancient family.

[h] On the 4th of July he went to the Tower by water with his wife; the 5th he rode through London with great pomp; and the 6th was crowned. See a particular account of his coronation in Hall, fol. 25. 26; and Hollingſhead, p. 1387, &c.

with eſtates and honours, both whilſt he was protector and after he was king. But the duke ſtill expected another favour, of which he had received a poſitive promiſe. And that was, the moiety of the lands of the houſe of Hereford, to which he thought he had a very juſt right. The foundation of his claim will plainly appear in the following genealogy.

HUMPHREY BOHUN,
Earl of Hereford and Northampton.

MARY BOHUN Wife of Henry IV.	ANN THOMAS of Woodſtock Earl of Gloceſter, Son of Edward III.
HENRY V.	ANN Edmund Earl of Stafford.
HENRY VI.	HUMPHREY Duke of Buckingham.
EDWARD Prince of Wales.	HENRY Duke of Buckingham.

To conſider only this genealogy, it is evident, the duke of Buckingham had a right to claim one half of the earl of Hereford's lands, as deſcended from one of his daughters. But there were other reaſons which rendered his title diſputable. When Richard II. put to death his uncle the duke of Gloceſter at Calais, he cauſed his eſtate to be confiſcated by the parliament, and gave what that prince held in right of Ann his wife to the earl of Derby, who had married the eldeſt of the ſiſters, and withal created him duke of Hereford. Thus the earl of Derby took poſſeſſion of the whole inheritance of the earl of Hereford his father-in-law, and afterwards mounting the throne by the name of Henry IV. all his lands were annexed to the crown, which was thereby poſſeſſed of the whole eſtate of the Hereford family to the time of Richard the third's acceſſion to the throne. However, when Richard, being protector, intended to engage the duke of Buckingham to ſerve him in his deſign to uſurp the crown, he promiſed to reſtore him the moiety of the inheritance confiſcated upon the duke of Gloceſter his great-grandfather. But after he was king he altered his mind, whether he thought he had amply rewarded him otherwiſe, or was afraid of rendering him too powerful, and ſo giving him occaſion to aſpire to the throne, as deſcending from Edward III. Be this as it will, the duke during the progreſs putting him in mind of his promiſe, received ſuch an anſwer, as left him no room to expect that juſtice or favour[i]. The duke, who was very high-ſpirited, was ſo offended at the king's anſwer, that he deſired leave to go and look after his own private affairs[k]. Richard, not imagining the refuſal had made ſo deep an impreſſion upon the duke, or perhaps not fearing the effects of his reſentment, gave him the leave he deſired, and parting from him at Gloceſter, he purſued his journey to York.

During the king's ſtay at Gloceſter, he ſent an expreſs order to Brackenbury, governor of the Tower of London, to murder Edward V. and the duke of York his brother. Brackenbury, more conſcientious than his maſter, returned a very ſubmiſſive anſwer, but withal told him, he ſhould never be able to execute his commands. Richard, vexed to be deceived in his opinion of that officer, ſent him by James Tyrrel a written order, to deliver to the bearer the keys and government of the Tower for one ſingle night. Brackenbury obeyed, and Tyrrel brought in his agents[l] to execute the king's orders. That very night, whilſt all were aſleep, he went into the two princes' room, and ſmothering them in their bed, cauſed them to be buried under a little ſtaircaſe. This is what Tyrrel himſelf afterwards confeſſed, who was executed in the reign of Henry VII. In 1674, whilſt ſome alterations were making in that part of the Tower, bones were found, which were thought to be thoſe of Edward V. and the duke of York, and upon that ſuppoſition, Charles II. who then reigned, ordered them to be put into a marble urn, and removed to Weſtminſter among the tombs of the kings[m]. As the two princes were never more heard of, ſince the day Tyrrel went into the Tower, and as their ſervants were diſmiſſed, the public doubted not that they were ſacrificed to their uncle's ſafety.

Richard having received the news of the death of his two nephews, continued his journey into the north, and came to York about the end of Auguſt. As the pretence of his progreſs was to cauſe juſtice to be impartially adminiſtered to the people, he could not help executing ſome of the northern ſoldiers, who in returning from London had committed great outrages. Then, he cauſed himſelf to be crowned a ſecond time at the cathedral of York the beginning of September, and the ſame day be created Edward his ſon, ten years old, prince of Wales, with the uſual formalities.

A few days after his coronation, he received the agreeable news that Ferdinand and Iſabella had prevented him, by deſiring themſelves the confirmation of the alliance between England and Caſtile, by an embaſſador ſent on purpoſe, and who was then come to York. The renewing of that alliance, which he ratified himſelf the 31ſt of Auguſt, pleaſed him extremely. He found that Ferdinand and Iſabella acknowledging him for lawful king, were forming no project to reſtore to the throne the houſe of Lancaſter, from whence queen Iſabella was deſcended, being grand-daughter of Catherine of Lancaſter, daughter of John of Gant. He expreſſed his ſatisfaction by conferring the honour of knighthood[n] upon Geoffry de Saſiola embaſſador of Caſtile, who brought him the good news, and by his letters full of eſteem, affection, and acknowledgment, to the king and queen of Spain, to the cardinal de Mendoca, and to the earl of Leryn their miniſters.

Lewis XI. king of France died Auguſt the 29th this year. Charles VIII. his only ſon being a minor, ſucceeded him under the guardianſhip of his ſiſter Ann, wife of Philip de Bourbon, lord of Beaujeu, purſuant to the late king's directions. But Lewis duke of Orleans, firſt prince of the blood, diſputed the regency with her. This conteſt raiſed in the court of France diſturbances which prevented the miniſters from attending to the renewal or confirmation of the truce with England, which Richard earneſtly ſolicited.

Whilſt the king was flattering himſelf with having taken all neceſſary meaſures to ſupport himſelf on the throne, a conſpiracy was forming againſt him, which ended in his ruin after proving the deſtruction of its author. I left the duke of Buckingham diſſatisfied, and parting from the king in order to retire. He was a perſon of a lively and penetrating genius, very proud, ambitious, revengeful, and not very ſtrict in his morals. During Edward the fourth's life, he could never bring himſelf to ſtoop to the queen, though ſhe had a great aſcendant over the king her huſband. He was even conſidered as head of the party of the ancient nobility againſt the new, which wholly conſiſted of the queen's relations and creatures. It was chiefly from his averſion to the queen, that after Edward IV's death he devoted himſelf entirely to the duke of Gloceſter, for whom as has been related, he procured the protectorſhip, and at laſt the crown itſelf. In return for ſo ſignal a ſervice, Richard had liberally beſtowed his favors upon him. Particularly he made him as it were maſter of Wales, and the adjoining counties, by the poſts and governments given him in thoſe parts.[o] But all theſe favours were forgot, when he refuſed to grant him a moiety of the lands of Hereford. The duke perceived the king's policy, in giving him poſts, from which he could remove him at pleaſure, whereas in reſtoring the lands he demanded, it would not have been in his power to reſume them without uſing force. This proceeding convinced him, that the king would always keep him in dependence; and as he perfectly knew that prince's character, eaſily perceived, that the leaſt occaſion would be ſufficient to make him forfeit whatever he enjoyed. Beſides, he thought it a manifeſt injuſtice to refuſe him what he believed to be his lawful right; that moreover he broke his promiſe, and ſhewed himſelf extremely ungrateful, in making ſo ill a return for the ſervices he had received from him. All this gave him reaſon to fear, he had intended to ruin him in time.

Full of theſe ſiniſter thoughts, he retired to his caſtle of Brecknock, where Dr. Morton biſhop of Ely was priſoner under his cuſtody. In his frequent converſations with that prelate, he could not help diſcovering his reſentment againſt the king. The biſhop, who was a man of ſenſe, quickly found the duke was diſſatisfied, which emboldened him to talk to him freely. He obſerved the duke took a pleaſure in hearing him, and that he would have perhaps ſpoken himſelf more plainly, had he dared to truſt him entirely. So, to inſpire him with more confidence, he affected to ſpeak of the king in a manner, which, by ſhewing what he thought of him, gave the duke to underſtand, that he ſhould find in him a perſon ready to ſecond him in his deſigns. At length, after mutually ſounding each other for ſome time, they opened their minds to one another, and lamented together the unhappy ſtate of the kingdom under ſuch a king. The late death of Edward V, and of the duke his brother, afforded them freſh matter to exclaim againſt Richard. They concluded, that ſince he had not ſpared his own nephews, no lord in the kingdom could be ſure of his life. Theſe converſations ended at length in the duke's requeſt to the biſhop, to tell him freely, whether he ſaw no way to prevent the miſchiefs they had reaſon to fear; promiſing with an oath to keep the ſecret inviolably. Morton, who till then was under ſome apprehenſions that the duke deſigned to enſnare him, being encouraged by the oath, told him in plain terms, "it was his opinion, there was no other way than to dethrone Richard, and ſet up another king. He owned, that though he could have wiſhed the crown had continued in the family of Henry VI. he had not been able to avoid following the ſtream, when he ſaw almoſt all England declare for Edward IV. That afterwards, Henry VI. and the prince his ſon being dead, he had faithfully adhered to Edward. That upon Edward's death he had ſerved with the ſame zeal his young ſon, whom he believed his lawful ſucceſſor. That afterwards he perceived with grief the duke of Gloceſter aſpiring to the throne, and having the honour to be of the council, thought it is duty to endeavour to oppoſe his deſign. But inſtead of ſucceeding, he had only drawn upon himſelf the hatred and diſpleaſure of that prince, who had thrown him into priſon, ſolely for adhering to the family of Edward IV. That this unjuſt violence had increaſed his hatred of the uſurper, and the tragical death of the two young princes had carried it to the higheſt degree. That being in theſe circumſtances, he had conſidered with himſelf what prince would be the moſt proper to be placed on the throne in the room of the tyrant, and had found no other than the duke of Buckingham, deſcended from a ſon of Edward III. That the whole race of Lancaſter being extinct, at leaſt in England, there remained of the houſe of York only the tyrant and his ſon, with the young earl of Warwick ſon of the duke of Clarence. As for the laſt, he could not pretend to the crown, his father's attainder having debarred his heirs of the right of inheriting. That the preſent king had by his crimes rendered himſelf unworthy, and to preſerve the ſons after deſtroying the father, would be acting by halves. That therefore, once more, he ſaw only the duke of Bukingham capable of lawfully claiming the crown."

The duke liſtened very attentively tothis diſcourſe, but deferred his anſwer till next day. This delay threw the biſhop in a fright, ſince it left him ſtill uncertain whether the duke was ſincere, or deſigned only to ſift him. By the way the biſhop it ſeems was not very ſcrupulous, ſince knowing the duke of Buckingham's character, he readily offered his ſervice to ſet him on the throne. This is a ſign that he acted more from a motive of revenge againſt Richard, than with a view to the good of the public. The king and the duke were too much alike for any great advantage to be expected by ſuch a change.

Next day the converſation being reſumed, the duke after a long apology for all his former actions, freely confeſſed to the prelate, "he had once an intention to aſpire to the throne, but upon mature deliberation had entirely dropped it. He conſidered, that in acting for himſelf, he ſhould ſtir up againſt him all the friends of the two houſes of York and Lancaſter, equally concerned to oppoſe his pretenſions. That there was a prince nearer than he, whom the houſe of Lancaſter looked upon as their head, and he it was on whom he had caſt his eyes to raiſe to the throne. Then he named Henry earl of Richmond, who was in Bretagne." adding, "that the project to reſtore the houſe of Lancaſter to the throne would draw one half of the kingdom to that prince's intereſt, and he had deviſed a happy expedient to gain him the other half: and that was his marriage with Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of Edward IV. which would make all the Yorkiſts his friends. That moreover, the nation would receive great advantage from thence, in as much as all the ſeeds of the civil wars would be deſtroyed, by the union of the two contending houſes. That by this means even thoſe who were indifferent for either party, would be forced, as one may ſay, to promote the common good of their country; and then Richard's few friends would not be able to balance ſo great a power. Whereas, if he pretended to ſet up himſelf, the whole kingdom would be united againſt him, ſince there was not the leaſt colour to exclude from the throne, two houſes that had been in poſſeſſion above fourſcore years. In fine, he added, that in his way to Brecknock, he met the counteſs of Richmond, and having ſounded her upon this head, believed he could be ſure ſhe would be eaſily diſpoſed to promote the advancement of her ſon."

The biſhop liked this expedient, as more conformable to juſtice and equity, and more adapted to the good of the realm, eſpecially as it came from the only perſon, who would have had reaſon to oppoſe it, had it been propoſed by another.

Henry earl of Richmond, as I elſewhere obſerved, was of Welſh extraction. But his mother Margaret was daughter of John de Beaufort duke of Somerſet, grandſon of John of Gant duke of Lancaſter. Margaret's father dying without iſſue male, Edmund his younger brother inherited his title. But Edmund and all his poſterity being deſtroyed in the civil wars, Margaret and her ſon were the only remains of that houſe. So, it ſeemed, they ſhould have indiſputably inherited all the rights of the houſe of Lancaſter. But however the title was liable to great objections.

Whilſt John of Gant duke of Lancaſter lived with Conſtantia of Caſtile his ſecond wife, he kept, as his concubine, Catherine Roet, widow of ſir Otho de Swinford, and by her had ſeveral children. Conſtantia his wife being dead, he married his concubine, and had intereſt enough to cauſe her children, born before marriage, to be legitimated by an act of parliament, and by Richard IId's ſubſequent letters patent. However, the king and the parliament, willing to make a diſtinction between theſe natural children and the others born in wedlock, gave them not the name of Lancaſter or Plantagenet, but that of Beaufort, the name of the caſtle where they were born. Moreover, though in the act of parliament, and in the king's letters patent, power was granted them to hold principalities, dukedoms, earldoms, &c. and to tranſmit them to their heirs, there was no mention of the crown.[p] During the reigns of Henry IV. and Henry V. the princes of this branch durſt not aſſume the name of Lancaſter. It was not till about the end of Henry VI's reign, that Edmund duke of Somerſet being prime miniſter, and very zealous for the king, againſt the attempts of the duke of York, began by degrees to aſſert his deſcent from John of Gant, and his kindred to the king, as being of the houſe of Lancaſter. The queſtion therefore was to know, whether the princes of this branch could ſucceed to the crown in their turn. And ſuppoſing they could, the point was to know what rank they held, and whether the heirs of John of Gant's daughters born in wedlock, were not to precede thoſe of a ſon only legitimated, and born before marriage. If ſo, there was no leſs than ten or twelve princes and princeſſes in Portugal, Caſtile and Germany, who would have excluded the earl of Richmond. On the other hand, it ſeems that by Edward IVth's endeavours to have the earl of Richmond in his hands, he had, as it were, owned him capable of inheriting all the rights of the houſe of Lancaſter. This was a queſtion which might have been debated in thoſe days, but which, having been decided above two hundred years, requires no farther examination, unleſs out of mere curioſity thoſe that are verſed in theſe matters are willing to exerciſe their wits.

Very likely, if the duke of Buckingham had thought it in his power to mount the throne, he would not have failed to object againſt the earl of Richmond's title the forementioned reaſons. But, as he had himſelf obſerved, in his diſcourſe with the biſhop of Ely, he could not ſet up himſelf without oppoſing the two houſes of York and Lancaſter, that is to ſay, the whole kingdom, which was divided between theſe two factions. So the pretence to reſtore the houſe of Lancaſter, and put an end to the civil wars, by the union of [p] There was mention of the crown, but it was to exclude them abſolutely from it; as is plain from the words of the act. They were by it intitled—"Ad quæcunque honores dignitatie (excepta dignitates regali) preeminentias ſtatus gradus & officia publica & privata tam perpetua quam temporalia atque feudalia & nobilia quibuſcunque nominibus noncupentur, etiamſi ducatus principatus comitatus Baronie vel alia feuda fuerint."—This act bears date Feb. 9 Anno. 20. Richard II. and was afterwards exemplified by king Henry IV. on Feb. 10, in the 8th year of his reign. See Sandford. p. 322, 323.

Where

the two contending houſes, was by far the more natural way to be revenged of Richard. I ſay to be revenged, for it is hard to believe, a man of his character ſhould act on this occaſion from a nobler motive.

Be this as it will, the duke and the biſhop having conſulted together how to accompliſh their deſigns, came to this concluſion: that all hope of ſucceſs was founded on the marriage of the earl of Richmond with the princeſs Elizabeth; that therefore, before all things, that point was to be ſecured without which it would be to labour in vain, or at leaſt with great uncertainty. To that end they agreed, that they ſhould without loſs of time acquaint the counteſs of Richmond with their project, that ſhe might inform her ſon of it, and perſuade the queen-dowager, mother of the princeſs, to conſent to the marriage.

But as conferring with Margaret would have been very dangerous for the duke of Buckingham, conſidering the king's extreme jealouſy of the houſe of Somerſet, the biſhop told him, he had an old friend in the counteſs's ſervice, one Reginald Bray, who might ſafely be truſted with the ſecret. The duke approving that expedient, Bray was privately ſent for to Brecknock, and the project being imparted to him, the propoſing of it to his miſtreſs was left to his care. More eſpecially, he was charged to tell her, that the marriage of the earl her ſon was the baſis and foundation on which the whole project reſted.

As ſoon as Bray was gone to execute his commiſſion, the biſhop of Ely deſired the duke's leave to retire to his biſhopric. He was juſtly afraid of his life, in caſe the plot came to be diſcovered. It may be, he did not wholly depend upon the duke's ſincerity. But the duke gave him two invincible reaſons why he could not comply with his requeſt. The firſt was, that he ſhould be guilty of letting his priſoner eſcape, which alone would be ſufficient to inſpire the king with ſuſpicions. The ſecond, that in an undertaking of this nature, he could not proceed without his advice. The biſhop ſeemed to yield to theſe reaſons, but had by him ſtill ſtronger, to free himſelf from the impending danger, in caſe the affair was diſcovered. And therefore, as he was not ſo narrowly watched by his keepers, ſince his frequent converſation with the duke, he found means to eſcape, and retire to Ely;[q] from whence he fled into Flanders. Upon his arrival, he wrote to the duke to excuſe his eſcape, and withal endeavoured to convince him, it was much more in his power to promote the execution of their intended deſign, than whilſt he was priſoner. He conjured him likewiſe, to continue in his reſolution, and ſhewed him how he might carry on a private correſpondence with him.

Mean while the counteſs of Richmond being informed of what was projected in favour of the earl her ſon, ſent back her ſervant to the duke of Buckingham with her compliment of thanks; and withal let him know, ſhe was endeavouring to obtain the queen dowager's conſent to the marriage, and then would take the moſt proper meaſures, to ſend to the earl of Richmond.

Elizabeth Woodville widow of Edward IV. was ſtill in her ſanctuary at Weſtminſter with her five daughters, lamenting the death of her two ſons, and blaming herſelf for having been the occaſion, by her uneaſineſs to deliver the duke of York to his uncle. There had never been any particular friendſhip between that queen and the counteſs of Richmond. One was wife to a king of the houſe of York, and the other was of the family of Somerſet, ſworn enemies of the Yorkiſts. Wherefore the counteſs could not viſit the queen in her ſanctuary, without cauſing great ſuſpicion. To avoid this inconvenience, ſhe made uſe of one Lewis her phyſician,[r] and having communicated the whole affair to him, ordered him to go to London, and ſo manage as to ſee the queen, and inform her of what was in agitation. Above all, ſhe charged him to tell her, that all hope of ſucceſs depended upon the union of the two houſes of York and Lancaſter, by the marriage of the princeſs Elizabeth with the earl of Richmond.

Lewis being come to London, found no great difficulty, as a phyſician, to get admittance to the queen. He communicated to her what he had in charge, intimating it would be in her own power to be revenged of her mortal enemy, the murderer of her children, and dethrone the uſurper, provided ſhe would conſent to the marriage propoſed. The queen gladly liſtened to the overture. She charged the doctor to tell his miſtreſs ſhe approved of the project, and would ſo order it that all the king her huſband's friends ſhould join with the earl of Richmond. But ſhe added, ſhe wiſhed the earl would ſwear to marry Elizabeth, or in caſe ſhe happened to die, Cecily her younger ſiſter.

Matters being thus ſettled between the queen dowager, the counteſs of Richmond, and the duke of Buckingham, they endeavoured to engage in the plot their moſt truſty friends, who likewiſe drew in others[s]. The Engliſh were as favourably diſpoſed as could be wiſhed, by three principal reaſons. Firſt, becauſe of the people's univerſal hatred of the king, who had made himſelf extremely odious, as well by what he had done during his protectorſhip, as by his late crime, in putting his nephews to death, after robbing them of the crown. He had thereby loſt moſt of the friends of the houſe of York, who only wanted an opportunity to revenge the family of Edward IV. In the ſecond place, all the Lancaſtrians ſaw with pleaſure, a project tending to reſtore the houſe of Lancaſter to the throne, Laſtly, thoſe that without regarding the intereſt of the two factions, had only the good of the nation in view, could not but conſider as a great happineſs, the ſucceſs of an enterprize, which by uniting the two contending houſes, would put an end to the civil war wherewith the kingdom had been afflicted thirty years. Thus the Lancaſtrians, Yorkiſts, and even thoſe that ſtood neuter, were equally diſpoſed to concur to the downfall of the uſurper.

The duke of Buckingham being the author and head of the enterprize, it was his part to conduct it to a happy concluſion. For that purpoſe, he firſt ſecured ſome friends in Wales, where his power was great, who undertook to liſt ſoldiers privately, to enable him to bring ſuddenly and ſeaſonably an army into the field. Then he ſettled a correſpondence with ſome gentlemen of Dorſetſhire, Devonſhire, and Cornwal, who promiſed to raiſe forces, and receive the earl of Richmond at his arrival. His deſign was to join them himſelf, with his Welſhmen, that Richard might be the leſs able to oppoſe the earl's landing. At the ſame time, ſeveral lords and gentlemen were to riſe in other counties, that the king might be at a loſs where to march firſt. The marquis of Dorſet, who had lately quitted his ſanctuary,[t] ſir Richard Woodville his brother,[u] the biſhop of Exeter, ſir Edward Courtney his brother, and ſeveral other perſons of quality engaged in the plot.

Theſe meaſures being taken, the counteſs of Richmond ſent two expreſſes[w] to the earl her ſon, by different ways, to let him know what was reſolved in his favour, and how far the project was advanced. The two expreſſes arriving almoſt together, informed him of all the circumſtances of the plot and prayed him to repair into England without loſs of time, upon the aſſurance they gave him, that every thing was ready for his reception. They told him likewiſe that Dorſetſhire, Devonſhire, or Cornwall,[x] were the moſt convenient places to land, by reaſon of the meaſures taken with the people of thoſe parts.

The earl of Richmond was then at Vannes in Bretagne, where he had been ſeveral years really a priſoner, becauſe of the duke of Bretagne's engagements with Edward IV. but his confinement was not ſtrict, the duke contenting himſelf with narrowly watching him, in order to hinder his eſcape in caſe he attempted it: in other reſpects he enjoyed an honourable freedom. He heard with great joy that he was thought of in England. But when he came to conſider his preſent condition, and how little it was in his power to return into his own country ſo as to procure a welcome reception, he found it would be almoſt impoſſible to ſucceed in his enterprize without the duke of Bretagne's conſent and aſſiſtance; for unleſs that prince ſupplied him with money, troops, and ſhips, it was not practicable to take juſt meaſures to accompliſh his deſigns: beſides, the duke might have made him cloſe priſoner, by which means the whole affair would have miſcarried. So, perceiving he could not proceed without him, he reſolved to tell him the ſecret, and engage him, if poſſible, to aſſiſt him. He found the duke more ready to countenance him than he expected. The duke was not engaged with Richard as he had been with Edward his brother: beſides, the unjuſt and violent actions of the new king had rendered him odious to all the princes of Europe, and eſpecially to the Duke of Bretagne. Another thing likewiſe induced him to hearken for the earl's propoſals; he had pretenſions to the earldom of Richmond in England, formerly enjoyed by his anceſtors, and imagined the earl would readily promiſe to reſtore it, if by this means he arrived to the crown. It is pretended this was the principal article of their agreement, for which the duke very willingly engaged to ſupply him with men and ſhips. When the earl was ſure of the duke of Bretagne's aſſiſtance, he ſent expreſſes[y] to the counteſs his mother and the duke of Buckingham, to acquaint them that he hoped to be ready by the beginning of October, deſiring them to prepare all things by that time. This good news preſently put all the conſpirators in motion; every one repaired to the poſt aſſigned him, as well to raiſe forces as excite inſurrections: there was no time to looſe, good part of September being now paſt.

How careful ſoever the conſpirators had been to conceal themſelves, all theſe things could not be done, and Richard have no intelligence that ſome plot was contriving againſt him; but none could tell him what it was, or who were the authors. He was then at York, thinking of very different things, ſo ſecure was he in his own opinion. But theſe advices obliged him to leave the north, and approach the centre of the kingdom. At the ſame time he ordered his troops, which were diſperſed in ſeveral parts, to be ready to march at a moment's warning. Mean while he prepared very ſlowly, not imagining the danger ſo near. As the intelligence he had received made him uneaſiy, he ran over in his mind all the lords of the realm who could be diſſatisfied, or had ſufficient credit to incite inſurrections againſt him: he found none but the duke of Buckingham. He had angered him by diſappointing him with regard to the lands of Hereford, and knowing him perfectly, could not doubt that he was capable of any thing to be revenged: beſides, he knew him to be the only perſon in condition by his parts, his riches, and his intereſt, to form and execute great projects: his own experience would not ſuffer him to queſtion it. The biſhop of Ely's eſcape alſo ſerved to ſtrengthen his ſuſpicion. The duke of Buckingham muſt have known how odious that prelate was to him, and therefore his careleſſneſs in guarding ſuch a priſoner could not but be deemed a colluſion and conſequence of ſome ill deſign. Upon theſe ſuſpicions, which were but too well grounded, Richard reſolved to ſend for him to court, but the duke deſired to be excuſed, on pretence of ſome indiſpoſition. This refuſal confirmed the king in his belief, that what he had ſuſpected was but too true. Nevertheleſs, to be more fully ſatisfied, he ſent him poſitive orders to come to him, without alledging any excuſe. The duke perceiving diſſimulation was ineffectual, ſent him word, he would not expoſe his perſon to his mortal enemy, whom he neither loved nor would ſerve.

This was ſufficient to convince the king that the duke of Buckingham was the author of the commotions, which for ſome time had made him uneaſy. On the other hand, the duke perceiving that after ſuch a declaration there was no more ceremony to be uſed, drew together the forces which himſelf and friends had privately liſted in Wales, and began to march towards the weſtern counties[z], where he knew the earl of Richmond intended to land. There he was to be joined by thoſe who were gone before to prepare all things againſt the earl's arrival.

Richard was not a little ſurprized to hear that the duke was ſo ready. However, as he had taken ſome precautions to aſſemble his forces in caſe of neceſſity, he appointed the rendezvous at Leiceſter, where he repaired himſelf, with a reſolution to give his enemies battle before their number was increaſed. He would have found it very difficult however to prevent them, if an extraordinary and very unexpected accident had not hindered the duke from joining his friends, who were all ready to riſe in arms in the counties of Devon and Cornwall. The duke was advancing by long marches[a] to Gloceſter, where he deſigned to paſs the Severn: but at the ſame time the river was ſo ſwoln, that the country on both ſides was overflowed and great damage done by the waters. Never had ſo terrible an inundation been heard of in that country: it held ſix whole days, during which the duke's army could neither paſs the river, nor ſubſiſt on the other ſide where was nothing but deſolation[b]. In fine, the Welſh ſoldiers, tired with being expoſed to hunger, rains, and numberleſs hardſhips, returned to their homes, notwithſtanding all the duke's intreaties to the contrary[c]. The deſertion was ſo general, that there remained with the duke only one ſingle ſervant. Reduced to this ſad condition, he ſaw no other remedy than to conceal himſelf till he could take new meaſures. Unhappily for him, he choſe for his retreat the houſe of one Baniſter, who had been his ſervant, and to whom his father and himſelf had been very kind.

The king hearing of the diſperſion of the duke of Buckinghams's troops, iſſued out a proclamation againſt him and the marquis of Dorſet with ſome others of his adherents, or whom he ſuppoſed to be in league with him. But as the marquis had not yet appeared in arms, and ſo could not be ſtiled a rebel, he made uſe of another pretence to involve him in the ſentence. He ſaid, that having taken an oath at his coronation to puniſh vice and wickedneſs, he was obliged to puniſh the marquis of Dorſet, notorious for his debaucheries, who had ſeduced and raviſhed ſeveral virgins, been guilty of ſundry adulteries, and publicly kept Shore's wife. Then he promiſed a reward of one thouſand pounds ſterling, or a hundred pounds a year, to any perſon that ſhould bring the duke to juſtice; a thouſand marks, or one hundred marks a year, for the marquis; and ſo in proportion for the reſt that were named in the proclamation[d]. The villain Baniſter[e], not being able to reſiſt ſo ſtrong a temptation, betrayed his maſter to the ſheriff of Shropſhire[f], who cauſing the houſe to be ſurrounded by a company of armed men, ſeized the duke of Buckingham diſguiſed like a peaſant, and conducted him to Shrewſbury. The duke was deſirous to ſpeak with the king but could never obtain that favour. Some ſay he intended to kill him with a dagger which was found upon him after his death: but this is only conjecture. However it be, he was beheaded at Shrewſbury[g], without any legal proceſs, by the king's bare order. Thus, this lord, who had helped to take away the lives of the lord Haſtings, the earl of Rivers, and other priſoners at Pomfret, by an arbitary ſentence, periſhed himſelf in the ſame manner, contrary to all right, by the abſolute orders of him whom he had placed on the throne. On the other hand, we ſhall ſee preſently, that this very conſpiracy, formed by the duke of Buckingham, accomplice of all the king's ill actions whilſt he was but protector, proved the occaſion of that monarch's ruin. Is it poſſible not to perceive the direction of Providence in ſuch ſort of events!

Upon the firſt news of the diſperſion of the Welch army, the duke's friends, who expected him in the weſt, ready to take up arms the moment they ſhould hear of his paſſing the Severn, diſperſed themſelves. Some lurked among their friends, and others fled to ſanctuary. But the greateſt part embarked and ſailed to the earl of Richmond, perceiving there was no ſafety for them in the kingdom: the marquis of Dorſet was of this number.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, the earl of Richmond, imagining that all went there to his wiſh, ſailed from St. Malo's the 12th of October, with five thouſand men and forty ſhips, furniſhed by the duke of Bretange. But the fleet being diſperſed by a ſtorm, ſome of the ſhips were driven on the coaſt of France, others returned to Bretange. The ſhip in which was the earl of Richmond, reſiſting the ſeas better than the reſt, arrived after the ſtorm upon the coaſt of Cornwell[h], where he ſaw the ſhore crowded with troops, who made him a ſignal to approach: but happily for him he reſolved not to land till his fleet had rejoined him, expecting they would be ſoon at the rendezvous. Mean time, they ſent to enquire whether the troops he ſaw were friends or enemies: the commander anſwered, he was poſted there by the duke of Buckingham, to wait for the earl of Richmond, and favour his landing. But the perſon ſent by the earl eaſily perceived the contrary, and informed his maſter of it, who finding his deſign was diſcovered, put to ſea and arrived at a port in Normandy. The truth is, the troops he ſaw on the coaſt of Cornwall were the militia of the country, poſted there by Richard, with intent to ſurpprize his enemy by that artifice.

The earl of Richmond heard in Normandy of the duke of Buckingham's misfortune. As after that there was no more appearance of purſuing his enterprize without taking new the two contending houſes, was by far the more natural way to be revenged of Richard. I ſay to be revenged, for it is hard to believe, a man of his character ſhould act on this occaſion from a nobler motive.

Be this as it will, the duke and the biſhop having conſulted together how to accompliſh their deſigns, came to this concluſion: that all hope of ſucceſs was founded on the marriage of the earl of Richmond with the princeſs Elizabeth; that therefore, before all things, that point was to be ſecured without which it would be to labour in vain, or at leaſt with great uncertainty. To that end they agreed, that they ſhould without loſs of time acquaint the counteſs of Richmond with their project, that ſhe might inform her ſon of it, and perſuade the queen-dowager, mother of the princeſs, to conſent to the marriage.

But as conferring with Margaret would have been very dangerous for the duke of Buckingham, conſidering the king's extreme jealouſy of the houſe of Somerſet, the biſhop told him, he had an old friend in the counteſs's ſervice, one Reginald Bray, who might ſafely be truſted with the ſecret. The duke approving that expedient, Bray was privately ſent for to Brecknock, and the project being imparted to him, the propoſing of it to his miſtreſs was left to his care. More eſpecially, he was charged to tell her, that the marriage of the earl her ſon was the baſis and foundation on which the whole project reſted.

As ſoon as Bray was gone to execute his commiſſion, the biſhop of Ely deſired the duke's leave to retire to his biſhopric. He was juſtly afraid of his life, in caſe the plot came to be diſcovered. It may be, he did not wholly depend upon the duke's ſincerity. But the duke gave him two invincible reaſons why he could not comply with his requeſt. The firſt was, that he ſhould be guilty of letting his priſoner eſcape, which alone would be ſufficient to inſpire the king with ſuſpicions. The ſecond, that in an undertaking of this nature, he could not proceed without his advice. The biſhop ſeemed to yield to theſe reaſons, but had by him ſtill ſtronger, to free himſelf from the impending danger, in caſe the affair was diſcovered. And therefore, as he was not ſo narrowly watched by his keepers, ſince his frequent converſation with the duke, he found means to eſcape, and retire to Ely;[q] from whence he fled into Flanders. Upon his arrival, he wrote to the duke to excuſe his eſcape, and withal endeavoured to convince him, it was much more in his power to promote the execution of their intended deſign, than whilſt he was priſoner. He conjured him likewiſe, to continue in his reſolution, and ſhewed him how he might carry on a private correſpondence with him.

Mean while the counteſs of Richmond being informed of what was projected in favour of the earl her ſon, ſent back her ſervant to the duke of Buckingham with her compliment of thanks; and withal let him know, ſhe was endeavouring to obtain the queen dowager's conſent to the marriage, and then would take the moſt proper meaſures, to ſend to the earl of Richmond.

Elizabeth Woodville widow of Edward IV. was ſtill in her ſanctuary at Weſtminſter with her five daughters, lamenting the death of her two ſons, and blaming herſelf for having been the occaſion, by her uneaſineſs to deliver the duke of York to his uncle. There had never been any particular friendſhip between that queen and the counteſs of Richmond. One was wife to a king of the houſe of York, and the other was of the family of Somerſet, ſworn enemies of the Yorkiſts. Wherefore the counteſs could not viſit the queen in her ſanctuary, without cauſing great ſuſpicion. To avoid this inconvenience, ſhe made uſe of one Lewis her phyſician,[r] and having communicated the whole affair to him, ordered him to go to London, and ſo manage as to ſee the queen, and inform her of what was in agitation. Above all, ſhe charged him to tell her, that all hope of ſucceſs depended upon the union of the two houſes of York and Lancaſter, by the marriage of the princeſs Elizabeth with the earl of Richmond.

Lewis being come to London, found no great difficulty, as a phyſician, to get admittance to the queen. He communicated to her what he had in charge, intimating it would be in her own power to be revenged of her mortal enemy, the murderer of her children, and dethrone the uſurper, provided ſhe would conſent to the marriage propoſed. The queen gladly liſtened to the overture. She charged the doctor to tell his miſtreſs ſhe approved of the project, and would ſo order it that all the king her huſband's friends ſhould join with the earl of Richmond. But ſhe added, ſhe wiſhed the earl would ſwear to marry Elizabeth, or in caſe ſhe happened to die, Cecily her younger ſiſter.

Matters being thus ſettled between the queen dowager, the counteſs of Richmond, and the duke of Buckingham, they endeavoured to engage in the plot their moſt truſty friends, who likewiſe drew in others[s]. The Engliſh were as favourably diſpoſed as could be wiſhed, by three principal reaſons. Firſt, becauſe of the people's univerſal hatred of the king, who had made himſelf extremely odious, as well by what he had done during his protectorſhip, as by his late crime, in putting his nephews to death, after robbing them of the crown. He had thereby loſt moſt of the friends of the houſe of York, who only wanted an opportunity to revenge the family of Edward IV. In the ſecond place, all the Lancaſtrians ſaw with pleaſure, a project tending to reſtore the houſe of Lancaſter to the throne. Laſtly, thoſe that without regarding the intereſt of the two factions, had only the good of the nation in view, could not but conſider as a great happineſs, the ſucceſs of an enterprize, which by uniting the two contending houſes, would put an end to the civil war wherewith the kingdom had been afflicted thirty years. Thus the Lancaſtrians, Yorkiſts, and even thoſe that ſtood neuter, were equally diſpoſed to concur to the downfall of the uſurper.

The duke of Buckingham being the author and head of the enterprize, it was his part to conduct it to a happy concluſion. For that purpoſe, he firſt ſecured ſome friends in Wales, where his power was great, who undertook to liſt ſoldiers privately, to enable him to bring ſuddenly and ſeaſonably an army into the field. Then he ſettled a correſpondence with ſome gentlemen of Dorſetſhire, Devonſhire, and Cornwal, who promiſed to raiſe forces, and receive the earl of Richmond at his arrival. His deſign was to join them himſelf, with his Welſhmen, that Richard might be the leſs able to oppoſe the earl's landing. At the ſame time, ſeveral lords and gentlemen were to riſe in other counties, that the king might be at a loſs where to march firſt. The marquis of Dorſet, who had lately quitted his ſanctuary,[t] ſir Richard Woodville his brother,[u] the biſhop of Exeter, ſir Edward Courtney his brother, and ſeveral other perſons of quality engaged in the plot.

Theſe meaſures being taken, the counteſs of Richmond ſent two expreſſes[w] to the earl her ſon, by different ways, to let him know what was reſolved in his favour, and how far the project was advanced. The two expreſſes arriving almoſt together, informed him of all the circumſtances of the plot and prayed him to repair into England without loſs of time, upon the aſſurance they gave him, that every thing was ready for his reception. They told him likewiſe that Dorſetſhire, Devonſhire, or Cornwall,[x] were the moſt convenient places to land, by reaſon of the meaſures taken with the people of thoſe parts.

The earl of Richmond was then at Vannes in Bretagne, where he had been ſeveral years really a priſoner, becauſe of the duke of Bretagne's engagements with Edward IV. but his confinement was not ſtrict, the duke contenting himſelf with narrowly watching him, in order to hinder his eſcape in caſe he attempted it: in other reſpects he enjoyed an honourable freedom. He heard with great joy that he was thought of in England. But when he came to conſider his preſent condition, and how little it was in his power to return into his own country ſo as to procure a welcome reception, he found it would be almoſt impoſſible to ſucceed in his enterprize without the duke of Bretagne's conſent and aſſiſtance; for unleſs that prince ſupplied him with money, troops, and ſhips, it was not practicable to take juſt meaſures to accompliſh his deſigns: beſides, the duke might have made him cloſe priſoner, by which means the whole affair would have miſcarried. So, perceiving he could not proceed without him, he reſolved to tell him the ſecret, and engage him, if poſſible, to aſſiſt him. He found the duke more ready to countenance him than he expected. The duke was not engaged with Richard as he had been with Edward his brother: beſides, the unjuſt and violent actions of the new king had rendered him odious to all the princes of Europe, and eſpecially to the Duke of Bretagne. Another thing likewiſe induced him to hearken for the earl's propoſals; he had pretenſions to the earldom of Richmond in England, formerly enjoyed by his anceſtors, and imagined the earl would readily promiſe to reſtore it, if by this means he arrived to the crown. It is pretended this was the principal article of their agreement, for which the duke very willingly engaged to ſupply him with men and ſhips. When the earl was ſure of the duke of Bretagne's aſſiſtance, he ſent expreſſes[y] to the counteſs his mother and the duke of Buckingham, to acquaint them that he hoped to be ready by the beginning of October, deſiring them to prepare all things by that time. This good news preſently put all the conſpirators in motion; every one repaired to the poſt aſſigned him, as well to raiſe forces as excite inſurrections: there was no time to looſe, good part of September being now paſt.

How careful ſoever the conſpirators had been to conceal themſelves, all theſe things could not be done, and Richard have no intelligence that ſome plot was contriving againſt him; but none could tell him what it was, or who were the authors. He was then at York, thinking of very different things, ſo ſecure was he in his own opinion. But theſe advices obliged him to leave the north, and approach the centre of the kingdom. At the ſame time he ordered his troops, which were diſperſed in ſeveral parts, to be ready to march at a moment's warning. Mean while he prepared very ſlowly, not imagining the danger ſo near. As the intelligence he had received made him uneaſiy, he ran over in his mind all the lords of the realm who could be diſſatisfied, or had ſufficient credit to incite inſurrections againſt him: he found none but the duke of Buckingham. He had angered him by diſappointing him with regard to the lands of Hereford, and knowing him perfectly, could not doubt that he was capable of any thing to be revenged: beſides, he knew him to be the only perſon in condition by his parts, his riches, and his intereſt, to form and execute great projects: his own experience would not ſuffer him to queſtion it. The biſhop of Ely's eſcape alſo ſerved to ſtrengthen his ſuſpicion. The duke of Buckingham muſt have known how odious that prelate was to him, and therefore his careleſſneſs in guarding ſuch a priſoner could not but be deemed a colluſion and conſequence of ſome ill deſign. Upon theſe ſuſpicions, which were but too well grounded, Richard reſolved to ſend for him to court, but the duke deſired to be excuſed, on pretence of ſome indiſpoſition. This refuſal confirmed the king in his belief, that what he had ſuſpected was but too true. Nevertheleſs, to be more fully ſatisfied, he ſent him poſitive orders to come to him, without alledging any excuſe. The duke perceiving diſſimulation was ineffectual, ſent him word, he would not expoſe his perſon to his mortal enemy, whom he neither loved nor would ſerve.

This was ſufficient to convince the king that the duke of Buckingham was the author of the commotions, which for ſome time had made him uneaſy. On the other hand, the duke perceiving that after ſuch a declaration there was no more ceremony to be uſed, drew together the forces which himſelf and friends had privately liſted in Wales, and began to march towards the weſtern counties[z], where he knew the earl of Richmond intended to land. There he was to be joined by thoſe who were gone before to prepare all things againſt the earl's arrival.

Richard was not a little ſurprized to hear that the duke was ſo ready. However, as he had taken ſome precautions to aſſemble his forces in caſe of neceſſity, he appointed the rendezvous at Leiceſter, where he repaired himſelf, with a reſolution to give his enemies battle before their number was increaſed. He would have found it very difficult however to prevent them, if an extraordinary and very unexpected accident had not hindered the duke from joining his friends, who were all ready to riſe in arms in the counties of Devon and Cornwall. The duke was advancing by long marches[a] to Gloceſter, where he deſigned to paſs the Severn: but at the ſame time the river was ſo ſwoln, that the country on both ſides was overflowed and great damage done by the waters. Never had ſo terrible an inundation been heard of in that country: it held ſix whole days, during which the duke's army could neither paſs the river, nor ſubſiſt on the other ſide where was nothing but deſolation[b]. In fine, the Welſh ſoldiers, tired with being expoſed to hunger, rains, and numberleſs hardſhips, returned to their homes, notwithſtanding all the duke's intreaties to the contrary[c]. The deſertion was ſo general, that there remained with the duke only one ſingle ſervant. Reduced to this ſad condition, he ſaw no other remedy than to conceal himſelf till he could take new meaſures. Unhappily for him, he choſe for his retreat the houſe of one Baniſter, who had been his ſervant, and to whom his father and himſelf had been very kind.

The king hearing of the diſperſion of the duke of Buckinghams's troops, iſſued out a proclamation againſt him and the marquis of Dorſet with ſome others of his adherents, or whom he ſuppoſed to be in league with him. But as the marquis had not yet appeared in arms, and ſo could not be ſtiled a rebel, he made uſe of another pretence to involve him in the ſentence. He ſaid, that having taken an oath at his coronation to puniſh vice and wickedneſs, he was obliged to puniſh the marquis of Dorſet, notorious for his debaucheries, who had ſeduced and raviſhed ſeveral virgins, been guilty of ſundry adulteries, and publicly kept Shore's wife. Then he promiſed a reward of one thouſand pounds ſterling, or a hundred pounds a year, to any perſon that ſhould bring the duke to juſtice; a thouſand marks, or one hundred marks a year, for the marquis; and ſo in proportion for the reſt that were named in the proclamation[d]. The villain Baniſter[e], not being able to reſiſt ſo ſtrong a temptation, betrayed his maſter to the ſheriff of Shropſhire[f], who cauſing the houſe to be ſurrounded by a company of armed men, ſeized the duke of Buckingham diſguiſed like a peaſant, and conducted him to Shrewſbury. The duke was deſirous to ſpeak with the king but could never obtain that favour. Some ſay he intended to kill him with a dagger which was found upon him after his death: but this is only conjecture. However it be, he was beheaded at Shrewſbury[g], without any legal proceſs, by the king's bare order. Thus, this lord, who had helped to take away the lives of the lord Haſtings, the earl of Rivers, and other priſoners at Pomfret, by an arbitary ſentence, periſhed himſelf in the ſame manner, contrary to all right, by the abſolute orders of him whom he had placed on the throne. On the other hand, we ſhall ſee preſently, that this very conſpiracy, formed by the duke of Buckingham, accomplice of all the king's ill actions whilſt he was but protector, proved the occaſion of that monarch's ruin. Is it poſſible not to perceive the direction of Providence in ſuch ſort of events!

Upon the firſt news of the diſperſion of the Welch army, the duke's friends, who expected him in the weſt, ready to take up arms the moment they ſhould hear of his paſſing the Severn, diſperſed themſelves. Some lurked among their friends, and others fled to ſanctuary. But the greateſt part embarked and ſailed to the earl of Richmond, perceiving there was no ſafety for them in the kingdom: the marquis of Dorſet was of this number.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, the earl of Richmond, imagining that all went there to his wiſh, ſailed from St. Malo's the 12th of October, with five thouſand men and forty ſhips, furniſhed by the duke of Bretange. But the fleet being diſperſed by a ſtorm, ſome of the ſhips were driven on the coaſt of France, others returned to Bretange. The ſhip in which was the earl of Richmond, reſiſting the ſeas better than the reſt, arrived after the ſtorm upon the coaſt of Cornwell[h], where he ſaw the ſhore crowded with troops, who made him a ſignal to approach: but happily for him he reſolved not to land till his fleet had rejoined him, expecting they would be ſoon at the rendezvous. Mean time, they ſent to enquire whether the troops he ſaw were friends or enemies: the commander anſwered, he was poſted there by the duke of Buckingham, to wait for the earl of Richmond, and favour his landing. But the perſon ſent by the earl eaſily perceived the contrary, and informed his maſter of it, who finding his deſign was diſcovered, put to ſea and arrived at a port in Normandy. The truth is, the troops he ſaw on the coaſt of Cornwall were the militia of the country, poſted there by Richard, with intent to ſurpprize his enemy by that artifice.

The earl of Richmond heard in Normandy of the duke of Buckingham's misfortune. As after that there was no more appearance of purſuing his enterprize without taking new meaſures, he returned to Bretange, where he found the marquis of Dorſet, with the reſt that had made their eſcapes out of England. Though this deſign ſeemed entirely blaſted, he deſpaired not of better ſucceſs another time. The fugitives told him, Richard was extremely hated in England, which he took for a good omen. On the other hand, the duke of Bretange promiſed him to continue his aſſiſtance. So, reſolving to make a freſh attempt, he ſolemnly ſwore on Chriſtmas-day, in the cathedral of Rennes, that he would marry the princeſs Elizabath, daughter of Edward IV. or, in caſe ſhe died, Cecily her youngeſt ſiſter. Then all the Engliſh there preſent ſwore allegiance to him, conſidering him as king of England by right, though he was not in fact. From thenceforward the ſtrict enquiry made in England after thoſe that were concerned in the plot, forced great numbers to retire into Bretange, ſo that the reſort of the Engliſh was very great for ſome time.

Mean-while, Richard having freed himſelf from this danger more happily than he had reaſon to expect, ordered ſeveral perſons to be ſeized, ſome of whom were immediately ſacrificed to his vengeance[i]. Of this number was ſir Thomas St. Leger his brother-in-law, who married his ſiſter Anne, widow of the duke of Exeter. In order to avoid the uſual formalities of the courts of juſtice, he commiſſioned ſir Ralph Aſhton to exerciſe the office of vice-conſtable, with ſo extenſive a power that he could condemn and execute upon the ſpot all perſons whatever, guilty or ſuſpected of high-treaſon, without having any regard to any appeal[k].

By virtue of this commiſſion, Aſhton, who was probably a man after the king's own heart, came into the weſtern counties, where he ſignalized his zeal by the bloody executions of ſuch as were found guilty, or only ſuſpected of having favoured the conſpirators. Thus were ſpent the firſt ſix months of the reign of Richard III. This ambitious prince was no ſooner on the throne but he had occaſion to perceive with what difficulties he ſhould preſerve a crown ſo ardently deſired, and by ſo many unlawful practices procured.

[1484] In January this year, the king ſummoned his parliament[l]. This was done at a very ſeaſonable juncture. The duke of Buckingham's conſpiracy ſeeming entirely ſtifled by the death of that lord and the retreat of the earl of Richmond, there was not in the kingdom any perſon in condition to oppoſe him. So the parliament, conſiſting no doubt of repreſentatives devoted to the king, declared Edward IV's iſſue illegitimate[m], and confirmed Richard's irregular election, with his pretended right to the crown. This act was abſolutely neceſſary to the king's ſecurity. Beſides, the parliamement thereby avoided the trouble of enquiring after the fate of Edward V. whom all England had for ſome months acknowledged as king.

Then an act of attainder was paſſed againſt Henry earl of Richmond and all his adherents, by virtue whereof all the eſtates were forfeited to the king[n]. By this act, which declared all thoſe rebels and traitors that were concerned in the duke of Buckingham's and the earl of Richmond's conſpiracy, all the late executions were in ſome meaſure juſtified, becauſe ſuch as had ſuffered were conſidered as guilty of the crime condemned by the act[o]. By good fortune none of them diſcovered that the counteſs of Richmond was concerned in the plot; whether ſhe had truſted but few perſons, or her confidents had eſcaped into Bretange. However, Richard thinking it hardly poſſible for the earl of Richmond to form an enterprize without his mother's, knowledge, ordered the lord Stanley her huſband to keep her confined, to prevent her from any future attempts. He had then a perfect confidence in the lord Stanley, whom he had made high-conſtable, after Aſhton as vice-conſtable had been inſtrumental in his deſigns. It his likely he did not think the lord Stanley a proper perſon to exerciſe the ſeverities for which he had commiſſioned Aſhton, and no doubt that was the reaſon why he did not make him high-conſtable till every thing relating to that commiſſion was finiſhed.

Richard had reaſon to believe, that after all the rigours exerciſed upon the parties concerned, the conſpiracy was entirely cruſhed[p]. But Thomas Hutton, who was returned from his embaſſy to Bretange, told him the ſame plot ſtill ſubſiſted, and the duke of Bretagne had promiſed the earl of Richmond the continuance of his aſſiſtance. He gave him the names of thoſe conſpirators who were with the earl, and informed him they had frequent conferrences together, and were very buſy: It was eaſy to conclude from thence, that the earl of Richmond had not loſt all hopes, and had ſtill in England correſpondencies whereon he founded the execution of his deſigns. And yet ſince the death of the duke of Buckingham, the flight of the marquis of Dorſet, and the execution of ſeveral of the ſame party, Richard ſaw no one in the kingdom that ſeemed to be able to withſtand him. So, concluding the danger muſt come from abroad, he reſolved to take all poſſible precautions to hinder his enemies from being aſſiſted by foreign princes.

Laſt year he confirmed the alliance of England with Caſtile; and in June this year did the ſame thing with regard to Portugal. Probably the whole ſtorm was to come from theſe two quarters, ſince the king of Portugal and the queen of Caſtile, were both deſended from Philippa and Catherine, daughters of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, and conſequently might have pretended to the crown of England. Mean-while, the readineſs wherewith they had renewed their alliance with England, ſuffered not the king to ſuſpect them of having any ſuch thought.

Maximilian, archduke of Auſtria, who governed the Low-Countries in the name of his ſon Philip, being ſon of Leonora of Portugal, grand-daughter of Philippa of Lancaſter, might have alſo claimed the crown of England, or aſſiſted the earl of Richmond. This conſideration made Richard reſolve to ſend him embaſſadors under colour of renewing the truce of commerce between England and the Low-Countries. But it is likely, the embaſſadors had inſtructions to ſound whether there was any project at that court with reſpect to England.

Though Richard did not ſeem to have occaſion to fear any thing from France, under a minority diſturbed with inteſtine diviſions, he had taken care however to ſend embaſſadors to Charles VIII. to deſire the prolongation, or at leaſt confirmation of the truce.

There remained only Bretange and Scotland that could give him any uneaſineſs. He did not queſtion that the duke of Bretange had already aſſiſted, and was ſtill inclined to aſſiſt the earl of Richmond. For that reaſon he thought nothing ſhould be ſpared to gain that prince to his intereſt.

Francis II. duke of Bretange, being old and infirm, was entirely governed by Peter Landais his treaſurer, and committed to him the ſole management of his affairs. This favourite, who was the ſon of a taylor, uſed his power ſo inſolently, that he drew upon himſelf the hatred of all the Bretons. This very year 1484, the great men combining together againſt him, would have ſeized him in the duke's palace but miſſing their aim, ſaw themſelves expoſed to the favourite's vengeance, who cauſed them to be declared guilty of high-treaſon. Mean-while, as the whole country was againſt him he believed it proper to ſupport himſelf by ſome foreign aid. To that end he ſent in his maſter's name embaſſadors to Richard, on pretence of making a truce with him, which was accordingly concluded in June at Pomfret, where the king then was, and which was to laſt till the 24th of April following.

But this was not the only commiſſion theſe ambaſſadors were charged with. There are two records in the collection of the Public Acts, whereby it appears, that Richard had promiſed to ſend the duke of Bretagne an aid of a thouſand archers. Now this could be only for the above-mentioned occaſion, ſince the duke of Bretagne had then no war upon his hands. As the duke did nothing of himſelf, very likely, to obtain this aid Landais had put the king in hopes, he would deliver up the earl of Richmond. And indeed the ſequel plainly ſhewed, he had entered into ſome ſuch engagement. Thus Richard thought himſelf ſo ſecure from Bretagne, that inſtead of fearing the duke would aſſiſt the earl of Richmond, he flattered himſelf with the hopes of having his enemy very ſoon in his power.

As he might alſo be apprehenſive that the king of Scotland, deſcended from a princeſs of the houſe of Somerſet, would countenance the mal-contents in placing the earl of Richmond on the throne of England, he believed he ought to ſecure himſelf too from that quarter. To that end, he negociated with James III. a truce concluded in September this year, and which was to laſt from the 29th of that month, to the ſame day of the year 1487. At the ſame time he concluded the marriage of his neice Ann de la Pole, daughter of his ſiſter Elizabeth and the duke of Suffolk, with the duke of Rothſay, the king of Scotland's eldeſt ſon.

All theſe precautions appeared ſo juſt, that he ſeemed to be ſcreened from all danger. However, to rob the earl of Richmond of all hopes of accompliſhing his deſigns, the prince of Wales, his ſon, dying in April this year[q], he declared his nephew the earl of Lincoln his preſumptive heir, intending to have the declaration ratified by the parliament. The earl of Lincoln was ſon of Elizabeth his ſiſter[r], and brother of Ann, who was to marry the prince of Scotland.

Moreover, not to neglect any thing that might give his enemies an advantage, he ſent an ambaſſador of obedience to pope Innocent VIII. lately elected to the papal throne. He had omitted this compliment to Sixtus IV. Innocent's predeceſſor, as appears in the collection of the public acts. But his fear of incenſing the pope, and affording ſome pretence to the mal-contents in the kingdom, and particularly the clergy, made him diſpatch his embaſſadors to Rome.

Shortly after, he had the ſatisfaction to ſee that Charles VIII. king of France deſired a ſafe-conduct for embaſſadors he intended to ſend to him. This very thing ſeemed to concur in his favour. Mean while, the earl of Richmond was ſtill full of life; and ſo long as that prince was out of his power, he could not think himſelf thoroughly fixed on the throne. This was the chief, or rather the ſole cauſe of all his trouble and care.

The truce with Bretagne being to laſt but till the 24th of April 1485, Richard took occaſion from thence to ſend embaſſadors to the duke to cauſe it to be prolonged. That was the pretence of the embaſſy. But the embaſſadors had orders to treat of another more important affair with Landais, prime-miniſter and abſolute maſter of the duke, who was fallen into a kind of lethargy, which rendered him unfit for public affairs. And that was to perſuade this miniſter to deliver up the earl of Richmond.

Landais had not wanted the fore-mentioned thouſand archers. It was therefore neceſſary, in order to obtain what the king deſired, to make a new treaty which might be ſo advantageous to the duke and the favourite, as to cauſe them to overlook all their ſcruples upon that ſubject. As for the duke, Argentré affirms, he ſaw among the records of Bretagne, Richard the third's letters patent, whereby he gave to duke Francis the earldom of Richmond with all its dependencies, as enjoyed by his anceſtors, with the ſole reſervation of its reverſion to the crown in caſe the duke died without iſſue. With reſpect to Landais, as the negociation was more ſecret, it is not well known what reward he expected for his intended ſervice. Thus much is certain, Richard made him very advantageous offers. But as he was a man not to be ſatisfied with bare promiſes, there was often occaſion to ſend expreſſes to the king. Theſe delays, which, as Argentré poſitively affirms, were upon the miniſter's account, proved the earl of Richmond's ſecurity. Though he was then in Bretagne, he was entirely ignorant of what paſſed at the duke's court. But the biſhop of Ely, who though abſent had good ſpies about Richard, being informed that the biſhop of Leon, embaſſador of Bretagne, was treating very privately with the king, warned the earl of Richmond that he was not ſafe in the duke of Bretagne's dominions. This advice coming from ſo good a hand, put the earl upon ſeriouſly thinking of freeing himſelf from the impending danger. As he knew Landais to be a perſon capable of committing the vileſt actions, he reſolved to retire into France, and for that purpoſe ſent privately to king Charles for a paſſport[s], which was readily granted him. Mean while, informed as he was of Landais's ill deſigns, he did not queſtion that he had ordered him to be narrowly watched. So the difficulty of eſcaping was not ſmall, eſpecially as he was ſurrounded with a great number of Engliſh, in reſpect of whom it was very hard to conceal the ſecret, and very dangerous to reveal it. To remedy this inconvenience, the duke of Bretagne being at that time recovered of his illneſs, the earl took occaſion to ſend the principal lords of his retinue to congratulate him upon it[t], ordering them to take with them all their ſervants, under colour of doing him the more honour. His aim was not only to be more alone at Vannes, but chiefly to remove from his keepers all ſuſpicion of his deſiring to eſcape, whilſt he had many hoſtages at the duke's court. Accordingly, this artifice ſucceeded to his wiſh, ſo that two days after he departed from Vannes in diſguiſe, attended by five perſons only. As ſoon as he was out of the town he left the great road, and riding acroſs the fields and through by-ways, without ſtopping any where, ſafely arrived at Angers, capital of Anjou. This ſpeed was abſolutely neceſſary; for otherwiſe he would have been infallibly taken. Thoſe who were charged to watch him, hearing of his eſcape, purſued him ſo cloſely, that they came upon the borders of Bretagne but one hour after him. In a few days the duke being informed that the earl was retired under an apprehenſion of ill treatment, ſeemed very angry with Landais for giving him occaſion to fear, not knowing doubtleſs what his favourite was negociating with the king of England. Then he gave all the Engliſh in his dominions leave to go to the earl with his compliments and offers of ſervice. The earl of Richmond received theſe civilities with ſigns of the utmoſt gratitude, and deſired the duke's meſſenger to tell him, he would have all his favours in everlaſting remembrance. Thus the earl of Richmond eſcaped, as it were miraculouſly, out of Richard's ſnares. This was the ſecond time he had been thus happily delivered. The Engliſh belonging to his retinue, thought themſelves no leſs fortunate than he, to be freed by the duke's generoſity from his unworthy miniſter, who not long after atoned on a gibbet for all the ill actions his avarice had prompted him to commit.

The earl of Richmond making but a ſhort ſtay at Angers, went to Charles VIII. then at Langeais, who received him very civilly. However, as the court of France was not yet free from troubles, it was no favourable juncture for the earl to procure the aſſiſtance he could no longer expect from the duke of Bretagne. Nevertheleſs, as the young king ſeemed well inclined to him, he deſpaired not to obtain ſome aid of that prince, when the diſturbances at his court were appeaſed.

Whilſt his affairs were in this ſtate of uncertainty, he ſaw the earl of Oxford[u] arrive, whom king Edward IV. had confined in the caſtle of Hammes in Picardy. This lord who had been one of the principal friends of the houſe of Lancaſter, hearing in priſon that the earl of Richmond pretended to the crown, had wrought ſo effectually upon the governor of Hammes[w], that he had perſuaded him to releaſe him and declare for the earl: he even brought him along with him to ſalute that prince, and offer him his ſervice. The advantage of having the earl of Oxford in his party, was very beneficial to the earl of Richmond in England. Several other lords privately ſent him word that he might depend upon their aſſiſtance, when they ſhould ſee a proper ſeaſon to declare againſt Richard.

Mean while, the king had daily notice that ſomething was contriving againſt him in favour of the earl of Richmond; but could not diſcover the authors of the plot, what ſpies ſoever he employed. Beſides, he knew no Engliſh lord powerful enough, as he thought, to form or execute an enterprize of that nature. The lord Stanley was the only perſon he could miſtruſt, becauſe he was huſband to the counteſs of Richmond. That alone rendered him ſuſpected, though otherwiſe he had no proof againſt him. So, to ſecure himſelf from that ſide. Stanley deſiring permiſſion to retire upon his own eſtate, he required him to leave his ſon[x] at court as a ſort of hoſtage. Indeed his ſuſpicions were but too juſt, ſince that very lord proved afterwards the principal inſtrument of his ruin.

Richard knew he was not beloved in England. On the other hand, he knew there were certain motions among the people, which, though ſecret, could not but be dangerous. However, he could not prevent the miſchief he dreaded, without knowing wherein conſiſted the plots of his enemies, and the principal authors: upon this therefore he laid out all his pains. At length, by planting ſpies in the country, he came to find, that the projects in favour of the earl of Richmond were founded upon his promiſe to marry the princeſs Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of Edward IV. This diſcovery made him perceive, the Yorkiſts were not far from an union with the Lancaſtrians, ſince they conſented to the marriage. It was manifeſt that ſuch an union could not but occaſion his ruin, ſince in that caſe he would have only a few friends of his houſe to rely on, all the reſt declaring for his brother's family. Finding therefore that the plot which was contriving againſt him, reſted upon a more ſolid foundation than he had imagined, he applied himſelf wholly to break the earl of Richmond's meaſures, by preventing the fatal marriage. He found no better way to accompliſh his ends, than to marry himſelf the princeſs deſigned for his enemy. But the execution of ſuch a project was clogged with ſeveral difficulties, which to a prince leſs ſcrupulous than himſelf, would have appeared inſuperable. The firſt was, he had a wife already, whoſe conſtitution afforded no ſigns of her leaving this world. But he deſpaired not to ſurmount that obſtacle, either by a divorſe, or ſome other leſs lawful means. The ſecond difficulty was, to draw Elizabeth out of the ſanctuary at Weſtminſter, where ſhe was with the queen her mother. Beſides, it was no eaſy taſk to perſuade the queen dowager to give her daughter to the murderer of her ſons. Laſtly, the pope's diſpenſation to marry his neice muſt be obtained. But this obſtacle ſeemed inconſiderable in compariſon of the others, well knowing it was not impracticable to adjuſt that affair with the court of Rome.

To begin the execution of this ſtrange project, he ſent ſeveral perſons to the queen dowager, to inſinuate to her, that he wiſhed to live in friendſhip with her, and to ſhew her marks of his good will: that he confeſſed he had dealt too rigorouſly with her; but to repair in ſome meaſure the injury he had done her, he intended to aſſign her an honourable penſion, and give her two brothers ſuch poſts as they ſhould have reaſon to be ſatisfied with. Moreover, he would take care of her daughters, and help them to marriages ſuitable to their quality. But as the queen would hardly be induced to credit his promiſes, after having been ſo cruelly deceived, the perſons he employed hinted to her, that this alteration proceeded from the death of the prince of Wales. That the king being now childleſs, and without hopes of having any iſſue, his intereſts were no longer diſtinct from thoſe of his brother's family; and therefore he could do nothing more advantageous to himſelf and his houſe, than to marry his neices into the moſt conſiderable families in England. In fine, ſhe was told, the king's deſign was, that after his death, the princeſs Elizabeth ſhould aſcend the throne; what he had done in favour of the earl of Lincoln his nephew being eaſily revokable, ſince it had not yet paſſed into an act of parliament.

Theſe laſt inſinuations made deep impreſſion in the queen's mind. Her intereſt made her imagine, what was ſaid to be very probable. On the other hand, ſhe was heartily tired of her ſanctuary, which was properly a priſon, from whence ſhe could not ſtir without being liable to greater miſchiefs. She had an extreme love for her brothers, as ſhe had plainly ſhewn in the life-time of the king her huſband; and the hopes Richard gave her concerning them, were very pleaſing to her. In fine, ſhe conſidered that the plot in favour of the earl of Richmond having miſcarried by the duke of Buckingham's death, ſhe could expect for herſelf and daughters only a ſtill more rigorous fate, if by her denial ſhe ſhould farther incenſe the king. Theſe conſiderations cauſing her to forget the grievous outrages received from that prince, ſhe was ſo exceſſively blind, as to put her five daughters into his hands. Moreover, ſhe wrote to the marquis of Dorſet her brother, to adviſe him to relinquiſh the earl of Richmond and throw himſelf into the king's arms. The marquis, as inconſiderate and no leſs ambitious than the queen his ſiſter, flattering himſelf with the hopes of honours and perferments, privately withdrew from Paris, in order to paſs into England. But the earl of Richmond cauſed him to be purſued with ſuch diligence, that he was brought back to Paris, and, by ſtrong reaſons, perſuaded to ſtay with the earl.

As ſoon as Richard had his neices in his power, he thought of means to execute another part of his project: and that was to be rid of his queen, in order to marry his neice. The hiſtorians that ſpeak moſt favourably of his conduct ſay, he made the queen die with vexation, by ſhewing an averſion for her which ſhe did not deſerve, and by grievouſly mortifying her every day. Others ſpeak plainer, and affirm, he haſtened her death by poiſon. Some add, he privately acquainted the archbiſhop of York with certain ſecret infirmities of the queen, which rendered her very diſagreeable to him. This was on purpoſe that the archbiſhop might tell her again, which ſhe thought would cauſe her to languiſh away, and ſhorten her days. It is ſaid farther, that the archbiſhop, after hearing the king's diſcourſe, told ſome of his friends the queen had not long to live: and indeed, ſhe died preſently after. Her fate would have been more worthy of pity, if her death had not been obſerved to be a manifeſt judgment upon her, for marrying the murderer of the prince of Wales her firſt huſband, ſon of Henry VI. Richard ſhewed an extraordinary ſorrow for his loſs, and made a pompous funeral for his deceaſed queen. But this feigned grief was not capable of undeceiving the people, who openly accuſed him of murdering his queen[y], as he had done his nephews.

Notwithſtanding the extreme ſorrow he expreſſed in public, the queen was no ſooner in her grave, but he had the aſſurance to make his addreſſes to the princeſs Elizabeth, and offer her marriage. But ſhe ſo anſwered him, as ſhewed her abhorrence of ſuch an union, and deſired him never to mention it more[z]. Richard being ſenſible it was no proper ſeaſon to uſe violence, was ſatisfied for the preſent with this firſt ſtep, till time ſhould furniſh him with a more favourable opportunity to preſs the execution of his project. Mean while, as he daily became more odious, many lords and gentlemen went over and offered their ſervice to the earl of Richmond. Others took the ſame courſe, to avoid the perſecutions of that bloody prince, if unhappily he came to ſuſpect them. Thoſe that remained in the kingdom where no better affected, and waited only a favourable opportunity to declare againſt him.

Richard hearing that the earl of Oxford and the governor of Hammes were gone to the earl of Richmond, ſent orders to the governor of Calais to beſiege that caſtle, and reduce it to his obedience. The order was ſo readily executed that the earl of Oxford, who was marching to relieve that place, arrived not in the neighbourhood till after that capitulation[a]. However, he reaped this advantage by it, that he brought away the garriſon for the earl of Richmond.

[1485] After the earl of Richmond's attempt, Richard had fitted out a ſquadron of ſhips to oppoſe his paſſage, in caſe he endeavoured to make another deſcent. But the beginning of this year the truce with Bretagne being prolonged for ſeven years, and France ſhewed no great willingneſs to aſſiſt his enemy, he believed he might ſave the charge of a fleet, which he now conſidered as uſeleſs. Accordingly the ſhips were unrigged and laid up in the ſpring.

This proceeding greatly encouraging the earl of Richmond, he earneſtly ſolicited the court of France for ſome aid. King Charles's miniſters at length ſeriouſly conſidering his requeſt, believed it could not but be advantageous to France to cheriſh the troubles in England. It was ſolely with this view, that they promiſed the earl an aid of two thouſand men, with ſhips to tranſport them, and gave him a ſum of money. Philip de Commines ſays, he never ſaw ſuch wretched troops, which is a clear evidence with what intent the court of France granted the earl this inconſiderable ſupply. Beſides he was required to leave hoſtages in France that ſatisfaction ſhould be made for what was expended by the court. The earl having reaſon to miſtruſt the marquis of Dorſet, embraced this opportunity to leave him in hoſtage at Paris with Sir Thomas[b] Bourchier. Then he repaired to Roan, where the troops that were lent him were ordered to aſſemble.

When he came to Roan, he received the diſagreable news of the queen's death, and of Richard's deſign to marry the princeſs Elizabeth his niece, and to give Cecily her younger ſiſter to one of his favourites. His meaſures being broken by that marriage, which was repreſented to him as ready to be accompliſhed, he conſulted upon this occaſion with the lords that attended him. The reſult of their conſultation was, that ſince he could have no hopes of eſpouſing one of Edward the Fourth's marriagable daughters, he ought to think of ſome other. For that purpoſe, he was adviſed to gain to his intereſt Sir Walter Herbert, a perſon of great power in Wales, by an offer of marrying his younger ſiſter, the eldeſt being already married to the earl of Northumberland. The reſolution being taken, he diſpatched an expreſs to Sir Walter Herbert[c] to make the propoſal. Happily for the earl, the meſſenger found the roads ſo narrowly watched, that he durſt not venture to purſue his journey to Herbert. It is extremely probable, if this affair had ſucceeded according to the earl of Richmond's deſire, he would have been forſaken by all the friends of Edward the Fourth's family, who were very numerous. For, they had engaged in his party, only out of hopes of his uniting the two houſes of York and Lancaſter by his marriage with the princes Elizabeth.

Not many days after, he received letters from England[d], acquainting him, that if he would make haſte and land in Wales, he could not have a more favourable opportunity. That all the nobility of the country were for him[e]. That he would find the people ready to take arms in his favour, and a good ſum of money which he had privately collected[f] to ſupply his occaſions: that in the reſt of the kingdom every one was diſpleaſed with the king, who daily rendered himſelf more odious. In fine, that the preſent juncture was the moſt favourable, as it did not appear that Richard imagined him ſo ready to depart, ſince there were no extraordinary preparations in hand.

This good news obliged the earl to haſten his departure, without ſtaying for ſir Walter Herbert's anſwer. So coming to Harfleur, were his ſhips waited for him, he embarked his troops[g], and ſet ſail the laſt day of July. He arrived the ſixth of Auguſt at Milford-Haven[h] in South-Wales and next day came to Haverford[i], where he was joyfully received by the inhabitants.

From that place he ſent an expreſs to the counteſs his mother, to inform her of his arrival and deſign to march towards London, deſiring her to aſſemble all his friends, that they might join him upon his rout with as many troops as poſſible. This rout was to be very long, ſince having no town upon the Severn at his command, he was neceſſarily obliged to croſs almoſt all Wales, to get to Shrewſbury to the head of that river, where he was told he ſhould be received. So making but a ſhort ſtay at Haverford, he began his march to North-Wales, in order to reach Shrewſbury before the king was ready to diſpute his paſſage.

Richard hearing the earl of Richmond was landed at Milford-haven with ſo few troops, did not imagine he would be able to make any great progreſs. However he ſent orders to ſir Walter Herbert to raiſe the militia of the country, thinking that Herbert might eaſily ſtop him till he was himſelf ready to march. But Herbert having been privately gained by the earl's friends, ſuffered him to paſs unmoleſted, without offering to make the leaſt oppoſition.

Some days after, ſir Rice ap Thomas, a man of very great power in Wales, met the earl upon his rout, and offered his ſervice, which was gladly accepted[k]. He had with him a good body of Welſhmen. It is not ſurpriſing that all Wales ſhould declare for the earl, ſince he was of Welſh extraction, and of one of the ancienteſt families of the country.

The earl of Richmond's army being greatly increaſed by the juction of ſir Rice ap Thomas, and ſeveral Welſh gentlemen[l], and the whole country ſupplying him in his march with all neceſſaries, he arrived in a few days at Shrewſbury, where he was received without oppoſition[m].

The king had very juſtly ſuſpected the lord Stanley of being a ſecret friend to his ſon-in-law. Stanley had indeed aſſured the earl of Richmond he would favour him to the utmoſt of his power. But as he was forced to leave his ſon in hoſtage with the king, he could not openly eſpouſe his cauſe without endangering his ſon's life. For that reaſon, he pretended to take the king's part, and having levied about five thouſand men, poſted himſelf at Litchfield, as if he intended to oppoſe the earl of Richmond's march. On the other hand, ſir William Stanley[n] aſſembled likewiſe a body of two thouſand men, inſinuating that it was with the ſame view.

The king was then at Nottingham, where at the firſt news of his enemy's landing he had given orders to aſſemble his forces[o]. He at firſt conſidered the earl of Richmond's attempt as a ſort of bravado, which he hoped to make him quickly repent. But when he heard that ſir Walter Herbert had ſuffered him to paſs without oppoſition, that ſir Rice ap Thomas had joined him, that all Wales had taken his part, and that he was marching to Shrewſbury, he perceived, the affair was going to become more important. So, without heſitations, he reſolved to give him battle before he had made greater progreſs, and his army was reinforced. He wiſely judged, if on this occaſion he ſhewed the leaſt fear, it would certainly cauſe the whole kingdom to declare againſt him. On the contrary, his firmneſs was capable of keeping in awe ſuch as were inclined to ſide with his enemy. Meanwhile he had every day the mortification to hear his officers and ſoldiers deſerted to the earl. He was ſtill in hopes the lord Stanley and his brother would join him with their troops, though the little correſpondence they kept with him, gave him but too much cauſe to ſuſpect them of treachery. Be this as it will, having received certain advice that the earl of Richmond intended to march towards London, he reſolved to expect him upon his rout between Leiceſter and Coventry, in order to put a ſpeedy end to their quarrel by a battle.

Though the earl of Richmond's army was not conſiderable, he was no leſs deſirous to engage, becauſe he expected that the lord Stanley and his brother would not fail him on occaſion. With theſe hopes, he advanced to Litchfield, from whence upon his approach the lord Stanley retired to Atherſton. Whilſt his army was upon the march, he came privately to Stafford, where he had a conference with ſir William Stanley, in which were concerted meaſures, the effects whereof will preſently be ſeen.

The earl being come to Litchfield, heard that the king was at Leiceſter. So, perceiving he could not poſſibly proceed to London without fighting, he reſolved to march directly to his enemy[p]. Whilſt he was on the road to Tamworth, he happened to be behind his company, and attentively muſing upon his affairs miſtook his way, and loſt the track of his army. He roved about till night, not daring to enquire the way to Tamworth for fear of addreſſing one of Richard's party. At laſt, not being able to find the road, he was forced to paſs the night at a village, without knowing where he was, or daring to enquire. However, next morning he found means to get to Tamworth, where his army was in great pain for him, not knowing what was become of him. To excuſe ſuch a blunder, which, had it been known, muſt have done him great injury, he pretended he had been to confer with ſome private friends who did not care to appear openly. That very day, he went with few attendants to Atherſton, where he had a long conference with the lord Stanley[q]. On the morrow hearing that Richard had left Leiceſter to meet him, he advanced to ſave him ſome part of the way. The two armies, met at Boſworth, ſo near one another, that there would be no avoiding a battle, ſuppoſing either of the two leaders had deſired it. But they were both very far from ſuch a thought. The 22d of Auguſt was the day famous for the battle which decided the quarrel of the two contending houſes.

Richard perceiving his enemy to advance drew up his army, conſiſting of between twelve and thirteen thouſand men. He gave the command of the van to the duke of Norfolk, and led the main body himſelf, with his crown on his head, either to be better known, or to put his troops in mind they were fighting for their king. The earl of Richmond, who had but five thouſand men, drew up his army likewiſe in two lines, of which the earl of Oxford commanded the firſt, and himſelf the ſecond [r]. An hiſtorian has recited the ſpeeches of the two leaders to the ſoldiers before the fight. But as it is not very certain that they were really ſpoken, and as beſides they contain nothing very particular, I ſhall paſs them over in ſilence.

Whilſt the two armies were preparing for battle, the lord Stanley, who till then had continued at Atherſton, poſted himſelf with his troops over againſt the ſpace between the two armies; and his brother, who was come from Stafford, took his ſtation on the other ſide, oppoſite to him. Richard had been hitherto in doubt, whether the lord Stanley was for or againſt him, becauſe he had not yet made any public demonſtration in favour of the earl of Richmond. But when he ſaw them in that poſt, it was eaſy to perceive, he was not there to aſſiſt him, ſince he had not given him notice of his deſign. Mean-while, willing to know for certain what he had to fear or hope, he ſent him orders to come and join his army. Stanley anſwered, he would come when it was convenient. This anſwer not ſatisfying the king, he commanded his ſon to be immediately put to death. But his generals repreſented to him, that though the lord Stanley's behaviour was very doubtful, and even gave cauſe to ſuſpect him, he had not yet however declared for the earl of Richmond: that it was not improbable, he was meditating ſome great action in favour of his ſovereign, or perhaps intended to ſtand neuter during the fight, in order to join the conqueror. That in both theſe caſes, it was better to defer examining his conduct till after the event, than to provoke him by putting his ſon to death, to give the earl of Richmond an aſſiſtance capable of making victory incline to his ſide: that after all, in the king's preſent circumſtances, the death of the young lord Strange, could procure him no advantage. Theſe arguments ſeemed to the king of ſufficient force to cauſe him to revoke his orders. But he was guilty of an unpardonable error in remaining doubtful as to the two brothers, who plainly enough diſcovered their deſign. As his army was ſtill ſuperior to the forces of the earl of Richmond and the two brothers together, he ſhould have oppoſed to theſe laſt two bodies equal to theirs, with orders to attack them the moment they offered to ſtir. He would thereby have debarred them of the advantage of taking their time to declare, as they afterwards did. Such an overſight in ſo able a prince as Richard, cannot be looked upon but as proceeding from a particular direction of Providence, who had determined his deſtruction.

The two armies approaching one another, the battle began with a ſhower of arrows diſcharged from both ſides, after which the royal army moved forward to come to cloſe fight. The lord Stanley, who till then had been only a ſpectator, perceiving the duke of Norfolk widened his line to the left, in order to ſurround the earl of Richmond's troops, gave him not time to execute his deſign. On a ſudden he poſted himſelf on the right of the earl's to receive the front of the king's firſt line. The motion cauſing the duke of Norfolk to halt in order to recloſe his line which was too much extended to the left, the fight ceaſed for ſome moments. But preſently after, both ſides, being more upon an equality, by the lord Stanley's joining the earl, fought with great ardor.

Mean-while, Richard being impatient to know what paſſed at the firſt line, ſpurred his horſe towards the place where they were engaged. At the ſame time, the earl of Richmond quitting his ſecond line, where he had taken his poſt, was advanced as far as the foremoſt ranks of the firſt, to encourage his troops by his preſence, being ſenſible that the ſucceſs of the day would in great meaſure be determined by the fight of the two firſt lines. Richard perceiving him, inſtantly rode to attack him. He ſlew ſir William Brandon, the earl's ſtandard-bearer, who had interpoſed in his way. Sir John Cheney having taken Brandon's place to oppoſe the king's furious efforts, was overthrown to the ground. The earl of Richmond avoided not the combat. But if we may judge by the manner wherein the hiſtorians relate theſe particulars, he ſhewed no great eagerneſs to join his enemy, contenting himſelf with ſtanding in a poſture of defence; and willingly ſuffered his people to come between them, and hinder them from too cloſely approaching each other.

At the very time that Richard was ſingling out the earl of Richmond to end at once their important quarrel, it was decided very much to his diſadvantage from another quarter. Sir William Stanley following the example of the lord Stanley his brother, and ſeeing that the left of the earl of Richmond's firſt line began to give ground, openly declared againſt the king, by flanking his troops, who were employed in fighting their enemies in front, and vigorouſly repulſing them. This ſo ſeaſonable an attack at ſo critical a moment, having cauſed an extreme diſorder in the right of the king's firſt line; they were ſeen ſuddenly to retreat towards the main body, and the left quickly followed their example. This haſty retreat ſtruck ſuch a terror in the main body, that they almoſt all took to flight, without expecting the enemy. The earl of Northumberland alone, who commanded one of the wings ſtood without motion, having firſt ordered his troops to throw down their arms, to let the enemies ſee they had nothing to fear from him. Richard perceiving the day was loſt, and not being able to think of flying, or running the hazard of falling into the hands of the earl of Richmond, ruſhed into the midſt of his enemies, where he ſoon met with the death he deſired. Thus fell the uſurper in a more glorious manner than his crimes ſeemed to deſerve. He wore but two years and two months the crown, he had purchaſed by ſo many ill actions.

The battle laſted about two hours, including the time ſpent in the purſuit of the run-aways [s]. As moſt part of the king's army fled without fighting, there were not ſlain on the ſpot above two thouſand men [t] on his ſide. The earl of Richmond loſt but a hundred, of whom ſir William Brandon was the only perſon of note. He was father to Charles Brandon afterwards duke of Suffolk. On the king's part, the duke of Norfolk loſt his life valiantly fighting for him who had made him a duke [u]. He would doubtleſs have gained more honour and glory, had he employed his valour for a prince who had better deſerved than Richard, that a man ſhould hazard his life for his ſake. The earl of Northumberland was taken into favour by the conqueror, having perhaps held intelligence with him before the battle. It ſeems at leaſt, that it may be inferred as well from what he did in the beginning of the flight, as from certain verſes found that very morning by the duke of Norfolk, on his tent-door, intimating that the king was ſold [w]. The earl of Surrey, ſon of the duke of Norfolk, was taken priſoner, and ſent to the Tower of London, but ſhortly after obtained his pardon and liberty. Some of Richard's adherents were treated with the ſame lenity, others had the good fortune to eſcape. But Cateſby, miniſter and confident of Richard, who had ſo baſely betrayed the lord Haſtings, being made priſoner, was executed two days after at Leiceſter with ſome others of the ſame ſtamp, who had been the uſurper's inſtruments.

Richard's crown being found by a ſoldier was brought to the lord Stanley, who went immediately and placed it on the earl of Richmond's head, congratulating him upon his victory and ſaluting him king. From that time Henry kept the regal title and acted always as ſovereign, as if that bare ceremony had given him an undoubted right. Richard's body was found among the ſlain ſtark naked, covered with blood and dirt, and in that condition thrown acroſs a horſe, with the head hanging on one ſide and the legs on the other, and ſo carried to Leiceſter [x]. The body lay two whole days expoſed to public view, after which it was interred without any ceremony in one of the churches of that city. Some time after, Henry VII. his enemy and ſucceſſor, ordered a more honourable monument to be erected for him, on account of Elizabeth his queen, who was of the houſe of York [y].

[r] Sir Gilbert Talbot commanded the right wing, and ſir John Savage the left. Hall, fol. 54.—Between the two armies there was a morais, which the earl of Richmond left on his right hand, to ſecure him on that ſide, and in ſo doing he had the ſun at his back, and in the faces of his enemies. Hall, Hollingſhead.

[s] The battle was fought about three miles from Boſworth, an ancient market town in Leiceſterſhire. The exact ſpot of ground is frequently more and more diſcovered by pieces of armour, weapons, and eſpecially abundance of arrows-heads found there of a long and large proportion. There is a little mount cast up, on which Henry VII. is ſaid to make his ſpeech to his ſoldiers. Camden in Leiceſt.

[t] Hall ſays, there were a few above a thouſand ſlain. But Stow ſays, there were four thouſand.

[u] The other perſons of note that loſt their lives, were, Walter, lord Ferrers of Chartley, ſir Richard Ratcliff, Robert Brackenbury, ſir William Conyers, ſir Richard Clarendon. Hall, Stow.

[w] The verſes ſaid to be written on the tent-door were theſe:

Jack of Norfolk, be not too bold,
For Dickon thy maſter is bought and ſold.

John Howard duke of Norfolk, ſon of ſir Robert Howard, as is ſaid above, left behind him Thomas earl of Surrey, and five daughters.

[x] He was brought in that manner to Leiceſter, behind a purſuivant at arms, called blaunch ſanglier. Hall. Stow.

[y] He was buried in St. Mary's, belonging to a monaſtry of the Grey-Friars. Henry VII. put over him a tomb of various-coloured marble adorned with his ſtatue in alabaſter. This monument ſtood till the diſſolution

Richard III. was ſirnamed Crook-back, becauſe he was ſo in reality: moreover, one of his arms was almoſt withered, received but little or no nouriſhment. As to the defects of his mind, if we believe moſt hiſtorians, they were ſo great and ſo numerous that it would be difficult to find in hiſtory a prince of ſo ill a character. It is certain he had a boundleſs ambition, which often cauſed him to commit actions unbecoming a Chriſtian prince. To this paſſion alone muſt be aſcribed his treachery and cruelty, ſince he was treacherous and cruel only with reſpect to the acquiſition or preſervation of his crown. He has not been the ſole prince whom ambition has led into the like exceſſes. The hiſtorians who write in the reigns of Henry VII. and Henry VIII. have ſo aggravated the heinouſneſs of his actions, that one cannot help obſerving in their writings a ſtrong deſire to pleaſe the monarchs then on the throne: nay, very probably they have aſcribed to him ſome actions upon no very good foundation; for inſtance, his murdering with his own hand Henry VI. and the prince of Wales. Their great deſire to blacken this prince made them overlook his good qualities, which ought not to have been paſſed over in ſilence. Be this at it will, without pretending either to juſtify his ill actions, or to condemn him in general, as ſome have done, one ſhould blame him for what is blame-worthy, and at the ſame time acknowledge what deſerved praiſe. The crimes he was guilty of in procuring or keeping the crown are, as I ſaid, effects and conſequences of his immoderate ambition, by which he ſuffered himſelf to be blinded. But their being produced by that paſſion does not in the leaſt leſſen their heinouſneſs. As to the reſt, he had a great deal of ſenſe, and a very ſolid judgment, qualities that might have been an honour to him, had they been uſed to better purpoſes. We may judge of his good ſenſe and penetration by his precautions to ſecure himſelf from the aſſaults of his enemies. Theſe precautions could not be more juſt, if Divine Providence had not been pleaſed to render them fruitleſs, as it ſometimes does with reſpect to ſeemingly the beſt concerted deſigns. On ſeveral occaſions he ſhewed an uncommon valour, and particularly in the battle where he was ſlain: this cannot be denied him without injuſtice. He expreſſed great concern that juſtice ſhould be impartially miniſtered to all his ſubjects without diſtinction, provided the preſervation of his crown was not concerned; for in that reſpect he made no ſcruple to trample upon all the rules of right and equity. This natural inclination for juſtice, but combated by his ambition, may afford ſome occaſion to preſume, he would perhaps have proved a good king, had he been able to fix himſelf ſo firmly in the throne as to have feared no revolution[z]. At leaſt, this cannot be ſaid to be improbable. The emperor Auguſtus, who was guilty of ſo many cruelties to arrive at the empire, affords a memorable and well known inſtance of ſuch a change, and it would not be impoſſible to find other examples. But as Richard was taken out of the world before he had given ſigns of any amendment, his ill actions have effaced whatever there might be commendable in him. There is one hiſtorian however, who has endeavoured to vindicate this prince: but as he has ſet no bounds to this vindication, and laboured to make him entirely innocent, he has not acquired much credit, eſpecially as he was often obliged, in order to attain his ends, to advance facts not ſtrictly true. He has however a place in the collection of the Engliſh hiſtorians; but no modern author has thought fit to take him for guide[a].

Richard left but one natural ſon, who was yet a minor when the king his father died. Some months before, he had made him governor of Calais, Guiſnes, and all the marches of Picardy, belonging to the crown of England[b]. With Richard III. ended the Angevin kings, ſirnamed Plantagenets[c], who ſince Henry II. the firſt of this race, had poſſeſſed the crown of England from father to ſon, during the ſpace of three hundred and thirty years. Richard was the laſt king of this houſe, but not the laſt male as ſome have affirmed, ſince the earl of Warwick his nephew, ſon of the duke of Clarence his brother, was ſtill alive. That young prince was the ſole branch of the male iſſue of Edward III. which had been ſo numerous, but was almoſt entirely deſtroyed by the late civil war. This war, commenced thirty years before, was at length ended by the battle of Boſworth, after deſtroying above one hundred thouſand Engliſhmen, and a great number of princes of the two contending houſes. Philip de Commines mounts the number to fourſcore; but it is a miſtake or exaggeration of that author, as it is eaſy to ſee by the genealogical table of the poſterity of Edward III.

Let us cloſe the hiſtory of the Plantagenets with a brief recapitulation of the moſt memorable incidents that happened to the kings of this race, whilſt on the throne of England. In this ſummary of the fourteen foregoing reigns, it will be ſeen not without aſtoniſhment perhaps, that the happineſs and glory enjoyed by this race for above three hundred years, were almoſt nothing in compariſon of their misfortunes[d].

Henry II. the firſt king of this houſe, was the greateſt of all the Engliſh monarchs with reſpect to extent of dominion. Beſides the kingdom of England, he poſſeſſed in France, Guienne, Poictou, Saintonge, Auvergne, Limoſin, Perigord, Angoumois, Touraine, Anjou, Maine, Normandy, to which he joined alſo Bretagne by the marriage of one of his ſons with the heireſs of that duchy, and laſtly crowned all with the conqueſt of Ireland. But with all this grandeur he was ever unhappy. His conteſt with Becket, the vexatious perſecutions from pope Alexander III. the rebellion of his queen and ſons, and the unfortunate ſucceſs of his laſt war with France, ſuffered him not to enjoy a moment's repoſe.

Richard I. rendered his name famous in the eaſt by the conqueſt of the iſle of Cyprus, by the taking of Acra, and by a great victory over the Saracens. But the fame he acquired in that expedition was a dear purchaſe to Chriſtendom, and particularly to England, by the prodigious quantity of men and money exported from thence, without the Chriſtians of Paleſtine reaping any great advantages. Richard himſelf at his return into Europe underwent the rigours of a very grievous and long impriſonment, from which he could not be freed without an exorbitant ranſom, which quite drained his kingdom. In ſhort, after a ſeveral years ſtruggle with Philip Auguſtus to very little purpoſe, he unfortunately periſhed by an arrow at the ſiege of Chaluz, undertaken from his greedy deſire of money.

John Lackland enjoyed not a moment's happineſs during his whole reign. Perſecuted by the king of France, then by pope Innocent III. and laſtly, by his own ſubjects, his reign was nothing but a continual train of misforunes. He loſt all the provinces poſſeſſed by his anceſtors in France: after which Innocent III. deprived him of his crown, and reſtored it to him upon ſhameful and diſhonourable terms. In fine, he had the great mortification to ſee his barons in arms againſt him, and to die at a time when all England was paying allegiance to a foreign prince.

Henry III. a prince of very narrow ſpirit, lived, in a continued ſtate of ſubjection, though ſeated on a throne, one while a ſlave to his favourites and miniſters, another while to the imperious will of the pope: at length, ſtripped of all his authority by his own ſubjects, he remained ſome time captive to his greateſt enemies; and he was entirely indebted to a victory fortunately gained by the prince his ſon, for his reſtoration and the tranquility he enjoyed the two laſt years of his life.

Edward I. rendered his name famous by the conqueſt of Scotland. But after ſhedding torrents of blood in that unjuſt quarrel, he had the mortification to loſe that acquiſition, lution of the abbies under Henry VIII. when it was pulled down and utterly defaced; ſince which his grave being overgrown with weeds and nettles, is become very obſcure and not to be found; only the ſtone coffin, wherein his corpſe lay, was made a drinking-trough for horſes at the White-horſe inn in Leiceſter.— Richard was not above three or four and thirty years old when he was killed. He gave five hundred marks a year to Queen's-college in Cambridge. Sanford. p. 434.

[z] His enemies ſeem to own, that excepting his cruelties to gain and keep the crown, one might judge him to be a good king: particularly in his care to check vice and promote ſobriety and virtue; witneſs his circular letters to the biſhops, and in his concern for the good government and eaſe of his ſubjects, as may be ſeen in his proclamation againſt the rebels in Kent. See Compl. Hiſt. vol. i. p. 576. My lord Verulam ſays of him, that he was in military virtue approved, jealous of the honour of the Engliſh nation, and likewiſe a good law-maker. He founded the ſociety of heralds, and made them a corporation, etc. See the charter in Rymer's Fœdera, tom. xii. p. 215.

[a] George Buck, eſq. has endeavoured to repreſent Richard III. as a prince of much better ſhapes (both of body and mind) than he had been generally eſteemed. His work, conſiſting of five books, is inſerted in the collection of the Engliſh hiſtorians.

[b] In his patent he is called John of Gloceſter. See Rymer's Fœdera, tom. xii. p. 265.

[c] i. e. A broom-ſtalk. The reaſon for this ſirname antiquaries are at a loſs to find out, and give no better than this: Fulk, the firſt earl of Anjou of that name, being ſtung with remorſe for ſome wicked actions of his, in order to atone for them, went in pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, and before the holy ſepulchre was ſoundly ſcourged with broom-twigs which grow in great plenty there. From whence he ever after took the ſirname of Plantagenet, or Broom-ſtalk, which was continued by his noble poſterity. Buck, lib. i.

[d] It were to be wiſhed, that ſo good a hiſtorian as Rapin had been more ſparing of God's judgments; ſuch remarks at beſt being a ſign of great weakneſs. But when they are built on falſities in fact, as is ſometimes the caſe, they are inexcuſeable. Of this we have an inſtance even in Rapin himſelf: ſee note [x] p. 575, Vol. I. As for the long liſt he has given of God's judgments upon the houſe of Plantagenet, it contains nothing extraordinary, nothing but what is very common in this world, and what might eaſily be matched out of the hiſtories of ſeveral other nations.

and to die before he had recovered it. His conqueſt of Wales was the moſt real advantage procured for the kingdom by any king of England.

The reign of Edward II. is remarkable only for that prince's ill conduct and misfortunes. He is the firſt inſtance of a king of England depoſed by authority of parliament. Happy, if the fury of his enemies had ſtopped there! but, with an unparallelled barbarity, he was made to ſuffer the moſt cruel death that could poſſibly be deviſed, and which bore no proportion to the indiſcretion he was guilty of.

Edward III. was one of the moſt illuſtrious kings of England, as well for his perſonal qualities as for his victories in France, and the famous treaty of Bretigny, which reſtored to him with intereſt the provinces John Lackland had ſuffered to be loſt. But his reign, though glorious, was not free from misfortunes. His minority was ſullied by the tragical death of Edward II. his father, and of the earl of Kent his uncle. To puniſh theſe horrid outrages, he was forced to keep his own mother in priſon as long as ſhe lived. Toward the end of his days, he had the mortification to ſee himſelf ſtripped of all he had re-conquered upon France, without hopes of recovery. In a word, he ruined, as I may ſay, his own reputation and died at a time when his ſubjects began to loſe their former eſteem for him.

Thus far it is eaſy to ſee that the race of the Plantagenets had enjoyed no great ſhare of happineſs. But their misfortunes, which were blended with ſome proſperities, were very inconſiderable in compariſon of what that race afterwards ſuffered. When a man takes a view of what happened to the poſterity of Edward III. he ſees nothing but diſaſters, tragical or untimely deaths, hatred, animoſity, revenge, civil, wars, cruelties unheard of among princes ſprung from the ſame ſtock. England had never ſeen ſo terrible a deſtruction of her inhabitants, nor had the ſcaffold been ever dyed with ſo much noble and royal blood as during the hundred years between the death of Edward III. and that of Richard III. Let us briefly run over the ſeveral branches of Edward III's family, in order to ſee their calamities.

Edward the Black Prince, one of the moſt accompliſhed princes that ever was born, died in the forty-ſixth year of his age, having firſt buried his eldeſt ſon Edward but ſeven years old.

Richard II. his other ſon, who mounted the throne after his grandfather, was depoſed, impriſoned, and barbarouſly murdered.

Lionel duke of Clarence, third ſon of Edward III. died in a foreign country, in the flower of his age. He left but one daughter, whoſe marriage into the houſe of March was the occaſion of all the calamities England was afflicted with for thirty years together.

The poſterity of John of Gaunt, Edward fourth's ſon, were far from being happy. Henry IV. ſucceſſor of Richard II. paſſed his whole reign under continual apprehenſions of loſing a crown acquired by extraordinary methods, and preſerved by the violent death of Richard II. whom he cauſed to be murdered in priſon.

Henry V. one of the moſt illuſtrious kings of England, after ſo great a progreſs in France as to be declared regent and heir of that kingdom, enjoyed that conſiderable advantage but two years, or rather had only a foretaſte of what he had ſo eagerly deſired. He died in the flower of his age, leaving a ſon nine months old, who afterwards proved very unfit to complete the work his illuſtrious father had ſo glorioufly begun.

The dukes of Clarence, Bedford, and Gloceſter, died all three without iſſue. Gloceſter was long expoſed to the fury of his enemies, and at laſt ſacrificed to their vengeance.

Henry VI. ſon of Henry V. loſt all that the king his father had acquired in France. After which he was ſtripped of his royalty, impriſoned, reſtored for a ſhort ſpace, and at laſt murdered by a prince ſprung from the ſame ſtock with himſelf.

Edward his ſon, prince of Wales, died after the ſame manner, and by the ſame hand.

In ſurveying the other branch of the houſe of Lancaſter, namely that of Beauford-Somerſet, hardly ſhall we find a prince but what loſt his life in battle, or on the ſcaffold.

The houſe of York, of whom Edmund de Langley, fifth ſon of Edward III. was head, was ſtill leſs favoured. Some unfortunate ſtars ſeemed to be continually ſhedding their malignant influences upon that family: excepting Edmund de Langley himſelf, firſt duke of York, all the princes his deſcendants died a violent or untimely death.

Edward duke of York, his eldeſt ſon, was ſlain in the battle of Azincourt.

Richard earl of Cambridge loſt his head on a ſcaffold.

Richard, third duke of York, and his ſon Edmund earl of Rutland, periſhed in the battle of Wakefield.

George duke of Clarence was afterwards condemned to die in a butt of Malmſey.

Edward IV. after enjoying the crown of England ſome years to which he had a better title than the houſe of Lancaſter, died indeed a natural death, but in the two and fortieth year of his age.

Edward V. and Richard his brother were ſmothered in their bed.

Edward prince of Wales, ſon of Richard III. was taken out of the world in the eleventh year of his age.

Richard III. was killed at the battle of Boſworth.

In fine, we ſhall ſee in the courſe of the hiſtory, Edward earl of Warwick, ſon of the unfortunate duke of Clarence, and the only ſurviving male of the houſe of York, end his days by the hand of the executioner.

Nothing more remains to complete the account of the diſaſters that befel the poſterity of Edward III. but to take notice that Thomas of Woodſtock, earl of Gloceſter, ſeventh ſon of that monarch, died a violent death in priſon at Calais.

Were not all theſe misfortunes which fell on Edward III's poſterity the effects of the divine vengeance extended to the fourth generation for the barbarous murder committed on the perſon of Edward II.? at leaſt it is difficult not to ſee in theſe events the tragical death of Edward II. revenged upon Richard II. that of Richard upon Henry VI. that of Henry upon Edward V. and that of Edward upon Richard III.

THAT Richard III. coined money, appears by an indenture whereby he contracts with Robert Brackenbury for the coinage both of gold and ſilver, of the ſame value and denomination with the money of 5 Edward IV. Dr. Nicolſon deſcribes one of his groats, as inſcribed with characters of the like ſhape with thoſe of Henry VI. and Edward IV. weighing about two penny-weights three grains, which was the exact ſtandard of Richard III's groats. Others in the poſſeſſion of the late archbiſhop of York and Mr. Thoreſby, on which the face ſide wants the outer circle, the letters of the inſcription which reach to the extremity of the coin being generally imperfect, ſo that there was reaſon for the proviſion made by act of parliament in the next reign, that the new money ſhould have a circle about the outermoſt parts. That coin which Speed gives of Richard II. is thought rather to belong to this king, by the word AGLIÆ inſtead of ANGLIÆ, in whoſe reign that way of writing was uſed. the author of Num. Brit. Hiſt. has two pieces of this king, inſcribed RICHARDVS REX ANGLI, reverſe CIVITAS EBORACI. Another RICARDVS REX ANGL. reverſe CIVITAS LONDON. The ſhortneſs of this king's reign makes his coin ſo very rare that Thoreſby obſerves he had ſeen a ſeries of ancient monies from Edward the Confeſſor to the preſent times, Richard III. excepted, which he had not chanced to light upon. Speed's caſe was the ſame, ſo that he was forced to leave a blank for the king's money.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XIV.

The Reign of HENRY VII. with the State of the Church, from the Beginning of the Reign of HENRY IV. 1399, to the End of the Reign of HENRY VII. 1509.

19 HENRY VII.

[1485] THE battle of Boſworth being ended by the flight of the royal army and death of king Richard, Henry cauſed Te Deum to be ſung on the place, all the troops falling on their knees to return God thanks for his victory. Preſently after, the whole army, as it were by inſpiration, made the air reſound with the cry of "Long live king Henry!" which was not diſagreeable to him; for it was a ſort of military election, which might have ſerved him for foundation to pretend to the crown, though he had no other title. Mean-while he was embarraſſed by the uncertainty he was under, whether he ſhould keep to this election, or build his title upon a more ſolid foundation. He was however to determine without delay, either to reject the title given him by his army till the parliament ſhould confirm it, or accept it, and aſſert his right independently of the conſent of the eſtates.

He had three titles or foundations whereon he could ground his right. The firſt was, his deſcent from the houſe of Lancaſter by Margaret his mother, daughter of a duke of Somerſet. The houſe of Lancaſter had been poſſeſſed of the crown above ſixty years; and this poſſeſſion had been confirmed by many acts of parliament: but on the other hand, ſeveral parliaments had afterwards condemned this poſſeſſion as a continual uſurpation, and adjudged the crown to the houſe of York, as deſcended from Lionel third ſon of Edward III. This queſtion, conſidered originally and independently of the circumſtances which moved the parliaments to come to ſuch oppoſite determinations, could not have been decided in favour of the houſe of Lancaſter, if the laws and cuſtoms of the realm had been followed. But, if ſetting aſide the uſual practice, it ſhould be conſidered with reſpect to the acts of parliament, it could not but be doubtful, ſince the pro and con were equally ſupported by the ſame authority. It might alſo be objected to Henry, that indeed ſundry parliaments had decided the point in favour of the houſe of Lancaſter, but it did not follow that the houſe of Somerſet could receive any advantage from that deciſion. The Somerſets were indeed deſcended from the houſe of Lancaſter, but by a baſtard branch, which could pretend to the crown only by virtue of their legitimation. Now it was a queſtion yet undecided, whether the act of legitimation, and Richard II's ſubſequent letters-patent, gave to that branch, derived from a baſtard born in adultery, the right to ſucceed to the crown, though mentioned neither in the act of parliament, nor in king Richard's letters. Beſides, even upon ſuppoſition of this right another query ſtill aroſe, namely, whether the poſterity of this legitimated baſtard were to have the preference of the deſcendants of the daughters, born in wedlock, of whom there were ſeveral in Caſtile, Portugal, and Germany. To leave theſe points to the examination of the parliament ſeemed therefore too dangerous for Henry. But on the other hand, he was not ignorant that in the deciſion of the differences between the houſe of Lancaſter and York, the parliaments had not ſo much regarded the arguments of either party, as the circumſtances of time and things. Now he could never have a more favourable juncture than the preſent, ſince he had juſt delivered England from a tyrant univerſally hated. Henry IV. his predeceſſor, had done more for the Engliſh, when for reward the crown was ajudged to him, in prejudice of the houſe of March.

Henry's ſecond title was his intended marriage with Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of Edward IV. which he had ſworn. But here no leſs difficulties occurred. If he relied upon this title, he was to reſolve either to reign only in right of his wife or to confound together the title of both houſes. In the former caſe he would have relinquiſhed his own leave to the houſe of York a title which had all along been conteſted and have owned that houſe's right for the ſole foundation of his mounting the throne; beſides, he conſidered, that in caſe Elizabeth happened to die without iſſue, all her rights would of courſe devolve to her next ſiſter, and he thereby be excluded from the throne upon the death of his queen[a]: that ſuppoſing he could get the parliament to adjudge him the crown during life, he ſhould only have a perſonal right which would not deſcend to his children by a ſecond wife.

In the latter caſe, on ſuppoſition of the confuſion of the titles of both houſes by means of the projected marriage, purſuant to the intention of thoſe who had invited him into England, this confuſion indeed might be advantageous to the children born of this marriage: but if unhappily there ſhould be none, and his death fall out before Elizabeth's, he would leave the poſſeſſion of the crown to the houſe of York, which his averſion for that houſe would not ſuffer him to behold even at a diſtance, without extreme concern. But if, on the contrary, Elizabeth ſhould die before him, he foreſaw it would prove occaſion of renewing the troubles of the kingdom, ſince, as ſhe reigned in her own right, her ſiſter or neareſt relations might pretend to ſucceed her.

Henry's third title was, that of the ſword or conqueſt, which his late victory ſeemed to give him. But he conſidered this victory was entirely owing to the aſſiſtance of the people of England, and therefore gave him at moſt but a right of conqueſt over the vanquiſhed party. Beſides, as he could ſupport himſelf only by the ſame aſſiſtance, he had reaſon to fear that in reſting upon this pretended title, he ſhould loſe his beſt friends, ſince ſuch a proceeding might be conſtrued as a ſettled deſign to rule with arbitrary power. He knew William the Conqueror had wiſely avoided that rock, by rejecting the title of the ſword, till he ſaw himſelf firmly eſtabliſhed in the throne.

Theſe were difficulties conſiderable enough to merit Henry's mature deliberation before he reſolved. But on the other hand, there was no medium to take. He was neceſſarily either to accept the title given him by the army, and thereby engage to proſecute his rights independently of the parliament's approbation, or by rejecting it to ſhew he miſtruſted his own right and expoſe himſelf to a troubleſome examination. After weighing the reaſons on both ſides as far as the time would permit, he reſolved at laſt to rely upon the title of the houſe of Lancaſter. So taking for granted that the army in ſaluting him king, had only given him his due, he determined to aſſert the Lancaſtrian claim, without any mixture of that of York, and without ſubmitting it even to the examination of the parliament[b]. To that end he reſolved to be crowned before he ſummoned a parliament, and to defer his marriage till he had obtained an act to adjudge him the crown as his own by inheritance. He determined therefore to aſſume the title of king, and to iſſue out orders as ſuch, ſuppoſing that the crown was fallen to him of full right, though Margaret his mother was ſtill alive, and ought to precede him. Notwithſtanding all the reaſons which rendered his title dubious, he believed there were others ſtrong enough to ſupport it, eſpecially at a time when his victory was capable of deciding all the queſtions in his favour. This reſolution was the fountain of all the troubles of his reign.

Mean-while, though he affected to be convinced of the goodneſs of his title, he diſtruſted it in his own mind, knowing if it came to be confeſſed, the reaſons whereon he ſhould ground it were of no great weight, unleſs ſupported by force of arms. In this ſituation he continued almoſt his whole life; always unconcerned in appearance, and yet terryfying himſelf with the leaſt thing, and dreading that every little accident would be of dangerous conſequence. The houſe of York was a perpetual terror to him; he knew that they who had called him into England were not enemies to that houſe, but only to the perſon of Richard III. So the rights of the two houſes remaining ſtill doubtful, as having been decided only by the ſword, he was very ſenſible that his could be maintained but by the ſame way, or by his precautions to prevent all future deciſions of that kind.

Upon theſe conſiderations it was, that the next day after the battle[c], he ſent a detachment of horſe, under the command of ſir Robert Willoughby, to the caſtle of Sheriff-Hutton[d], to take from thence the earl Warwick, and conduct him to the Tower of London. This young prince was ſon and heir to George duke of Clarence, who was drowned in a butt of malmſey. After the death of the duke his father, Edward IV. his uncle cauſed him to be carefully educated, and created him earl of Warwick, a title enjoyed by his mother's father[e]. He was unwilling to make him duke of Clarence, leſt that ſhould preſerve the memory of an unhappy brother, whom he had ſacrificed to his jealouſy. When Richard was on the throne, he ordered this young prince his nephew to be confined in the caſtle above named, knowing how likely he was one day to diſturb him in the poſſeſſion of the crown. After the uſurper's death, the earl of Warwick ſeemed to have room to expect ſome favour from his ſucceſſor, but it proved juſt the contrary: ſo far was Henry from releaſing him, that he made him cloſe priſoner in the Tower, a rigour proceeding only from his jealouſy and inward conviction that his title was not ſo undoubted as he affected to believe. But this was not all: it will hereafter be ſeen that he put this unhappy prince to death by the hand of the executioner, therein ſtill more tyrant than the tyrant himſelf, from whom he boaſted to have delivered the kindom.

The princeſs Elizabeth, whom Henry was to marry, was kept in the ſame caſtle by the late king's order, who did not think fit to leave her at liberty to chuſe a huſband, intending to marry her himſelf. Henry reſolving to repair to London with all poſſible diligence thought it not proper to leave the princeſs at ſo great a diſtance, leſt ſhe ſhould be told that ſhe had no need to mix her rights with thoſe of another: wherefore ſhe was deſired to come and remain with the queen her mother at London. His deſign was to make it believed he intended to eſpouſe her very ſoon, though he was determined to defer his marriage till after the ſeſſion of the parliament.

A few days after, Henry ſet forward by eaſy journies to London, taking care to avoid all appearance of uſing the right of conqueſt. He was received in all places with loud acclamations, the people conſidering him as their deliverer, and as going by his marriage, to put an end to all the calamities occaſioned by the civil wars. He made his entry into London with great ſtate[f]. However, the people had not the ſatisfaction to ſee him as he paſſed through the city, becauſe he was carried all the way in a cloſe chariot till he came to St. Paul's. His hiſtorian aſcribes this conduct to a motive of grandeur and ſecurity, as if having been proſcribed in the reign of Richard III. he diſdained to fawn upon the people, leſt they ſhould think he expected all from them. But I do not know whether this is better grounded than what the ſame hiſtorian adds, that Henry cauſed Richard's ſtandards taken at Boſworth[g], to be brought into St. Paul's church, that the people of London might not forget that he had juſt gained a battle, and was entering the city as a conqueror. When a prince has acquired a reputation for politics, ſomething myſterious, ſuitable to the notion formed of him, is diſcovered in his moſt indifferent actions.

Next day Henry aſſembled a council[h] of all the perſons of diſtinction in the court and city, before whom he ſolemnly renewed his oath to marry the princeſs Elizabeth. This declaration was abſolutely neceſſary at the preſent juncture, becauſe of a rumour that he was contracted to Ann, eldeſt daughter of the duke of Bretagne, and had not acted with ſincerity when he promiſed to marry the eldeſt daughter of Edward IV. Beſides, though his deſign was not to derive his right from this marriage, it was however proper the people ſhould think ſo, till he had obtained his deſire of the parliament, for fear meaſures ſhould be taken beforehand to obſtruct it. Indeed, he was reſolved to perform his promiſe, but was bent not to conſummate his marriage before his coronation, leſt his queen ſhould be crowned with him, and her title ſupported by that junction. Nay, he had reaſon to fear that in caſe his nuptials were celebrated before the parliament met, ſome clauſe in favour of the houſe of York might be inſerted in the act to ſettle the ſucceſſions.

About the middle of September, the city of London was afflicted with a diſeaſe then unknown, which threw the patients into a prodigious ſweat, and carried them off in four and twenty hours. Thoſe that died not within that ſpace were almoſt ſure of recovering. Happily, it laſted but till the end of October; however, it ſwept away multitudes of people before proper remedies were found[i]. The method of cure was to keep the patient neither too hot nor too cold, with temperate cordials, which, without too much increaſing the heat, helped nature to expel the humours that cauſed the extraordinary ſweatings.

About this time the new king made the earl of Oxford[k] conſtable of the Tower, who had always been attached to the houſe of Lancaſter, and after his eſcape out of the caſtle of Hammes, joined him at Paris, and had ſince done him ſignal ſervices, particularly at the battle of Boſworth.

Some time after, the king iſſued out a proclamation, notifying, that he had concluded a truce for one year with the king of France, from the laſt day of September. It was no ſmall advantage to ſhew the people that Charles VIII. acknowledged him for king, even before he was declared ſo by the parliament.

The coronation-day approaching, it was neceſſary to ſettle the places and claims of thoſe who were to officiate at the ceremony. For that purpoſe, it was requiſite to create a lord high-ſteward. But as this office for ſome time had been enjoyed only by princes of the blood, and there were none then in the kingdom, the king, not to raiſe jealouſies among the great men, cauſed it to be executed by commiſſioners[l].

Mean while, he would no longer delay to ſhew his gratitude to three lords who had faithfully and effectually ſerved him in his greateſt diſtreſſes. Theſe were Jaſper earl of Pembroke, his father's brother, Thomas lord Stanley, his father-in-law, and ſir Edward Courteney. The firſt had been a father to him in his youth, and delivered him from the ſnares of Edward IV. when he was concealed in Wales. After that, he was his conſtant companion in Bretagne, and had helped him to overcome all the difficulties which occurred in his undertakings. In return for his ſervices, Henry gave him the title of duke of Bedford, vacant ever ſince the death of the famous duke of Bedford, brother of Henry V. The lord Stanley, who had been very ſerviceable to the king at the battle of Boſworth, was created earl of Derby. Sir Edward Courteney, who had ventured to engage in his party, and to favour in the weſtern counties, the duke of Buckingham's plot, was honoured with the title of earl of Devonſhire[m], Henry thought not proper to diſpenſe his favours to others, being willing, according to the cuſtom of his predeceſſors, to reſerve his creations till the fitting of the parliament.

The coronation had been fixed to the 30th of October, and the parliament was not to meet till the 7th of November, Hence it is evident, that Henry did not mean to bring his title into queſtion, or leave to the parliament's care any more than to confirm his coronation, without ſuffering the foundations to be examined. The examples of Edward IV. and Richard III. had taught him, that the beſt way to gain the parliament's approbation, was to take poſſeſſion. Indeed there is a great difference between debating, whether a prince who claims a crown has a right to pretend to it, or whether he is to be dethroned when in actual poſſeſſion. The former of theſe things may be done by reaſons, arguments, and ſtudied ſpeeches: The latter requires an army ready to give weight to the reaſons. So Henry may be ſaid to ſet the crown himſelf on his head, ſince he alone decided his right, without the authority of the parliament, who would have had much to ſay, if they had examined or been at liberty to examine, by what title Henry aſcended the throne. The ceremony of the coronation was performed by cardinal Bourchier archbiſhop of Canterbury, who ſuppoſing Henry's right to be indiſputable, thought it not proper to enquire into the validity of this title [n]. The ſame day Henry inſtituted a guard of fifty archers [o] to attend him and his ſucceſſors for ever, covering with a pretence of grandeur and majeſty, a precaution, which in all appearance he believed neceſſary in the preſent juncture.

The parliament met eight days after the coronation. Henry's ends in calling a parliament were chiefly four. The firſt was to be declared king de jure, as he was already king de facto, and to ſecure the crown to his poſterity, by an act in form. The ſecond, to reverſe the attainders of all his party [p]. The third, to attaint thoſe who had expreſſed a great animoſity againſt him, and moſt zeal for the late king. The fourth and laſt was to ſhew, that though he had by his ſole authority placed himſelf on the throne, to prevent his title from being queſtioned, he intended however to govern the kingdom like his predeceſſors, by way of parliaments, and not to aſſume a deſpotic power. This ſtep was abſolutely neceſſary to a prince whoſe title was ſo dubious, and who aſcended the throne without being called to it in the uſual way.

It was requiſite for the people's ſatisfaction and the king's ſecurity, that the parliament ſhould ſettle the crown upon him by an expreſs act; otherwiſe obedience to him might not be thought indiſpenſable. Though he had been powerful enough to cauſe his authority to be owned without ſuch an act, his heirs were not certain to be always in ſo favourable a ſituation. Mean while, it was not eaſy to pen the act. Henry would not hold the crown either by the people's election, or by the parliament, or by the princeſs he was to marry. He did not even intend that Elizabeth ſhould ſhare in the royalty, otherwiſe than any other foreign queen. Nevertheleſs, in the beginning of the reign, it was proper, the people ſhould not know too much, but have ſome cauſe to believe, the king reſted upon all theſe titles. The reaſon was, the Engliſh were extremely jealous of the authority of their parliaments, and generally much better affected to the houſe of York than to that of Lancaſter. Wherefore the king finding the parliament diſpoſed to do whatever he could deſire, intimated or dictated himſelf the words of the act, namely, "That the inheritance of the crown ſhould reſt, remain, "and abide in the king, and the heirs of his body, perpetually "ſo to endure, and in none other." Which ambiguous words left it undecided, whether he had prior right, which was doubtful, or was only king in fact, which could not be denied. As for the limitation of the entail, he was contented it ſhould go no further than to himſelf and to the heirs of his body, leaving the reſt to be decided by the law in caſe his line came to fail. Thus by not mentioning the houſe of York, the act left it undetermined whether that houſe was entirely excluded, or might inherit after the heirs of the new king. In this obſcure and ambiguous manner did the parliament draw and paſs the act, which was afterwards confirmed by the pope's bull. But Henry took care to have all his titles inſerted in the bull, namely, his diſcent from the houſe of Lancaſter, his marriage with Edward the Fourth's eldeſt daughter, his victory at Boſworth, and the act of parliament: To which might be added alſo the papal bull of confirmation. All theſe titles joined together, are a clear evidence of his uncertainty, with reſpect to his right, and of his trouble cauſed by that uncertainty.

The act of ſettlement and ſucceſſion being paſſed, it was moved for another to reverſe the attainders of the king's friends, whilſt only earl of Richmond. But ſeveral of the attainted perſons were actually members of the houſe of commons, elected by the favour they had found with the people ſince the revolution. There were likewiſe ſome in the houſe of lords. It was therefore repreſented to be incongruous, that theſe perſons ſhould give their votes in an affair which particularly concerned them, and be judges in their own cauſe. The king was troubled, that the acts paſſed in the late reign ſhould be deemed valid, and his friends wanted to be purged of the crime of eſpouſing his quarrel. He concealed however his concern, and only inſinuated, that he wiſhed the judges to be conſulted upon the affair. The judges being met [q], gave it as their opinion, that the members attainted by courſe of law, ſhould abſent themſelves till their attainders were reverſed.

But whilſt they were debating upon this queſtion, another was moved with reſpect to the king himſelf, who was of the number of the attainted, having been declared traitor and rebel by an act of parliament. This queſtion was much more embarraſſing than the other. The king could not be diſjoined from the parliament without a diſſolution, neither was it probable that he would ſubmit to a parliamentary examination. In this puzzling caſe, the judges unanimouſly reſolved, "That the crown takes away all defects and ſtops in blood: "and that from the time the king aſſumed the crown, the "fountain was cleared, and all attainders and corruption of "blood diſcharged." This deciſion, more conformable to politics than to the laws, eſtabliſhed a principle that might be attended with terrible conſequences.

This affair being ended, the parliament paſſed an act of attainder againſt the late king by the name of the duke of Gloceſter, and againſt his principal adherents. Of this number were the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Surrey, the lords Lovel, Ferrers, Zouch, ſir Richard Ratcliff, ſir William Cateſby [r], all miniſters or favourites of Richard III. of whom ſome were killed at Boſworth field, others executed ſince the battle. If the plots which were afterwards formed againſt Henry himſelf had taken effect, he would doubtleſs have been ſerved in the ſame manner, with all his adherents. So dangerous is it to carry ſeverity too far in caſes of this nature. Accordingly we ſhall ſee hereafter, that Henry perceiving the conſequences, cauſed an act to be paſſed to prevent the abuſe of ſuch a precedent. The deſign of the preſent act was to ſatisfy the king's vengeance, and procure him the forfeited eſtates of the attainted. Theſe confiſcations brought him in immenſe ſums, which rendered the demand of a ſubſidy unneceſſary in this firſt parliament, eſpecially as the nation was in peace or truce with all the neighbouring princes.

After the king was revenged of his enemies, and had filled his coffers, he publiſhed the royal proclamation, offering pardon to all that had been concerned in any plot againſt him before he came to the crown, or borne arms for the late king, provided they ſubmitted themſelves by ſuch a day. His firſt deſign was to procure this general pardon to be paſſed in parliament, but recollecting it was an act of Grace, he choſe rather that it ſhould wholly flow from himſelf. Many who were apprehenſive of being proſecuted, readily came and took the oath of allegiance, in order to enjoy the benefit of the pardon. But others choſe to remain in ſanctuary, till the character of the new king was more known. The lord Lovel, one of Richard the Third's favourites, took this laſt courſe.

Before the parliament broke up, Henry was pleaſed to reward ſome of the companions of his exile, by creating them peers of the realm. The lord Chandos of Bretagne was made earl of Bath; ſir Giles D'Aubeney received the title of baron D'Aubeney, and ſir Robert Willoughby that of lord Brooke. At the ſame time the king reſtored Edward Stafford to the dignity of duke of Buckingham, forfeited by his father's attainder, and to all the poſſeſſions belonging to his family, confiſcated in the late reign. This was a piece of juſtice he could hardly refuſe to the ſon of a lord who had loſt his life in his ſervice, and been the firſt author of his advancement to the throne.

The parliament being diſſolved about the end of November, Henry ſent into France, Oliver King, archdeacon of Oxford, with money to repay king Charles what he had lent him, and his charges in fitting out the fleet which brought him to England. Whereupon the marquis of Dorſet, and ſir John Bourchier, left as pledges at Paris, had leave to return home. At the ſame time, Henry gave his envoy power to prolong the truce with France, if he found king Charles's council inclined.

Probably his want of ready money to pay the king of France, put him upon ſending to the city of London to borrow ſix thouſand marks. His demand met at firſt with gteat difficulties, becauſe he was not yet well known. However, he obtained at laſt two thouſand pounds[s], which he thankfully received, and punctually repayed afterwards. He often borrowed money in this manner, in the courſe of his reign, and always paid at the day. His view was to eſtabliſh his credit in that powerful city, that he might uſe it upon any preſſing occaſion.

About the end of the year, he called to his privy-council John Morton, biſhop of Ely, lately returned from Flanders, and Richard Fox[t]. He lay under great obligations to Morton, particularly for his intelligence of what was plotting againſt him in Bretagne, and had a great value for Fox, knowing him to be a perſon capable of doing him great ſervice, and of a temper very like his own. In time, Morton was made archbiſhop of Canterbury, lord chancellor, prime miniſter, and at laſt cardinal. As for Fox, the king made him firſt, lord keeper of the privy-ſeal, then biſhop of Exeter: After that he tranſlated him to Bath and Wells, from thence to Durham, and laſtly to Wincheſter, the richeſt biſhopric in England. Theſe two prelates, with Urſwick, the king's chaplain, were almoſt always employed in the moſt important commiſſions, embaſſies, and negociations. Henry loved to employ eccleſiaſtics, becauſe he had always church-preferments ready for their reward. But he took care to promote them by degrees from ſmaller to more conſiderable ſees. Herein he found his own profit; for by tranſlating biſhops from one ſee to another, he made the more vacancies, and conſequently the firſt-fruits which accrued to the king, were greatly multiplied [u]. Never did prince more ardently ſeek occaſions to heap up riches. Avarice was his predominant paſſion, influenced even his meaner actions, and cauſed him to take many falſe ſteps, as will be manifeſt hereafter.

The events of this reign have ſuch a connection with thoſe of ſome other ſtates, that it is abſolutely neceſſary to ſhew the ſituation of the affairs of divers princes. Otherwiſe the motives of Henry the ſeventh's conduct would be but imperfectly known, who made in his time a great figure in Europe, though not ſo much by his arms as policy. I ſhall begin with Bretagne.

I have elſewhere obſerved, that Peter Landais, favourite of the duke of Bretagne, entirely governed that prince, who was old and infirm, and very much impaired in his underſtanding: that ſeveral lords of Bretagne had made a league againſt that miniſter, and intended to ſeize him: but having miſſed their aim, were expoſed to the vengeance of the favourite, who had cauſed them all to be condemned to die. In the beginning of this year, 1485, Landais, in the name of the duke his maſter, levied an army to execute the ſentence, and the lords on their parts took up arms in their defence. While Bretagne was thus divided, and the two parties ready to come to a battle, the condemned lords cauſed it to be repreſented to thoſe who ſerved Landais, that in the preſent affair, the intereſt not of their common maſter the duke, but of only his unworthy favourite, was concerned: that it was unjuſt to ſhed the blood of their countrymen in the quarrel of a man, who had notoriouſly abuſed his maſter's confidence: that therefore, to appeaſe at once the troubles of Bretagne, there was a much more natural and ready way than that of arms, namely, to rid themſelves of the miniſter, after which, not a man would refuſe to render due obedience to the duke. The lords of the duke's party deeming this expedient very reaſonable, were of opinion that it was for the intereſt of the country and the duke himſelf, that Landais, ſole cauſe of the troubles, ſhould be ſacrificed to the good of the public. Landais hearing that the lords of the two armies were contriving ſomething againſt him, cauſed a declaration to be drawn, wherein the duke ordered that all perſons of his own army, who held intelligence with the proſcribed lords, ſhould be deemed traitors and rebels. But this only ſerved to haſten his ruin. The chancellor who was in the plot againſt him, refuſed to ſeal the declaration, and informed the lords of it, who reſolved to have no further regard for the favourite. So, without giving him time to take other meaſures, they went in a body to the palace, and ſeized Landais in the duke's own apartment, who was forced to deliver him on condition they would ſpare his life: but that was not their intention. On the contrary, they brought him to a ſpeedy trial, and convicting him of a thouſand crimes, made him atone for them on the gallows, before the duke was informed of the ſentence. How much ſoever the duke was troubled at the death of his favourite, he could not help granting the lords of the two armies letters of pardon. Thus Bretagne would have been reſtored to her former tranquillity, had not the duke imprudently concerned himſelf with the troubles of the court of France, which proved the ruin of himſelf and dukedom. This is what muſt now be ſhewn, ſince it was the occaſion of the war which broke out between Charles VIII. and the duke of Bretagne, and wherein Henry VII. was concerned. Lewis XI. king of France, dying in the year 1483, left the government of the perſon of Charles VIII. his ſon and ſucceſſor, to his daughter Ann, wife of Peter de Bourbon lord of Beaujeu. Charles was fourteen years old, and conſequently of age according to the ordinance of Charles V. But as he had been ill educated [w], the king his father thought him uncapable of governing. The moment Lewis XI. was in his grave, Lewis duke of Orleans, firſt prince of the blood, refuſed to acknowledge Ann of Beaujeu for the king's governeſs; affirming a woman had no right to meddle with the affairs of the kingdom. The eſtates being aſſembled at Tours in January 1484, ended the diſpute by their authority. They confirmed the late king's will, and ordered that the duke of Orleans ſhould be preſident of the council in the king's abſence.

Whilſt the ſtates of France were aſſembled, the lords of Bretagne made their firſt attempt upon Landais before mentioned, which proved unſucceſsful. The ſentence which was given againſt them creating a dread of the favourite's revenge. they applied to Ann of Beaujeu to obtain the king her brother's protection. On the other hand, Landais ſeeing his enemies had recourſe to the lady Ann, thought he could not do better than rely on the aſſiſtance of the duke of Orleans. To that end, he entreated him to come to the court of Bretagne, putting him in hopes, the duke would give him in marriage Ann his eldeſt daughter and preſumptive heir. The duke of Orleans had eſpouſed againſt his will, Joanna daughter of Lewis XI. but had made againſt this forced marriage a ſecret proteſtation, which he meant to uſe in order to annul it at a more favourable juncture. So, pleaſed with the hopes Landais had inſpired him with, he came to Bretagne, where he was extremely careſſed. But he could make no long ſtay there, being obliged to aſſiſt at the king's coronation, which was performed in June this year. Probably whilſt he was in Bretagne, he concerted meaſures with the duke and his favourite to diſturb the government of Ann of Beaujeu, who was become abſolute miſtreſs of the king her brother's perſon and affairs.

Shorlty after, the duke of Orleans forming a league againſt the court, and retiring to Boiſgency, demanded that the ſtates of France might be aſſembled. He intended to annul the regulation, with reſpect to the government of the king's perſon. But Ann of Beaujeu cauſed the king to march againſt him with ſuch expedition, that he was forced to accept of ſuch terms as were granted him, becauſe his friends were not yet ready to aſſiſt him. By the agreement, the earl of Dunois and Longueville, who was conſidered as the chief adviſer, was baniſhed to Aſt in Piedmont, a town belonging to the duke of Orleans, with a command not to ſtir from thence without the king's expreſs licence.

The duke of Orleans being thus compelled to diſmiſs his troops, cauſed the greateſt part to liſt in the duke of Bretagne's army againſt the condemned lords. On the other hand, Ann of Beaujeu ſent likewiſe to the barons part of the king's troops. Landais's death, which happened ſoon after, was not capable to make the duke of Orleans deſiſt from his projects. He ſtood in need of the duke of Bretagne to ſupport him againſt the court, and even hoped one day to marry his daughter. On the other ſide, the duke of Bretagna having been greatly perſecuted by Lewis XI. and knowing Ann of Beaujeu was of the ſame character, and followed the ſame maxims, believed he could not do better than reſt upon the aſſiſtance of the duke of Orleans. So, after ſome private negociations, theſe two princes formed a league together, into which came John de Chalon prince of Orange, nephew to the duke of Bretagne, the duke of Bourbon, the earl of Dunois, the duke of Lorrain and ſeveral other princes and lords. Some time after the earl of Dunois returned into France without leave, and withdrew to his ſeat at Partenay in Poictou. The king was yet ignorant of the duke of Orlean's deſigns. But the earl of Dunois's return convincing him ſome plot was contriving in favour of that prince, who was gone to Blois, he ſent him a poſitive order to repair to court. The duke obeyed upon a ſecond ſummons; but next day, being informed ſome ill was intended him, feigned to go a hunting, and retired into Bretagne, where he was quickly followed by the prince of Orange and the earl of Dunois. This was in the beginning of the year 1486. We muſt now ſee what paſſed in the Netherlands.

Since the death of Maria of Burgundy, Maximilian of Auſtria her huſband had been involved in troubles, on account of the guardianſhip of Philip her ſon, become ſovereign of the Low Countries by the death of the ducheſs his mother. Brabant, Holland, and Zealand, had willingly received him for guardian: but Flanders and Hainault refuſed to obey him as ſuch.

The obſtinacy of the Flemings obliged Maximilian to make peace with Lewis XI. upon theſe terms: that the dauphin Charles, ſon of Lewis, ſhould marry Margaret daughter of Maximilian, as ſoon as they were of ſuch an age: that Margaret ſhould have for dower, Artois, French Comté, Macon, Auxerre, and be educated at the court of France. Purſuant to this treaty, Lewis kept thoſe provinces which he had already ſeized, and took Margaret home, till the marriage could be conſummated.

In 1483, Maximilian ſucceſsfully made war upon the Liegeois. That ſame year Hainault owned him for guardian of his ſon Philip.

In 1484, The Flemings ſtill perſiſting in their refuſal to acknowledge Maximilian for guardian, appointed governors for Philip, of whom Adolphus de Cleves, lord of Ravenſtein, was the chief. Their obſtinacy occaſioned between them and Maximilian a war, in which Charles VIII. took part by aſſiſting the Flemings.

This war ended in January 1485, in a treaty, importing, that the Flemings ſhould acknowledge Maximilian for guardian of his ſon, upon the expreſs condition that he ſhould not remove him from Flanders till of age. The treaty being ſigned, Maximilian made his entry into Gaunt, where a few days after was a ſedition, but which was happily appeaſed. During the reſt of the year, the Low Countries enjoyed a tranquillity which afforded Maximilian time to take a journey into Germany, to be elected king of the Romans. Let us now ſpeak of the Spaniſh affairs.

Henry IV. ſirnamed the Impotent, king of Caſtile, died in 1474, leaving only a daughter called Joanna, who was univerſally believed to be ſuppoſitious. For which reaſon, Iſabella ſiſter to Henry, and Ferdinand prince of Arragon her huſband, took poſſeſſion of the throne of Caſtile. They had a fierce war to maintain againſt Alphonſo king of Portugal, who being affianced to Joanna, ſuppoſed daughter of Henry IV. pretended to the crown of that kingdom. The war ended in 1479, to the advantage of Ferdinand and Iſabella, who compelled Alphonſo to deſiſt from his pretenſions. By the treaty upon that occaſion, it was agreed that Alphonſo, the king of Portugal's grandſon, ſhould marry Iſabella daughter of Ferdinand, when the parties were of age to conſummate the marriage.

John king of Arragon died that ſame year, leaving to his ſon Ferdinand the kingdom of Arragon, with a war to maintain againſt France, the occaſion whereof was this. King John had mortgaged to Lewis XI. Rouſſillon and Cerdagne for three hundred thouſand crowns. Afterwards, the inhabitants of Perpignan revolted from the French, whoſe dominion did not pleaſe them. Upon the news, John came to Perpignan, to try to perſuade them to remain in ſubjection to the French, till he could redeem Rouſſillon by payment of the mortgage. But whilſt he was labouring to appeaſe them, Lewis XI. cauſed the place to be beſieged, and John himſelf was ſhut up. The ſiege laſted four months, and at laſt, Ferdinand ſon of John, coming to his relief, obliged the French to retire. Shortly after, John being gone from Perpignan, Lewis ordered the place to be re-inveſted, and after a long ſiege became maſter of it. From that time the king of Arragon pretended, the king of France ought to reſtore Rouſſillon, without receiving the money lent, either becauſe of his expence in protecting his ſubjects, or becauſe the French had levied large ſums upon the mortgaged countries. But the king of France did not think himſelf obliged to this reſtitution, unleſs he was paid the three hundred thouſand crowns he had lent.

In 1485, Charles VIII. ſent an embaſſador to Ferdinand, who refuſed to receive him, without a poſitive power to reſign Rouſſillon and Cerdagne.

About the latter end of that year was born Catherine daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, who was afterwards queen of England, and will have a great ſhare in this hiſtory. Ferdinand and Iſabella had ſeveral other children, namely, Iſabella affianced to the prince of Portugal, John born 1477, and Joanna born in 1479.

I ſhall cloſe this digreſſion with the affairs of Scotland. James III. continued to govern his kingdom with oppreſſion and violence, regardleſs of the affection of his ſubjects. I have before obſerved, the duke of Albany his brother ſurrendered Dunbar to the Engliſh, and after the death of Edward IV. retired into France, where he ended his days at a tournament. From that time the Engliſh kept poſſeſſion of that place, though Richard III. promiſed to reſtore it. This promiſe being unperformed when Henry VII. aſcended the throne of England, James reſolved to recover Dunbar by force of arms. For that purpoſe, about the end of this year, or perhaps the beginning of the next, he beſieged and took the town. The ſeaſon, and the important affairs which Henry had in the beginning of his reign, permitted him not to prepare for its relief.

Such was the poſture of the affairs of the ſtates with whom Henry VII. had any concerns during the courſe of his reign. It is time now to return to our hiſtory.

[1486] How great an averſion ſoever the king might have in his mind to the houſe of York, he had too ſolemnly promiſed to marry the princeſs Elizabeth not to perform his word. Beſides, this marriage was neceſſary to amuſe the Engliſh, who ſtill flattered themſelves, that the king's intention was to confound his rights with thoſe of the houſe of York, notwithſtanding his precautions to hinder her being mentioned in the act of ſettlement. The nuptials were ſolemnized the 18th of January, with much greater demonſtration of joy on the people's part, than on the king's. There was much leſs ſatisfaction expreſſed on the days either of the king's entry or coronation: which was a clear evidence of the people's affection for the houſe of York, and particularly for the family of Edward IV. But this was not to be thought very ſtrange. The houſe of Lancaſter, of which there remained no branch but what was deſcended from the daughters, had been forgot during the reigns of the kings of the houſe of York. Though Henry reſted upon his deſcent upon the houſe of Lancaſter, he was known to be grandſon of a Welſh gentleman, and his mother to be ſprung only from a baſtard of that houſe, whom the credit of his father, and the circumſtances of the times, had cauſed to be legitimated. As for the princes and princeſſes deſcended from the lawful daughters of John of Gaunt, as they happened to be in Portugal, Caſtile, and Arragon, and where unknown in England, it was not ſurpriſing there was no great inclination for them. Henry did not like to ſee the people's joy for his marriage. He perceived Elizabeth had a greater ſhare in it than himſelf, and that conſequently he was thought really king only in right of his queen. This conſideration inſpired him with ſuch a coldneſs for her, that he never ceaſed to give her marks of it ſo long as ſhe lived. He deferred her coronation two whole years, and doubtleſs, would have done ſo for ever, if he had not thought it prejudicial to him to perſiſt in refuſing her that honour. Nay, perhaps he would have dealt with her, as Edward the confeſſor had formerly done by his queen, daughter of earl Goodwin, had not the deſire of children cauſed him to overcome his averſion. He had conceived ſo mortal a hatred to the whole houſe of York, that he loſt no opportunity to humble the Yorkiſts, behaving always to them not as a juſt king, but like the head of a party. In the courſe of his hiſtory will be ſeen divers proofs of his diſinclination to that houſe.

The day before the king's marriage was ſolemnized at London, his envoy at Paris had concluded with the court of France a three years truce, which was to expire January the 17th, 1488-9. Charles VIII. who began to form projects againſt Bretagne, willingly conſented to the truce, to tie up the hands of the king of England, and to hinder him from aſſiſting that dukedom. On the other ſide, Henry, who was ignorant of his deſigns, believed it could not but turn to his advantage to live in a good underſtanding with that monarch, becauſe he thereby rendered himſelf more formidable to his domeſtic enemies, who could no longer expect any diverſion from that quarter.

Shortly after, the king made Thomas Stanley earl of Derby high conſtable, and William Stanley his brother lord chamberlain. Theſe, of all the kingdom, were the two perſons the king was moſt indebted to, ſince they enabled him to gain the victory of Boſworth, which procured him the crown. The lord D'Aubeny was made governor of Calais for ſeven years.

Henry and Elizabeth being ſprung from the ſame ſtock, namely Edward III. had wanted a diſpenſation to marry, becauſe they were couſins in the fourth degree, It was the biſhop of Imola, Legate à Latere in England and Scotland, that had granted the diſpenſation by virtue of his commiſſion, which empowered him to grant that favour to any twelve perſons he ſhould pleaſe. The king thought at firſt this diſpenſation was ſufficient, and without farther reflection conſummated his marriage. Afterwards he conſidered, occaſion might be taken from thence to queſtion the validity of his marriage, and to maintain that a power granted for twelve perſons in general, could not be extended to ſovereigns. To prevent therefore any ſuch objection, he deſired the pope Innocent VIII. who then ſat in the papal chair, to grant him a diſpenſation immediately from himſelf, and peculiarly adapted to his caſe. Whereupon the pope ordered a bull to be drawn accordingly. But as the bull was dated March the 13th, about two months after the marriage, and mentioned not the conſummation, or the legate's diſpenſation, Henry deſired to have another with theſe two articles inſerted, which was granted him the July following. This ſhews how careful he was to prevent whatever would afford his enemies a pretence to diſturb him. But a precaution he took at the ſame time, makes this appear ſtill plainer.

With the firſt diſpenſation he received a bull confirming the act of ſucceſſion made by the parliament. The pope declared, "He had heard, that though the crown of England was fallen to Henry, not only by conqueſt and an unqueſtionable hereditary right, but moreover by the unanimous conſent of the nobles and people, and by an act of parliament[x]; and though undoubtedly and rightfully it belonged to him and the heirs of his body, yet, to put an end to the troubles which had long diſtracted the kingdom, he was deſirous to marry Elizabeth of York, eldeſt daughter and heir of king Edward IV. of glorious memory: that therefore having conſidered, with his brothers the cardinals, his intention in the ſpirit of charity, he had granted the diſpenſation neceſſary for marriage, and pronounced the children that ſhould be born of it lawful, and capable of ſucceeding to their father and mother; that he had granted this favour, not at the requeſt of Henry or Elizabeth, or any other in their name, but of his own motion, certain knowledge, and pure generoſity, as it was more largely expreſſed in the letters of diſpenſation, to which he gave the ſame force as if they were inſerted word for word in theſe preſents: that therefore he decreed, declared, and pronounced lawful, the ſucceſſion of the children iſſuing from this marriage, and confirmed the act of parliament concerning king Henry's title, and the ſucceſſion of his children ſupplying by his apoſtolical authority all defects of right or fact that might therein occur.

"That of his own motion and by his authority, he admoniſhed and required all the people of England and all the ſubjects of king Henry of what rank ſoever, to obey that prince, and expreſly forbad them to raiſe diſturbences about the ſucceſſion, or upon any other account whatſoever, or to infringe in any manner the diſpenſation, declaration, and act of parliament.

"That he pronounced ipſo facto excommunicate all perſons that ſhould raiſe any ſuch diſturbances, or infringe the aforeſaid, letters and acts, to be abſolved only by the holy ſee, or ſuch as ſhould be empowered by her, unleſs at the point of death.

"That if Elizabeth ſhould happen to die before Henry without iſſue, he decreed, agreeable to the aforeſaid act of parliament and confirmation, that the children of Henry by any other lawful wife ſhould ſucceed him by hereditary right, pronouncing excommunicate, as above, all perſons that ſhould oppoſe the ſucceſſion of his children. Granting on the contrary his benediction and plenary indulgence for all their ſins to thoſe who ſhould, in that caſe, aſſiſt Henry or his poſterity.

"Moreover, he enjoined all archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, deans, archdeacons, curates, rectors, priors, and ſuperiors of monaſteries, upon the penalties expreſſed in the holy canons, to excommunicate publicly, and to pronounce excommunicate, whenever they were required all perſons that ſhould breed any diſturbances upon that account, or oppoſe in any manner whatever the execution of the ſaid acts, notwithſtanding all conſtitutions and ordinances apoſtolical to the contrary," &c.

Nothing ſhews more how much Henry was himſelf convinced of the weakneſs of his title, than his procuring the pope's confirmation. This precaution was not only needleſs, but even unlawful, ſince it was directly againſt the ſtatutes of Præmunire, of which the Engliſh were ſo jealous. Accordingly, he had taken care to have it ſaid in the bull, that the pope granted the diſpenſation of his own motion, and without any previous requeſt; a clauſe evidently falſe. It is certain, the bull of diſpenſation ran in expreſs terms, that the pope granted it upon what was repreſented to him by Henry and Elizabeth. Beſides what the pope affirmed, that the crown of England was fallen to Henry by hereditary right, that heap and confuſion of the other titles, namely, the conſent of the nobles and people, the act of parliament, the king's marriage with Elizabeth; all this, I ſay, correſpond ſo exactly with Henry's uncertainty concerning his title, that doubtleſs, it proceeded not from the pope's own knowledge, but rather from the king himſelf, who had as it were dictated how the bull ſhould be worded. In fine, the pope would never have thought of confirming the act of ſettlement, if he had not been requeſted. But it was not convenient the king ſhould appear to have deſired ſuch a bull, ſince nothing could be more diſagreeable to the Engliſh. For taking ſuch a ſtep, even before the ſtatute of Præmunire was enacted, king John entirely loſt the affection and confidence of his barons, with the crown which he meant to ſecure by that expedient. Henry III. was like to undergo the ſame fate for taking precautions of this nature. Accordingly, it will hereafter be ſeen, that this bull was not capable of hindering the king's being frequently moleſted, The Engliſh were not, as formerly, ſuch bigots as to imagine the pope's authority could give Henry a title which he really had not.

Though the king had happily attained his ends, with reſpect to the act of ſettlement and ſucceſſion, he knew however what the parliament had done was not agreeable to the ſentiments of the people. He had been called into England to deliver the nation from the tyranny of Richard III. and not to diſpoſſeſs entirely the houſe of York. This is ſo true, that in caſe the Yorkiſts had not joined with him, in order to preſerve the crown in that houſe, by his marriage with Elizabeth, the Lancaſtrians would never have been able to raiſe him to the throne. The queen, widow of Edward IV. the duke of Buckingham, the lord Stanley, were not friends of the houſe of Lancaſter, though private enemies to the perſon of Richard. To theſe, however, Henry was chiefly indebted for his greatneſs. If the people had been conſulted, and at liberty to chuſe a ſovereign, Richard III. indeed would have been diſpoſſeſſed, but Elizabeth placed on the throne, and the earl of Richmond left in his exile in Bretange. Henry therefore was conſidered only as the inſtrument of their deliverance from the dominion of a tyrant. But as it was reaſonable to reward him, the giving him a ſhare of the royal dignity, by means of his marriage with the princeſs Elizabeth, was thought a great recompence. And if it was readily agreed that his right from the houſe of Lancaſter ſhould be united with Elizabeth's, it was rather to avoid freſh troubles by that expedient, than out of a belief of the lawfulneſs of his title. He had himſelf gladly accepted the propoſal, and upon that foundation it was that he formed his enterprize; otherwiſe he would have doubtleſs met with leſs aſſiſtance and much greater oppoſition. But he had no ſooner gained the battle of Boſworth, but he formed the deſign of reigning in his own right only, and excluding entirely the houſe of York, wherein he deceived the expectation of the Engliſh, and abuſed their confidence. This is what he had always in his thoughts, though he concealed his uneaſineſs with all poſſible care.

As the houſe of York had moſt adherents in the northern counties, Henry reſolved to take a progreſs into thoſe parts. He hoped that his preſence, with ſome acts of grace and favour he might have occaſion to diſpenſe, would be capable of producing a good effect. With this view, he departed towards the middle of the ſpring, and kept his Eaſter at Lincoln. During his ſtay in that city, he heard the lord Lovel, one of Richard the Third's favourites, Humphrey and Thomas Stafford, brothers, who had refuſed to accept of the general pardon, were gone out of ſanctuary[y], but to what place was unknown. As he was ignorant what their deſign could be, he continued his journey to York. Shortly after, he received more certain intelligence concerning the fugitives. He was told the lord Lovel was advancing towards York at the head of three or four thouſand men, and that the Staffords were in arms in Worceſterſhire before the city of Worceſter. This news gave him no ſmall uneaſineſs. He ſaw himſelf in that part of the kingdom where he knew he was not beloved, and where it was not eaſy to raiſe forces. Beſides, he had reaſon to fear the lord Lovel had correſpondents in York, and among the nobility of the county, conſequently there was no time to loſe. He muſt ſpeedily reſolve either to quit York, or take ſome courſe to oppoſe the rebels. In this ſtrait, he choſe to ſeem unconcerted, perceiving that flight could not but produce a very ill effect. So, without ſhowing any fear, he armed ſuch of his followers as were moſt proper to bear arms, and commiſſioned ſome truſty friends to raiſe men in and about York with all poſſible diligence. He was ſo fortunate, and ſo faithfully ſerved as to aſſemble in a ſhort time three thouſand men, of whom he gave the command to his uncle the duke of Bedford. But theſe troops were ſo ill armed, and in ſuch diſorder, that they were not much to be relied on. Beſides, they were raiſed in a county where the inhabitants were not well affected to the king. For this reaſon, Henry expreſly charged the duke of Bedford to avoid fighting if poſſible, till reinforced, and to proclaim, in his name, pardon to all that would lay down their arms. This precaution ſucceeded to his wiſh. The duke of Bedford approaching the mal-contents, ordered the proclamation to be publiſhed in terms denoting great ſuperiority and confidence. It had, however, little effect on the rebels. But the lord Lovel, their commander, fearing they would accept of the pardon, forſook them firſt. He retired all alone, and hid himſelf in Lancaſhire, at his friend ſir Thomas Broughton's, and ſhortly after paſſed into Flanders to the ducheſs-dowager of Burgundy. His army being without a leader, ſubmitted to the king's mercy. The Staffords who were beſieging Worceſter, hearing what paſſed in the north, raiſed the ſiege, and abandoning their troops, took ſanctuary in the church of Colnham, a little village near Abington. But that church enjoying no peculiar privilege, it was judged in the king's-Bench not to be ſufficient ſanctuary for traitors. So the two brothers being taken thence by force, Humphrey, the eldeſt, was ſent to London to be executed at Tyburn; but Thomas, as being ſeduced by his brother, was pardoned. This rebellion, the firſt in this reign, was like a blaze which laſted not long. It was quenched with the blood of one ſingle perſon. We ſhall ſee hereafter, others which coſt the king more to extinguiſh the flames.

On the 3d of July, the Scotch embaſſadors, who had been ſome time in London, concluded a truce with Henry, which was to end that day three years.

Cardinal Bourchier, archbiſhop of Canterbury died about this time. The king, deſigning to procure the archbiſhopric for dr. Morton biſhop of Ely, gave him the cuſtody during the vacancy, thereby declaring his intention, that no other biſhop might make an intereſt for the nomination. Accordingly Morton was elected ſome time after, but received not the pope's bull till December.

July the 22d, John de Bouteillier, lord Maupertuis, embaſſador of Francis II. duke of Bretagne, concluded at London with the king, a truce, or rather a prolongation of the truce, which ſtill ſubſiſted between England and Bretagne, till the death of one of the two princes. But the trade between the two nations, which was ſettled by ſeveral articles of the treaty, was to laſt till the death of the ſurvivor.

September the 20th, the queen was delivered[z] of a prince, though ſhe had been but eight months with child. The king would have the new born prince called Arthur, in memory of the famous Britiſh monarch, of whoſe race he deſired to be thought. The family of the Tudors being Britiſh or Welſh, it was not unlikely that Henry deſigned, by naming his ſon Arthur, to inſinuate his being deſcended from that illuſtrious monarch. It is certain, however, this report was not ſpread, nor genealogies forged to confirm it, till after the time we are ſpeaking of. Thoſe who governed the ſtate during Henry the Sixth's minority, were very far from this opinion, ſince, after the death of Catherine of France, the prince's mother, they ordered Owen Tudor, grandfather of Henry VII. to be ſent to the Tower for preſuming to marry the queen. Nay, ſome affirm, he was beheaded.

The king's proceeding to deprive the houſe of York of their right, had very much diſſatisfied the people, who expected quite another thing. They who had called in Henry had been in hopes, that the titles of the two houſes being mixed by his marriage with Elizabeth, there would be no more diſtinction between Yorkiſts and Lancaſtrians, but all might equally expect the places in the king's diſpoſal. Theſe hopes were further confirmed by the birth of prince Arthur, in whoſe perſon were united the litigious rights of the two houſes. But it was ſeen with extreme concern, that the king ſtill conſidered the houſe of York as rivals and enemies, and that his jealouſy reached to the queen herſelf, whoſe intereſt ſhould have been as dear to him as his own. For, not content to ſhew by his continual coldneſs, and by ſeveral mortifications, the little kindneſs he had for her, he had given her a very ſenſible mark of it, in deferring her coronation, as if ſhe had been unworthy to ſit on the throne with him. Nay, after ſhe had brought him a ſon, her coronation was no more talked of than when they were firſt married. This conduct plainly ſhewed, the houſe of York was ſtill odious to him, and that he feared to take any ſtep which might give the people occaſion to believe ſhe had ſome right to the crown. It was impoſſible but this affectation ſhould cauſe great concern in the Yorkiſts, who were much more numerous than the Lancaſtrians.

The diſcontent being almoſt univerſal, ſome malicious perſons ſpread a report, that the king intended to put to death the earl of Warwick, priſoner in the Tower, and the only remaining male of the houſe of York. Their deſign was, no doubt, to compare Henry with Richard III. who had taken away the lives of his two nephews to ſecure the crown, and to intimate to the people, that in changing kings, they had only received one tyrant for another. Moreover, it was openly rumoured, that one of Edward the IVth's ſons was ſtill alive, having as it were miraculouſly eſcaped his uncle's cruelty. All this plainly tended to ſound the people's inclinations. The king himſelf, whether he was the author of the rumour, as his hiſtorian affirms, or only fomented it by his carriage[a], was not ſorry the people ran after a phantom, becauſe it hindered them from too firmly adhering to the perſons of the houſe of York, which really exiſted. Mean while, as the eagerneſs wherewith the people ſwallowed the falſe report, was a clear evidence how ready they would be, if a favourable opportunity offered, to liſt againſt the king, ſo it gave occaſion to the project I am going to ſpeak of.

A certain Oxford prieſt, Richard Simon, perceiving the people's joy at the falſe report of one of Edward the IVth's ſons being alive, took it into his head to put upon the world for Richard duke of York, brother of Edward V. a young man named Lambert Simnel, a baker's ſon, whom he trained up in his houſe, and believed proper to act ſuch a part. He was about the duke of York's age[b], of good natural parts, and in all his behaviour had ſomething grand, and above his birth. Simon had ſcarce begun inſtructing his pupil, when another rumour was ſpread, that the earl of Warwick had made his eſcape out of the Tower. The news, though falſe, cauſed among the people ſo general a joy, that the prieſt thought fit to alter his project, and make Simnel paſs for the earl of Warwick. Simnel's age agreed better with the earl's and the circumſtance of his eſcape was ſuitable to the plot. His pupil was to be well inſtructed for that purpoſe, ſince he was not to perſonate a young man taken out of his cradle in his infancy, and concealed in ſome private place, but a prince well known, and brought up in the court of Edward IV. The earl was about twelve years old when impriſoned by Richard III. Simnel therefore was to learn to talk pertinently of Edward's court and to know particularly the lords and ladies that frequented it, as well as the king and queen. This gives occaſion to preſume, that the prieſt was himſelf inſtructed by perſons well informed, and that the plot was ſuggeſted to him. For, though he had the aſſurance to form ſuch a deſign, it is not likely he could inſtruct his pupil in many particulars, which he was neceſſarily to know. At leaſt, it is certain, the king imagined the queen his mother-in-law, and other friends of the houſe of York, were the real authors of the contrivance, and only made uſe of the prieſt as an inſtrument to execute their deſigns. The queen-dowager was extremely intriguing. It was ſhe that had ſet on foot the project in favour of the king when in Bretagne, and thereby ſhewn her credit with the Yorkiſts. Beſides, ſhe could not but be very much diſpleaſed with the king's coldneſs to her daughter, and his refuſing to have her crowned. This alone was ſufficient to cauſe the king to ſuſpect her. But perhaps, there was more than bare ſuſpicion.

Be this as it will, Simon or thoſe that employed him, not thinking proper to produce Simnel firſt in England, where he might be examined too cloſely, and by perſons too knowing, judged it convenient that he ſhould act his firſt ſcene in Ireland, where Simon the prieſt accompanied him. In all appearance, ſome meaſures had been taken for his reception in that country. Since Henry's acceſſion to the throne, he had very much neglected the affairs of that iſland, reckoning that being maſter in England, the Iriſh were not to be feared. Indeed, he made the duke of Bedford governor of Ireland, in the room of the earl of Lincoln, nephew of Richard III. but had continued the ſame deputy, the ſame chancellor, and all the reſt of the officers placed there by Richard. So, the duke of Bedford being ſtill in England, Thomas Fitz-Gerald earl of Kildare, commanded in Ireland as deputy, and his brother was chancellor [c].

It is more than probable, that the earl of Kildare was in the plot, and had even begun to take meaſures to cauſe Lambert Simnel, the pretended earl of Warwick, to be acknowledged in Ireland. Ever ſince June laſt, Henry had received notice that ſomething was contriving againſt his ſervice in that country, though he knew not the particulars. Upon this information, he ſent for the deputy to court; but the earl found means to cauſe the council of Ireland to write to him, that the deputy's preſence was abſolutely neceſſary in the iſland. Simnel being arrived at Dublin, addreſſed himſelf to the earl of Kildare as earl of Warwick, and informed him how he eſcaped out of the Tower. If the earl of Kildare had not been in the plot, or at leaſt wiſhed the thing to be as Simnel related it, he would doubtleſs have ſeized the pretender. It was his duty, as he commanded in Ireland in the king's name. But inſtead of taking that courſe, he left him of liberty, and ſo ordered it, with his brother the chancellor's help, that the arrival of the pretended earl of Warwick was divulged without their appearing to be concerned. They would firſt ſee how the people would be affected with the news. The impreſſion it made, was as great and as ſudden, as the authors of the plot could deſire. When it was known in Dublin, that the earl of Warwick was arrived, the people expreſſed ſo great a joy, that the deputy and chancellor believed there was no danger in acknowledging the pretender. So, after a conference with their friends and confidents, they ſolemnly waited upon him at his lodgings, and conducted him with great pomp to the caſtle, where he was treated like a prince [d]. Simnel received the reſpect that was paid him with a countenance and carriage that by no means favoured of the meanneſs of his birth. In a few days he was proclaimed in Dublin king of England, and lord of Ireland, by the name of Edward VI. The Iriſh regarded not the attainder of the duke of Clarence, his pretended father, having newly learnt by the example of Henry himſelf, that the advancement to the throne cancels all defects.

The news of ſo unexpected an event made the king very uneaſy, becauſe it ſtruck upon that ſtring, which he ever moſt feared; namely, his title, of the goodneſs whereof he was not himſelf thoroughly ſatisfied. Indeed, the victory of Boſworth had given him an opportunity to decide the queſtion himſelf in his favour. But he was very ſenſible, that if the titles of the two houſes came once more to be put in the balance, he ſhould want a ſecond victory to confirm his, whilſt the houſe of York would have reaſons more than ſufficient, if their affairs took a proſperous turn. In the next place, Ireland, where the pretended earl of Warwick was retired, was a country wholly devoted to the houſe of York, and conſequently it was not eaſy to attack the rebels there. For that purpoſe it would be neceſſary to lead thither a numerous army, which could not be done without immenſe charge. In fine, it was to be feared, the flames which began to appear in Ireland, would reach England, and that there was a ſecret correſpondence between the Iriſh and Engliſh. In this perplexity, he called a council of his moſt intimate friends [e], privately to conſult with them upon what was to be done in the preſent emergency. It is to be preſumed, that he told them, the queen-dowager his mother-in-law had raiſed the ſtorm, whether he had any proof, or it was only a ſuſpicion thought by him to be well-grounded.

Be this as it will, preſently after the council, he ordered his mother-in-law to be confined in the nunnery of Bermondſey in Southwark. Moreover he ſeized all her eſtate, which was very conſiderable. But as he did not care to diſcover to the public the reaſon of that rigorous uſage, becauſe he could not perhaps give ſufficient proof of her crime, he cauſed it to be reported, that ſhe was thus puniſhed for delivering her daughters into the hands of Richard III. This pretence rendered his action ſtill more enormous with the people. They could not help thinking it very ſtrange, that the queen-dowager ſhould be ſo ſeverely puniſhed for a fault, which might rather be deemed a weakneſs than a premeditated malice. In the next place it could not be conceived, why the king had ſo long neglected to enquire into this pretended crime. In the third place, ſince he had married her daughter, he ſeemed to have owned that ſhe was innocent, or at leaſt had forgiven her. Laſtly, all knowing her to have been one of the principal inſtruments of his advancement to the throne, they could not but abhor his ingratitude. This ſevere uſage was thought to be a plain indication of a ſettled deſign, to uſe all pretences to complete the ruin of the houſe of York and its adherents. But it was not only compaſſion for the queen's ſufferings, which gave riſe to theſe reflections; her example ſtruck terror into all the kingdom, there being very few families but what were guilty, either of having aſſiſted Richard III. or of not having oppoſed him. When it was conſidered therefore, that the king's mother-in-law was reduced to this ſad condition, for not having been willing or able to reſiſt the tyranny of the late king, every one was afraid of being called to account for the like crimes, which were ſuppoſed to be buried in oblivion. Notwithſtanding all this, the queen-dowager was confined to the day of her death, which happened not till ſome years after [f].

It was thought at firſt that the queen-dowager's misfortune proceeded from the cauſe publiſhed by the king. But it was quickly perceived to be the effect of the decrees of the ſecret council called by the king upon Simnel's affair. Shortly after, purſuant to another decree of the ſame council, the king ordered the true earl of Warwick to be ſhewn in public, who was led through the principal ſtreets of London, and then conducted in ſolemn proceſſion to St. Paul's, where multitudes were aſſembled to ſee him. There, all had time allowed them to view him attentively. Nay, he was made to talk with them that knew him beſt, and particularly with ſuch as were known to be well affected to the houſe of York; after which, he was again conveyed to the Tower. But the Iriſh maintained that the earl of Warwick ſhewn at London, was an impoſtor, and their's at Dublin the true earl. They even took occaſion from thence to exclaim againſt the king, for proſtituting the ceremony of a proceſſion to ſuch an impoſtor. The king fearing the miſchief would gain ground, thought to ſtop it, by proclaiming a general pardon to all that ſhould quit the rebels, and by promiſing a reward to thoſe that ſhould diſcover the ſecret of the plot. At the ſame time he ſent orders to guard the ports, that the mal-contents of England might not paſs over and join their friends in Ireland. But all this was not capable to break the meaſures of his enemies.

It was not only in Ireland that troubles were preparing for him. The readineſs wherewith ſome Engliſh lords and gentlemen embraced the opportunity to endeavour his ruin, plainly ſhewed, the conſpiracy had been laid ſome time before in England. Indeed, it is not likely, a ſingle prieſt ſhould have formed ſuch a project, without imparting it to perſons, more able than himſelf to accompliſh it. Be this as it will, John earl of Lincoln, declared by Richard III. his uncle, preſumptive heir of the crown, was the firſt that openly appeared to maintain the intereſt of the pretended earl of Warwick. He was ſon of John de la Pole earl of Suffolk, and Elizabeth ſiſter of Edward IV. and Richard III. The earl however ſeemed to act contrary to his own intereſt in ſiding with the earl of Warwick, who was nearer the throne than himſelf. But as probably he was not ignorant, the perſon in Ireland was a cheat, he did not queſtion that he ſhould eaſily deſtroy him, when he had made him his inſtrument to dethrone Henry. So, upon the firſt news of Simnel's being received and proclaimed king of Dublin, he embaaked for Flanders to concert with the ducheſs-dowager of Burgundy the means to accompliſh his undertaking.

Since the death of Charles duke of Burgundy, Margaret of York his widow, ſiſter of Edward IV. and Richard III. lived in Flanders where her dower was aſſigned her. As ſhe had no children by the duke her huſband, ſhe carefully attended the education of the archduke Philip, ſon of Maximilian of Auſtria, and Maria of Burgundy her daughter-in-law. She had with extreme concern ſeen the revolution which reſtored the houſe of Lancaſter to the throne, in prejudice of the houſe of York. She would however have been patient, if Henry VII. in uniting the two houſes by his marriage with Elizabeth, had held the balance even, and diſpenſed his favours impartially to the friends of both parties. But ſhe altered her mind, when ſhe ſaw Henry delayed marrying her niece till the crown was adjudged to himſelf without any mixture of the title of the houſe of York. She could not ſee without trouble, that even after his marriage he refuſed to let Elizabeth be crowned, an honour no queen of England had been debarred of ſince the conqueſt; and that the birth of a ſon had not induced him to do her that juſtice. So, perceiving his hatred of the whole houſe of York was implacable, ſhe did not think herſelf obliged to have any regard for him. On the contrary, ſhe believed, ſhe might without ſcruple labour his ruin. Indeed, it is certain whether this princeſs was concerned in the prieſt's and Simnel's plot before Ireland declared for him. It is however very likely, ſhe had helped to conduct it with the queen-dowager, the earl of Lincoln and ſome other friends of the houſe of York. For, the earl of Lincoln's voyage into Flanders, upon the firſt news of Simnel's arrival in Ireland, gives occaſion to preſume, he held private intelligence with the ducheſs of Burgundy, and from her expected the ſucceſs of the enterprize. The lord Lovel, who was in Flanders before him, was likewiſe in the plot as well as ſir Thomas Broughton, who ſtaid in England to ſend them notice of what was tranſacting there.

Whether the ducheſs of Burgundy contrived the plot herſelf, or was only informed of it by the earl of Lincoln, ſhe readily embraced an opportunity, which inſpired her with hopes of defeating Henry's eſtabliſhment. Having adviſed with the earl of Lincoln, lord Lovel, and ſome other fugitives, ſhe promiſed to furniſh them with two thouſand veteran German ſoldiers, under the command of Martin Swart, an officer of note, with whom they ſhould paſs into Ireland to ſtrengthen the new king's party. She did not at all doubt but theſe ſuccours coming from a foreign country would encourage the Yorkiſts to take up arms in England. In this ſituation were the king's affairs about the end of the year 1486. But before we proceed to the occurrences of the next year, we muſt briefly ſee what had paſſed in the neighbouring countries, eſpecially in France and Bretagne during the courſe of this year.

I left the duke of Orleans in Bretagne with the prince of Orange and the earl of Dunois. Theſe princes were no ſooner in that country, but many of their friends came and joined them, and even brought them ſome troops. The duke of Bretagne was old and infirm both in body and mind. Since the death of Landais he did not know who to truſt with the adminiſtration of his affairs, as he could not conſider his barons but as ſo many enemies, though he granted them a pardon. The duke of Orleans finding him thus embarraſſed, gained ſuch an aſcendant over him, that he governed Bretagne as if he had been the ſovereign. The advantage he enjoyed in that country, where almoſt every thing was in his diſpoſal, drew thither many Frenchmen, who came to offer him their ſervice. Mean while the duke of Bretagne aſſembled the ſtates, and cauſed his elder daughter Ann to be declared heireſs of the duchy, and in caſe ſhe died without iſſue, it was decreed, the younger ſiſter Iſabel ſhould ſucceed her.

The lords of Bretagne newly reconciled to their ſovereign, perceiving the duke of Orleans ruled abſolutely in the duke's name, and that the French flocked to him in ſwarms, began to entertain ſuſpicions of their prince. They were afraid he had ſent for all theſe ſtrangers to help him to be revenged of them for their outrage upon his favourite. In this belief, they aſſembled at Chateaubriant to conſult what was to be done to prevent the danger with which they thought themſelves threatened. They were headed by the lord of Rieux marſhal of Bretagne. Charles VIII. who was apprehenſive the duke of Orleans intended to make uſe of the duke of Bretagne's forces to raiſe freſh troubles in France, thought it his intereſt to cheriſh the Britiſh lords' diſcontent. He hoped thereby to hinder the duke of Bretagne from aſſiſting the duke of Orleans. To that end, he ſent to the barons aſſembled at Chateaubriant, Andrew d'Epinay, commonly called the cardinal of Bourdeaux, with an offer of his protection. The officer was gladly received by many of them, ſome of whom perhaps were already gained by the court of France. Others foreſeeing the inconveniences that might follow were for rejecting it. They alledged the ſeveral attempts of Charles's predeceſſors to become maſters of Bretagne, and how dangerous it was to admit the French into the country. In fine, to prevent this miſchief, it was agreed, that a treaty ſhould be made with the king of France, to determine the number of men he was to find them, and to ſet bounds to his pretenſions. Purſuant to this reſolution, they ſigned with the cardinal a treaty, importing that the king ſhould ſend them an aid not exceeding four hundred lances, and four thouſand foot, that he ſhould not take or beſiege any place, neither make any demands upon the duchy before duke Francis's death. Charles ratified the treaty, but, as he afterwards ſhewed, not with deſign to obſerve it.

The cardinal of Bourdeaux being returned to the king, told him, that during his ſtay at Chateaubriant, he had learnt that the prince of Orange was ſecretly treating of a marriage between Maximilian of Auſtria, and Ann, eldeſt daughter and heireſs of the duke of Bretagne. This diſcovery obliged king Charles to form the project of ſeizing Bretagne, if perhaps it was not quite formed already. The poſture of the affairs of Europe was extremely favourable. Ferdinand and Iſabella, king and queen of Arragon and Caſtile, little regarded the preſervation of Bretagne. Beſides, they were then employed in their wars with the Moors of Granada. But though Charles might have feared that Ferdinand would enter into ſome league for the duke of Bretagne's defence, he had an infallible way to prevent him: and that was, to reſtore him Rouſſillon, which was of much leſs conſequence than Bretagne to the crown of France. Henry VII. who had a manifeſt intereſt to oppoſe that enterprize, was embarraſſed with affairs that probably would hinder him from meddling with thoſe of others. It was preciſely at the time when the earl of Warwick began to appear in Ireland. As for the Low-Countries, Charles had not ſo much to fear from thence. Philip the ſovereign was ſtill a minor. Maximilian his father and guardian, who governed theſe provinces in his name, was but little regard. Though he had made peace with the Flemings, there was however a mutual diſtruſt, which would not ſuffer him to ſend his forces out of the country. Beſides, the war with France was renewed this year on account of Terouenne, ſurpriſed in full peace by the governor of Douay. In ſhort. Though Maximilian was the emperor's ſon, and choſen king of the Romans in February this year, he was always in extreme want of money, his new dignity having made no addition to his power [g].

[1487] In the beginning of this year Henry concluded with Maximilian a treaty wholly relating to trade, and which was only proviſional, till certain articles could be ſettled, upon which the Engliſh and Flemings with difficulty agreed. The trade between England and the Low-Countries was ſo neceſſary for the ſubjects of both princes, that it could not be interrupted without both being ſufferers. But for that very reaſon each ſtrove to reap ſome advantage from the ſituation of affairs, which rendered the treaties very difficult.

The biſhop of Exeter being tranſlated to Wincheſter, the king promoted to the vacant ſee, Richard Fox, who was already keeper of the privy-ſeal. Of all the courtiers, he was the perſon in whom the king placed the moſt confidence, next to the archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Mean while, Henry was not eaſy ſince the earl of Lincoln's retiring into Flanders. He knew the ducheſs of Burgundy to be haughty and enterprizing [h], and powerful enough to aſſiſt ſuch as would attempt to diſturb him. The earl of Lincoln's retreat into Flanders, preſently after Simnel's arrival in Ireland, left him no room to queſtion, there was a deſign formed between that earl and the ducheſs of Burgundy, to ſupport the pretended earl of Warwick. So, fearing the ſtorm would divide and fall upon him both from Flanders and Ireland, he reſolved to have two armies, under the command of the duke of Bedford and the earl of Oxford, to be ready at the ſame time to oppoſe the deſcent of the Flemings and the Iriſh, if they ſhould think of attacking England. Mean while, as he was not afraid of an invaſion before ſummer, he reſolved to improve the leiſure the winter ſeaſon afforded him, in taking a progreſs into the eaſtern counties of Suffolk and Norfolk. There was moſt danger from thoſe parts, by reaſon of the neighbourhood of the Low-Countries. When he was come to St. Edmunſbury, he heard, that the marquis of Dorſet was haſtening to clear himſelf of ſome imputations laid to his charge, and to offer his ſervice. But the king believing that after what he had lately done to the queen-dowager, the marquis her brother could have no great affection for him, refuſed to receive him, and ſent the earl of Oxford to meet him with orders to carry him to the Tower. He let him know however, that after the troubles were appeaſed he ſhould willingly hear him, and if he cauſed him to be arreſted, it was purely to provide for his own ſafety, by preventing his hearkening to thoſe that might give him ill advice [i]. Then he came to Norwich [k], from whence he went in pilgrimage to our lady of Walſingham[l], after which he returned to London[m].

It was not till the beginning of May, that the earl of Lincoln, the lord Lovel, and Martin Swart, ſailed for Ireland, with two thouſand Germans raiſed by the ducheſs of Burgundy at her own expence. Preſently after their arrival at Dublin, they proceeded to the coronation of the pretended king, which was performed with great ſolemnity, in the preſence of the earl of Kildare, the chancellor, and the reſt of the great officers, He was crowned with a crown taken from the head of the virgin's ſtatue in St. Mary's church, There were but two or three biſhops that refuſed to acknowledge the new king[n]. The hiſtory of Ireland ſays, that the pretended ſovereign ſummoned a kind of parliament, where the clergy granted the pope a ſubſidy, for fear the court of Rome ſhould take occaſion from theſe proceedings to trouble them.

The coronation being over, a great council was held to conſult what was next to be done. Their ſucceſs in Ireland, where not a ſword was drawn for Henry, made them expect great matters in England. The leaders fancied they were in a much better condition to overthrow Henry, than Henry himſelf was when he paſſed into England to overthrow Richard III. They ſcarce doubted of ſucceſs, being ſure as they imagined, the Engliſh for the moſt part would riſe in their favour. However, ſome were for making Ireland the ſeat of the war. They alledged, as the chief reaſon, that Henry would never venture to come over in perſon, or in caſe he quitted England, his abſence would occaſion in the kingdom inſurrections which would greatly promote the affairs of the new king. Had this advice been taken, Henry would have been very much embarraſſed. In that caſe, he muſt have had two ſtrong armies on foot, one to ſubdue Ireland, the other to keep all quiet in England. It is eaſy to ſee that at ſuch a juncture it would not have been prudent to leave England without troops, both by reaſon of the correſpondents the rebels might have there, and the neighbourhood of the ducheſs of Burgundy, who would not have taken advantage of ſuch a neglect. Accordingly, Henry, as I obſerved, had already reſolved to have two armies. But others on the contrary repreſented that Ireland was not able to pay the German troops, much leſs maintain a long war. That beſides the ſtanding upon the defenſive in Ireland was not the way to dethrone Henry, but the attacking him in England, where it was likely, they would meet with many friends. This advice was ſtrengthened by another reaſon, which was not alledged, but however was the real motive thereof, namely, that the Germans and Iriſh were in hopes of making their fortunes in England, whereas in Ireland, they had ſcarce wherewithal to ſubſiſt. So it was reſolved to paſs immediately into England, in the ſame veſſels that had tranſported the Germans. Mean while, Henry hearing of the earl of Lincoln's arrival in Ireland, with the foreign troops, was no longer embarraſſed, ſince he had only to defend himſelf from one quarter. So, giving orders that all his forces ſhould aſſemble near Coventry, he repaired in perſon to that city, which lies in the center of the kingdom, till he had certain advice of the deſigns of his enemies.

Some time after he heard that Simnel was landed in Lancaſhire[o], in company with the earls of Lincoln and Kildare, the lord Lovel and the German general. Sir Thomas Broughton joining the rebels with a ſmall body of Engliſh, they all marched together towards York, without committing any act of hoſtility in their rout, in order to draw the people to their ſide. But they found themſelves deceived in their expectation. Not a man, except what Broughton had brought, took up arms in their favour the Engliſh not liking at all to receive a king at the hands of the Iriſh and Germans. The earl of Lincoln, who commanded the army, had reſolved to avoid fighting, in expectation of being joined by great numbers of mal-contents. But ſeeing the people's coldneſs, he thought he ſhould come to a battle as ſoon as poſſible, leſt his army, which was but eight thouſand ſtrong, ſhould diminiſh inſtead of increaſing. So changing his rout on a ſudden, he marched towards Newark, in hopes to become maſter of that place before the king ſhould arrive.

Mean-while, Henry was advanced as far as Nottingham, where he held a council of war. He had yet drawn together but ſix thouſand men, and for that reaſon ſeveral adviſed him to decline fighting till the reſt of the troops which were expected, had joined him. But he was of another opinion. As he could not believe that the earl of Lincoln had formed ſuch an enterprize, without aſſurance of being aſſiſted, he judged it requiſite to give him battle without delay. Two days after he ſaw his army reinforced with five or ſix thouſand men[p], whereupon all the reaſons againſt the reſolution he had taken entirely vaniſhed. As ſoon as he had reviewed the new troops, he detached ſeveral parties of light-horſe to diſcover the earl of Lincoln's deſigns; and being informed he was advancing towards Newark, reſolved to prevent him. To that end he marched with ſuch expedition, that he encamped between the enemies' army and Newark. The earl of Lincoln advanced that day to a little village called Stoke, where he encamped on the ſide of a hill. Next morning, being June 6th [q], Henry offered him battle, leaving only in the plain a ſpace to ſerve for the field, But he was debarred of one great advantage, in that the ground being narrow, would not allow him to extend the front of his army, which was more numerous than that of the enemy. For which reaſon he was forced to draw up his army into three lines, having taken care to place in the firſt all his beſt troops to the number of ſix thouſand men. Probably the earl of Lincoln had deſignedly choſen that ground, in hopes, that if he could defeat the king's firſt line, they would fall foul on the reſt of the army, and put them in diſorder, as it happened to Richard III. in the battle of Boſworth. And indeed, it was the king's firſt line only that fought. They ſtood for three hours the efforts of the Germans, who being uſed to war, and well diſciplined fought with great order, and inſpired the Iriſh with courage. At length the earls of Lincoln and Kildare[r], and Martain Swart, being ſlain on the place, and moſt of the Germans killed or wounded, the Iriſh took flight, not being able alone to reſiſt the Engliſh. It is ſaid, there were at leaſt four thouſand killed on the ſide of the rebels, and half the king's firſt line. Which ſhews with what obſtinacy it was fought on both ſides[s].

Among the priſoners were found the new king of Ireland, become Lambert Simnel as before, and the prieſt his companion and inſtructor. Henry, either out of generoſity or policy, was pleaſed to give Simnel his life, and to honour with the office of turn-ſpit in his kitchen the perſon that had boldly aſpired to the throne, and even worn a crown. Some time after he was preferred to be one of the king's, falconers, in which office he died. As for the prieſt, he was immediately committed cloſe priſoner, and heard of no more. Some imagine he was privately put to death, others, that the king was pleaſed to ſpare his life, in order to learn the moſt ſecret circumſtances of the conſpiracy, and perhaps to confront him with the guilty, if there was occaſion. However it does not appear in hiſtory, that Henry made any diſcovery by that means: at leaſt, there was nothing divulged. If the queen-dowager was in the plot, ſhe could not be more rigorouſly puniſhed than ſhe was already, unleſs ſhe was brought to the ſcaffold. As for the ducheſs of Burgundy, ſhe had no occaſion to fear any proceedings againſt her. It is ſaid the king was extremely ſorry for the death of the earl of Lincoln, which robbed him of the ſatisfaction of knowing all the particulars of the plot. As for the lord Lovel, ſome ſay he was drowned in attempting to ſwim the Trent; others affirm, he was ſlain in the battle. Some again report, that he ſpent the reſidue of his life in a cave. Be this as it will, he appeared no more from that time.

Preſently after the battle, the king marched to Lincoln, where he made ſome ſtay, and then went to York. In his way, were tried many perſons accuſed of holding intelligence with the rebels. It is true, moſt of them were puniſhed only by fines, the king's ſole aim being to fill his coffers: and therefore he choſe rather that theſe trials ſhould be ended by commiſſioners of his own appointing, or by a court martial, than by the uſual courſe of juſtice, which was not ſo favourable to his deſign. For, in accuſations of this nature, the laws of England admit of no medium between death and abſolute diſcharge, and the king would have neither. But commiſſioners and court martials are not ſo ſtrictly confined to the letter of the law [t], but judge in a more arbitrary manner. Therefore the frequent encroachment, of what is called in England the martial law, upon the privileges of the people, has been the cauſe of reducing it within juſt bounds, ſo that it cannot take place but by an act of parliament made for that purpoſe [u]. As for adminiſtering juſtice by commiſſioners, it is true the king has ſtill that prerogative, but then he ſeldom uſes it, and in certain caſes only by commiſſions of Oyer, and Terminer [w], as they are called. It is certain, Henry upon this occaſion diſcovered his covetous and ſelfiſh temper. He pretended to favour the guilty in ſparing their lives: but this clemency was more than balanced by his ſeverity, in ſtripping them of their poſſeſſions. The crime they were charged with was not of having aſſiſted the rebels, but of having raiſed and diſperſed a report ſome days before the battle, that the royal army was cut in pieces. The king ſuppoſing that ſuch a report was ſpread only to diſcourage his friends, and hinder them from bringing him troops, made ſtrict enquiry after thoſe that were ſuſpected of this new ſort of crime. As his ſole aim was to make an advantage of the fines and confiſcations, the perſons commiſſioned for judges were more ready and leſs ſcrupulous to favour his deſign, than if the lives of the parties accuſed had been at ſtake. It may be eaſily gueſſed the king made choice of the fitteſt perſons for his purpoſe. His hiſtorian ſays, that Henry's progreſs to Lincoln and York, was more like an itinerary circuit of juſtice, than a king's progreſs to viſit his counties.

When the king had drawn what he wanted from the guilty or ſuſpected perſons, he ſent for a papal commiſſion, to impower the archbiſhop of Canterbury to abſolve thoſe that had incurred the penalty of excommunication decreed by the bull before-mentioned. The pope in the commiſſion took for granted, that they who had attempted to diſturb Henry in the poſſeſſion of the crown, were ſtruck with remorſe, and therefore he was willing, from a motive of charity, to eaſe their conſcience. But it was evident, that this was only for a further ſupport of the king's title.

At the ſame time Innocent VIII. ſent a bull to reſtrain a little the privileges of ſanctuary. It ran, that if thieves, murderers, robbers, regiſtered as ſanctuary-men, ſhould ſally out and commit freſh offences, and enter again, in ſuch caſe they might be taken out of their ſanctuaries by the king's officers. That as for debtors who had taken ſanctuary to defraud their creditors, their perſons only ſhould be protected, but their goods out of ſanctuary ſhould be liable to ſeizure. As for traitors, the king was allowed to appoint them keepers in their ſanctuaries to prevent their eſcape. Certainly it was a greater abuſe to make churches ſerve to protect villains. It had been long complained of in England, and probably the king had applied for a reformation, but could obtain only what we have juſt ſeen. Alexander VI. confirmed this bull in 1493.

In the king's progreſs to Lincoln and York, he had frequent occaſion to perceive that his partiality to the houſe of York, and injurious treatment of his queen in refuſing to have her crowned, were the main ſprings of the people's diſcontent. So, contrary to his inclination, and with a ſole view to prevent future troubles, he reſolved at laſt to do her that juſtice. He came to London the beginning of November, where he made a triumphant entry. Next day he went in proceſſion to St. Paul's, and had Te Deum ſung for his victory over the rebels. He was very glad to render it as conſpicuous as poſſible, in order to ſtrike terror into his enemies. Then he commiſſioned the duke of Bedford to execute the office of high-ſteward at the queen's coronation, which was performed on the 25th of November, with the uſual ſolemnities. The queen then was one and twenty years old, and had now been married two years. So the king's affected delay of her coronation, could not but be deemed a conſequence of a ſettled deſign to humble the houſe of York, and the queen in particular, whom the king conſidered as his rival. Accordingly, as it was eaſily perceived that his reſolution to have her crowned immediately after Simnel's affair was the effect of his fear, he was not thanked for it, becauſe he was believed to do it with regret. He likewiſe releaſed the marquis of Dorſet, without examination, probably to give the people ſome ſatisfaction. He intended to have it thought an act of grace, and withal to leave the marquis in the fear of being ſtill called to an account. But it is to be preſumed, that ſince he was ſo little inclined to ſhew mercy to the Yorkiſts, he would not have diſcharged the marquis ſo eaſily, had there been proofs to convict him.

Towards the end of the year, Henry ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to the pope, wherein the embaſſador that was ſpokeſman diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his exceſſive encomiums of the king his maſter. His praiſes would have paſſed for extravagant, if his commendations of the pope had not made them ſeem very moderate.

During the king's ſtay at York [x], after the battle of Stoke, public diſturbances in Scotland gave him an opportunity to enter into a negotiation with James III. from which he hoped to reap ſome advantage. I have ſpoken of James's character in the reign of Edward IV. and ſhewn how odious he had rendered himſelf to his nobles, even to their being forced to hang his favourites. The war made upon him by Edward IV. and his danger of being dethroned, ſeemed to have ſomething moderated his paſſions, or at leaſt obliged him to ſhew them leſs. But the death of prince Alexander his brother, and of Edward IV. and the troubles in England during the reign of Richard III. giving room to believe he had nothing more to fear, he returned to his former courſes. Without reflecting on the riſk he had run, he entirely gave himſelf up to a new ſet of favourites, men of mean birth, and no leſs odious to the nation than the former. But this was a trifle in compariſon of the deſign he afterwards formed. As he harboured in his breaſt a violent deſire of revenge upon the great men who had offended him, he reſolved to diſpatch at once all thoſe whom he conſidered as his principal enemies. To that end he careſſed them exceedingly, and became very familiar with them, the better to ſurprize them. When by this diſſimulation he had drawn almoſt all of them to court, he communicated his deſign to the earl of Douglas, and told him, he did not intend to neglect ſo fair an opportunity of deſtroying all his enemies at once. Douglas feigned to approve his reſolution, but privately warned the lords of their danger, and retired with them from court. The king being diſappointed, reſolved to execute his deſign by open force, and levied troops for that purpoſe; but the lords likewiſe armed for their defence. As all mutual confidence was deſtroyed, and nothing to be expected from an agreement with ſuch a prince, they found means to gain his ſon, by making him apprehenſive they were going to deliver Scotland to the king of England, if he would not put himſelf at their head. As ſoon as the prince had joined the lords, their party grew ſo powerful, that the king beginning to repent his enterprize, propoſed an agreement. But he was told there was no other way to a reconciliation, than the king's reſignation of the crown to his ſon. All hopes of peace vaniſhing upon that propoſal, James ſhut himſelf up in the caſtle of Edinburgh, from whence he diſpatched embaſſadors to the pope, and the kings of France and England, to deſire their aſſiſtance.

It was in September, whilſt Henry was at York, that the embaſſadors of Scotland came to him, under colour of treating of ſome differences concerning the fiſhery of the river Eſke. Henry, who had an admirable talent of turning all things to his advantage, thought this a good opportunity to be rid at once of the queen his mother-in-law and her two daughters, by marrying them in Scotland. For that purpoſe he ſent to king James, Richard Fox biſhop of Exeter, and ſir Richard Edgecombe, who agreed with him [y] upon the following articles, with their maſter's good pleaſure.

I. That purſuant to a former agreement, the marquis of Ormond, a Scotchman, ſhould marry Catherine, the third daughter of Edward IV.

II. That king James ſhould eſpouſe Elizabeth, widow of Edward IV. and mother to the queen of England.

III. That James duke of Rothſay, eldeſt ſon of the king of Scotland, ſhould marry another of Edward IVth's daughters.

IV. That the king of England ſhould reſign for ever to the king of Scotland the town of Berwick.

V. That, in order to ſettle the articles and conditions of the three marriages, commiſſioners on both ſides ſhould meet at Edinburgh the 24th of January next, and another aſſembly be held upon the ſame ſubject in May.

VI. That the two kings ſhould have an interview in July.

VII. Laſtly, That the truce concluded between the two kingdoms being to expire July the third, 1488, ſhould be prolonged to the 1ſt of September 1489.

Beſides,

Henry 7th

As for the ſuccours which James expected from Henry, they were not mentioned in theſe preliminaries. Probably, king James's embaſſadors were ſatisfied with a verbal promiſe.

Henry ratified theſe articles the 20th of December, but the king of Scotland's ratification is not with Henry's in the collection of the Public Acts. Perhaps James was prevented by the troubles in his kingdom, which daily increaſed, and cauſed this project to vaniſh into air, as will be ſeen under the next year.

The war continued all this time in the Low-Countries between Charles VIII. and Maximilian, to the advantage of the firſt, whoſe troops ſurpriſed St. Omer and Terouenne. Some time after, Maximilian having cauſed the lord Ruffingheim to be carried away and conducted to Wilvorde, the priſoner found means to eſcape and retire to Gaunt. Upon his arrival, he excited the Gantois to revolt, and take up arms againſt Maximilian. This war was of very great conſequence with regard to the affairs of Bretagne, of which it is neceſſary at preſent to give a particular though brief account, becauſe they are to be the ſubject of the hiſtory of the five following years.

The king of France and the lords of Bretagne had treated together with very different views. The lords imagined, it was an excellent means to ſecure them from the deſigns of their duke; and Charles perceived, it was an infallible way to conquer Bretagne.

In the beginning of the ſpring 1487, Charles ſent four armies into Bretagne, from four different quarters. The firſt alone was ſix thouſand ſtrong, which exceeded already the number he had promiſed to find by the treaty. Upon news of the invaſion, the duke of Bretagne ſeeing himſelf forſaken by almoſt all his barons, retired into the center of his country, being accompanied by the duke of Orleans, the prince of Orange, the earl of Dunois, and ſome other French lords of the duke of Orleans's party. He ſtaid ſome time at Maletroit, where he very haſtily aſſembled an army of ſixteen thouſand men ill-armed, and undiſciplined, by reaſon of the long peace Bretagne had enjoyed.

The duke's court was in ſo great conſternation, that none knew what courſe to take to reſiſt ſo formidable an invaſion. Indeed, means were found to engage the lord D'Albert, then in Navarre, to take the duke's part, on promiſe of a marriage with the princeſs Ann, heireſs of Bretagne. The duke himſelf, and all the reſt of the lords, the duke of Orleans excepted gave it under their hands to procure him that marriage, but without intention to perform their word. The duke of Bretagne did not think him conſiderable enough for his daughter. The earl of Dunois deſigned to marry the young princeſs to the duke of Orleans, and the prince of Orange was privately labouring to procure this rich match for the king of the Romans. Thus the engagement was only intended to perſuade the lord D'Albert to withdraw two troops of men at arms, which he had in the French army, and ſend them into the duke of Bretagne's ſervice. Poor refuge upon ſo preſſing an occaſion!

Mean while, the French being joined in one body, advanced into the country, and laid ſiege to Ploermel. The duke of Bretagne immediately marched to the relief of that place, but had the mortification to ſee himſelf forſaken by his army, of which there remained not with him above four thouſand men. Surprized at this unexpected accident, he retired to Vannes. But the French, now maſters of Ploermel, purſued him ſo briſkly, that he was obliged to embark in great diſorder, and ſhut himſelf up in Nantz. The French taking advantage of this conſternation, took Vannes and Dinant, and then beſieged Nantz. Some time before the duke had ſent the earl of Dunois to England to deſire aſſiſtance. But though the earl had embarked four ſeveral times, contrary winds had ſtill hindered him from purſuing his voyage. Mean while, the marſhal de Rieux, head of the mal-contents, perceiving king Charles ſo ill obſerved the treaty, complained of it in ſtrong terms. But, inſtead of receiving any ſatisfaction, he was told, that great offence was taken at his boldneſs.

Whilſt Charles was employed in the ſiege of Nantz, he heard the king of England had obtained a ſignal victory over his enemies, and the affair of the pretended earl of Warwick was entirely ended. 'Till then he had believed him ſo embarraſſed at home, that he had not vouchſafed to ſay any thing to him concerning the war with Bretagne. But when he knew him freed from his troubles, he ſent embaſſadors to try to divert him from any deſign he might have to interpoſe in that affair.

The embaſſadors found the king at Leiceſter, where they had their audience. They told him, that the king their maſter, conſidering him as his beſt friend, had ſent them to impart to him the ſucceſs of his arms in Flanders, and withal to congratulate him upon his victory over his rebellious ſubjects: That they were moreover charged to tell him, that the king their maſter was forced to enter into a juſt war with the duke of Bretagne, who had received the duke of Orleans, declared enemy of France, not to protect him, but ſolely with a view to aid him to raiſe commotions in the kingdom, by lending him the aſſiſtance of his arms: That the king of France could not omit taking proper meaſures to prevent his pernicious deſigns, and therefore this war with the duke of Bretagne was properly defenſive only, though he had cauſed an army to enter his dominions: That he that gave the firſt blow, was not to be deemed the aggreſſor, but he that gave the provocation: That the duke of Bretagne could not deny that he had harboured in his dominions, nay, in his very court, French rebels, and formed plots with them very prejudicial to France, without being able to complain of any injury: that therefore the king their maſter hoped from his wiſdom and juſtice, that before he concerned himſelf in the war, he would weigh the ill conſequences of a protection given to rebellious ſubjects, contrary to the law of nations, and the moſt ſolemn treaties, particularly by a Homager: That if he was obliged to the duke of Bretagne, on the other hand, he had not, doubtleſs, forgot the aid he had received from the king of France, when the duke of Bretagne had not only abandoned him, but was even going to deliver him to his enemy: That this aid was given contrary to the intereſt of France, ſince it would be better for her, that a tyrant, odious to all his ſubjects, ſhould reign in England, than ſuch a prince as himſelf: That therefore, the king their maſter hoped, he would not undertake the defence of the duke of Bretagne in ſo ill-grounded a quarrel, but on the contrary, aſſiſt his real friend, or, at leaſt, ſtand neuter.

The embaſſadors avoiding, as a rock, to ſpeak of their maſter's deſign to conquer Bretagne, the king thought not proper to mention it in his anſwer, though it was not difficult to perceive it through all their diſguiſes. He contented himſelf with telling them, that of all perſons he was moſt obliged to the king of France, and the duke of Bretagne. For which reaſon he was extremely deſirous to give them both real marks of his gratitude. That therefore he would, on the preſent occaſion, diſcharge the duty of a true friend by endeavouring amicably to end their differences, and very ſpeedily ſend them embaſſadors to offer his mediation.

Henry was not ſo blind, but he ſaw the king of France's intent. But unhappily for Bretagne, he was poſſeſſed with a notion, that Charles would never be able to execute his deſigns. His belief was founded upon the forces of Bretagne, which had hitherto ſucceſsfully reſiſted France; upon the natural levity of the French, who are eaſily diſcouraged by difficulties; upon the troubles the duke of Orleans could raiſe in the kingdom, by means of his friends; and upon the diverſion, the king of the Romans could make in Flanders. Purſuant to this notion, which appeared afterwards to be very wrong, he reſolved to become only mediator, without ſending any effective ſupplies to the duke of Bretagne. He did not doubt that king Charles would conſent to an accommodation, for fear of drawing upon him the arms of England. Indeed, it was evidently the intereſt of the Engliſh to prevent the ruin of Bretagne, and therefore Charles muſt have thought they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to oppoſe his deſign. Accordingly, Henry building upon this foundation, that Bretagne could not be ſubdued, if England ſeriouſly eſpouſed her quarrel, and that Charles would not believe him ſo impolitic as to ſuffer that duchy to become a province of France, imagined he would readily accept of his mediation, and deſiſt from his enterprize. He hoped to reap from thence two conſiderable advantages. Firſt, the reputation of making peace between the two princes, to whom he was equally obliged. The ſecond was much more important to him. As he was naturally very covetous, and as the deſire of amaſſing riches was the chief end of all his projects, he perceived this affair would furniſh an occaſion to demand money of the parliament, under colour of aſſiſting Bretagne, and that he might keep the money without employing it[z].

Purſuant to this ſcheme, he ſent embaſſadors[a] to king Charles to offer his mediation, and in caſe it was accepted, the embaſſadors had orders to make the ſame offer to the duke of Bretagne. Charles was then employed in the ſiege of Nantz, and as he hoped to be ſoon maſter of the place, ſaw nothing more after that, capable of hindering him from entirely conquering Bretagne. So, all his endeavours tended only to manage, that the king of England ſhould not aſſiſt the duke of Bretagne before the taking of Nantz. When the embaſſadors offered him the mediation of the king their maſter, he anſwered with great diſſimulation, he willingly conſented that the king of England ſhould act not only as mediator between him and the duke of Bretagne, but alſo as judge, and abſolute umpire of the peace. He was in hopes, either the duke of Bretagne would reject the propoſal, or if he accepted it, he ſhould poſſibly gain time till the taking of Nantz; after which he conſidered himſelf as maſter of Bretagne.

The embaſſadors imagining they had ſurmounted the greateſt difficulty, repaired to the duke of Bretagne, who was ſhut up in Nantz, and made him the ſame offer from their maſter. The duke of Orleans told them in the name of that prince, that at a time when his country was invaded, and ready to be ſwallowed up by the French, he expected rather an effective ſupply from the king of England, than a mediation, which muſt be fruitleſs, ſince nothing was more eaſy than to prolong the negotiation till Bretagne was loſt: that he intreated the king to remember the favours he had received in Bretagne, and conſider of what conſequence it was to England to hinder that dukedom from becoming a province of France. The embaſſadors returning with this anſwer to king Charles, he took occaſion to tell them, that for his part, he was very deſirous of peace, as plainly appeared by his propoſal, but was ſorry to find that the duke of Bretagne, beſet by the duke of Orleans, would never conſent, without being forced by the continuation of the war. This he artfully inſtilled into the embaſſadors, who at their return into England, told the king, it was proper to leave the duke of Bretagne in his preſent ill circumſtances, that he might be induced of himſelf to deſire the rejected mediation.

Mean-while, the ſiege of Nantz was vigorouſly carried on [b]. Charles, probably, would have at laſt taken the place, had not the earl of Dunois been detained in Lower Bretagne by contrary winds. Whilſt he was in thoſe parts, the inhabitants of the country hearing their duke was beſieged in Nantz, aſſembled to the number of ſixty thouſand men, with a reſolution to relieve him. The earl of Dunois percieving them in this diſpoſition, put himſelf at their head, and approached Nantz, the French not daring to attack the undiſciplined multitude. On the contrary, they contracted their quarters for their better defence, and ſo left the earl of Dunois free to throw ſuccours into the town. Which done, he ſuddenly retired, not deſiring to fight the French army with ſuch troops. This ſo ſeaſonable a relief, obliged the French to retire, in deſpair of taking the place. The raiſing of the ſiege confirmed Henry in his belief, that the conqueſt of Bretagne was too difficult for France. So, perſiſting ſtill in his reſolution to ſtand neuter, he had not even the thought of ſending ſuccours to the duke of Bretagne. He pretended however, to have his intereſt at heart, but it was only to procure a ſubſidy from the parliament, which he had ſummoned for the 9th of November. Mean while he ſent again the ſame embaſſadors to king Charles and the duke of Bretagne, under colour of being perfectly informed of the ſtate of the affair, in order to lay it before the parliament, though he knew beforehand what anſwer they were to bring back.

About this time Edward lord Woodville, the queen's uncle, deſired the king's licence to go and ſerve the duke of Bretagne with a troop of volunteers. Henry denied his requeſt, not thinking proper to aid one of the parties when he was offering them his mediation. Nevertheleſs Woodville ſailed from the Iſle of Wight, [of which he was governor] with four hundred men into Bretagne. This aid, though inconſiderable, made a great noiſe at the court of France. Charles publicly complained of it; but as Henry denied that the lord Woodville had carried theſe troops to the duke with his conſent, he was contented with that ſatisfaction. He was very careful, at ſuch a juncture, not to quarrel with Henry for ſo ſmall a matter.

Before the Engliſh embaſſadors arrived in Bretagne, there had been in that country a revolution prejudicial to the king of France's affairs. The lords of Bretagne who had treated with him, plainly perceiving his intention was to conquer the duchy, made their peace with the duke, and obtained a full pardon. The marſhal de Rieux, their head, was the laſt to comply. He would firſt be thoroughly convinced of the French king's deſigns, which yet he only ſuſpected. For that purpoſe, after privately treating with the duke of Orleans, he ſent a meſſenger to the king to tell him, that the duke of Orleans offered to quit Bretagne with all his followers, and therefore, ſince the French troops had entered Bretagne, only to expel that prince, he moſt humbly beſought him to recal them, purſuant to his treaty with the barons. Ann of Beaujeu, who was haughty and proud, imagining there was no need of any farther ceremony, told the meſſenger, the king had gone too far to recede, and would ſee the end of the affair. This anſwer obliged the marſhal to follow the example of the reſt of the barons, and be reconciled to the duke, who gave him the command of his army.

Though Charles had raiſed the ſiege of Nantz, he continued his conqueſts elſewhere. Soon after, his troops took the town of Dol by ſtorm; whereupon the duke not thinking himſelf ſafe in Nantz, thought fit to retire to Rennes. He ſaw himſelf extremely preſſed, and yet did not hear that preparations were any where making for his relief. In this extremity, he was perſuaded by the prince of Orange, to promiſe Ann his eldeſt daughter to the king of the Romans, though he had already promiſed her to the lord d'Albret. The prince of Orange made him believe that Maximilian, finding himſelf concerned to defend Bretagne, would not fail to come to his aſſiſtance with a powerful army. But at this very time, the revolt of the Gantios diſabled that prince to do any thing for Bretagne.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, Henry's embaſſadors in Bretagne had frequent occaſions to be convinced that Charles was only amuſing the king their maſter, and intended to conquer that duchy. Henry knew it ſtill better than they but was willing their report ſhould ſerve for foundation to demand a ſubſidy for the defence of Bretagne, though he ſtill believed the affair might be adjuſted without drawing the ſword. His ſole aim was to make the parliament apprehenſive of the loſs of Bretagne, that they might more readily ſupply him with money, which he intended to put entirely into his coffers.

The parliament met the 9th of November, juſt after the return of the embaſſadors. Care had been taken to divulge the report they had brought to the king, in order to prepare the commons to make a powerful effort in the defence of Bretagne. The archbiſhop of Canterbury [c], as lord chancellor, opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes, to this effect:

"That the king thanked his parliament for the acts paſſed in his favour at their laſt meeting; That he was ſo well ſatisfied of their affection, that he had made it a rule to himſelf to communicate to ſo good ſubjects all affairs, as well foreign as domeſtic, that might happen, and that one now occurred, concerning which he deſired to have their advice.

"That the king of France (as no doubt they had heard) was making fierce war upon the duke of Bretagne: That he alledged for reaſon the protection given by the duke of Bretagne to the duke of Orleans; but others gueſſed a very different motive: That both parties had applied to the king, one to pray him to ſtand neuter, the other to deſire a powerful aid: That the king having offered his mediation, found the French king ready to treat, but without diſcontinuing the war: That the duke on the contrary, though he was very deſirous of peace, and moſt wanted it, was averſe to a negotiation, not upon confidence of his own ſtrength, but upon diſtruſt of the French court's ſincerity: that after ſundry embaſſies tending to an amicable determination of this affair, the king had deſiſted from his mediation, becauſe he could neither remove the duke of Bretagne's diſtruſt, nor perſuade the king of France to ceaſe hoſtilities during the treaty: that this being the ſtate of the caſe, he deſired their advice, whether he ſhould ſend ſuccours to the duke of Bretagne, and enter into a defenſive league with him againſt France."

After thus ſtating the queſtion, he alledged ſeveral arguments pro and con, his aim being, under colour of leaving the parliament free to determine what they ſhould judge proper to make them ſenſible of the neceſſity of aiding Bretagne. This neceſſity was in effect ſo evident, that there was need but of a very moderate knowledge of the intereſts of the ſtate to ſee of what conſequence it was to England to prevent the conqueſt of Bretagne. However, it is worth noting, that the king knowing how much it concerned the Engliſh to defend Bretagne, alledged theſe reaſons by the mouth of his chancellor, only to obtain a ſubſidy, without intending however, to employ it in ſupport of the oppreſſed prince. This will plainly appear in his whole future conduct. The parliament, according to the king's expectation, failed not to adviſe him to undertake the defence of the duke of Bretagne, and granted him for that purpoſe as large a ſubſidy as had ever been given to any former king [d] on account of a foreign war [e].

As ſoon as the parliament broke up, Henry reſumed the way of negotiation with Charles, ſtill fancying that the terror of his arms would lead that prince to an agreement. The only means however to ſave Bretagne was to ſend thither a ſtrong aid, and declare war with France, according to the parliament's intention. But Henry had laid another plan, founded wholly upon his extreme deſire that the affair might be decided, without his being forced to expend the money lately received. He was content therefore with ſending embaſſadors to king Charles to notify to him the parliament's reſolution. But withal, as if he was afraid of going too far, he declared that the war on the part of England ſhould be only defenſive, and ſolely with reſpect to Bretagne.

The court of France eaſily perceived by theſe proceedings, that the king of England had no great deſire vigorouſly to puſh the affair, ſince when he ſhould have been preparing for war, he contented himſelf with ſending embaſſies. So, Charles told the embaſſadors, that he was always ready to accept of the king of England for arbiter of the differences between him and the duke of Bretagne; but did not intend to ſuffer himſelf to be amuſed with a treaty, which would only ſerve to give the duke time and opportunity to reſtore his affairs. That he ſhould be always willing to treat, provided it was not meant to require a truce deſtructive of his intereſts.

[1488] The winter procured the duke of Bretagne a ceſſation of arms, which all the inſtances of the king of England had not been able to obtain, as it obliged the king of France to put his troops into quarters, and return to Paris. Moreover in March, this year, the marſhal de Riux retook Vannes and Dinant, and garriſoned Ancennis and Chateaubriant. On the other hand, the lord D'Albret's two troops of men at arms deſerted the French ſervice, and joined the duke's army. But this little tnrn of fortune was of no long continuance. In April the king took the field again, and having retaken Ancennis and Chateaubriant, razed them to the ground. After that, he marched to Fougeres, and beſieged at once that place and St. Aubin du Cormier,

Mean time, the lord D'Albret having accepted the propoſal made him in the beginning of the war, came into Bretange to ſerve the duke with a thouſand horſe. Upon his arrival, he preſſed the duke to perform his promiſe concerning the marriage. The duke, who had privately promiſed his daughter to Maximilian, being greatly embarraſſed, put the young princeſs upon declaring, ſhe would never eſpouſe the lord D'Albret, though ſhe was not then above eleven years old. This oppoſition gave the duke a pretence to elude D'Albret's purſuits, till the princeſs's obſtinacy could be conquered.

Mean while, the unfortunate duke finding himſelf little able to reſiſt the French, and receiving aſſiſtance neither from Maximilian nor the king of England, ſent the earl of Dunois to Charles to ſue for peace. Charles did not think fit to return a poſitive anſwer. He was willing firſt to ſee the ſucceſs of his two ſieges. On the other hand, he was in treaty with Henry for a truce which he expected ſhortly to conclude; and that was to determine him, either to refuſe peace to the duke, or enter into treaty with him. So, keeping the earl of Dunois ſtill at court, under divers pretences, he put him off from day to day, till he had received certain advice from England. Shortly after he heard that Henry had ſigned at Windſor a truce, to commence the 14th of July this year, and to end the 17th of January, 1490. Thus having nothing to fear from England, he wholly applied himſelf to continue his conqueſts.

Moſt certainly Henry, in leaving the duke of Bretange to the mercy of his enemy, acted directly contrary to the parliament's intention, which had granted him a ſubſidy for the aſſiſtancce of that prince. The truce made without any neceſſity, when the duke of Bretagne was moſt preſſed, plainly ſhews, he ſuffered himſelf to be blinded by the court of France, or rather by the deſire of keeping the money granted by the parliament for the aid of Bretagne. The duke's occaſion for a powerful aſſiſtance could not be more preſſing. Charles was in the heart of his country at the head of a ſtrong army, taking his towns one after another, and he not able to make any reſiſtance. At the ſame time Henry was concluding with France a truce which tied up his hands, and afforded king Charles time and facility to conquer Bretagne. Wherefore his hiſtorian, prepoſſeſſed no doubt in his favour, and not imagining, he had thus cauſeleſsly forſaken the poor duke in his diſtreſs, mentions not this truce made with France at ſo unſeaſonable a time. Moreover he makes the ſuccours ſent by Henry into Bretagne, to arrive there the beginning of Auguſt this year, whereas it is very certain they came not till March ſeven months after. Theſe affected delays, which ſurpriſed all the world, proceeded wholly from the king's wrong notion of the war, and his deſire to end it, without being obliged to uſe the money given by parliament.

Mean time, the duke of Bretagne, the duke of Orleans, the prince of Orange, and the marſhal de Rieux, were in the utmoſt confuſion. The king of the Romans, the king of England, the duke of Lorrain, had ſeemed to eſpouſe their quarrel, but it did not appear that any of them were preparing to aſſiſt him. In this extremity a council was held to conſider what courſe was to be taken. Moſt were for marching to the relief of Fougeres, and joining battle rather than ſuffer that place to be loſt. The marſhal de Rieux oppoſed in vain this dangerous advice, by repreſenting that the loſs of a battle would infallibly be attended with the ruin of Bretagne. That it would be much wiſer to delay the time till the neighbouring princes ſhould ſee their own intereſt, ſince it could not but be extremely prejudicial to them to ſuffer Bretagne to be ſwallowed up by France. To this it was replied, that probably Bretagne would be loſt before any ſuccours arrived, and therefore the only way to ſave it was a victory. The duke of Bretagne's underſtanding was ſo impaired, that he was little able to judge ſoundly of an affair of ſuch conſequence. So, ſuffering himſelf to be governed by the counſels of the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange his nephew, he reſolved to march to the relief of Fougeres. But upon his approach, he found the town had already capitulated. Then he determined to relieve St. Aubin du Cormier, but the governor, for want of proviſions and ammunition, had ſurrendered a few days before.

Whilſt the duke of Bretagne was marching to St. Aubin, all the forces of France joined in one body, under the command of Lewis de Trimouille, for fear the duke had intended to retake that place. In a few days, the two armies were ſo near one another, that it was not poſſible to part without a battle. Whilſt they were preparing on both ſides, a rumour being ſpread among the Bretons, that the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange were going to betray them, they were upon the point of diſbanding. But the two princes removed their fears, by going amongſt them to charge on foot. The battle was fought the 28th of July, with fatal ſucceſs to the duke of Bretagne, who was defeated with the loſs of his beſt troops. The duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange being taken priſoner, the king commanded the firſt to be confined in the Tower of Bourges, but ſet the other at liberty. The four hundred Engliſh brought over by the lord Woodville, were almoſt all ſlain with their leader [f]. As the Engliſh were then diſtinguiſhed by a red croſs, twelve hundred [g] Bretons were joined to them with the ſame badge, to make the French believe, that freſh ſuccours were arrived from England. Perhaps, this gave occaſion to ſome to affirm, that king Henry had already ſent a freſh body of troops to the duke of Bretagne. The lord Verulam, who wrote the hiſtory of this reign,

[e] In this parliament, the authority of the Star-chamber, which before ſubſiſted by the ancient common laws of the realm, was confirmed in certain caſes by act of parliament. This court conſiſted of counſellors, peers, prelates, and chief judges. It took cognizance of forces, frauds, advances towards heinous or capital crimes not actually committed. The other remarkable ſtatutes now enacted were theſe; 1. That if any of the king's ſervants, under the degree of a lord, did conſpire the death of the king, or any of the king's council, or lord of the realm, as the lord ſteward, treaſurer or comptroller, it ſhould be felony. This law was thought to be procured by the lord chancellor, who being a ſtern and haughty man, and finding he had ſome mortal enemies in court, provided for his own ſafety. 2. The taking and carrying away women, having lands and goods (except female wards and bond-ſlaves) forcibly and againſt their wills, and the abetting of it was made felony. 3. It was otdained, that clerks convict ſhould be burned in the hand. 4. That the ſheriff ſhould certify the names of all his priſoners at gaol-delivery. 5. That all deeds of gift made to defraud creditors ſhall be void. 6. That coſts ſhall be awarded to the plaintiff, where the defendant ſueth a writ of error before execution had. Henry does not ſay this, but aſſures us, that eight thouſand Engliſh arrived within a few days, and offered the French battle, who did not think proper to accept it. Polydore Virgil and ſeveral others ſay the ſame thing. But herein they are miſtaken. Henry had not yet made any treaty with the duke of Bretagne, and it was not till after the duke's death, and in March the next year, that he ſent, as will be ſeen, ſix thouſand men to the ducheſs his daughter.

In a few days after the battle of St. Aubin, Lewis de la Trimouille ordered the city of Rennes, capital of Bretagne, to be ſummoned, but the inhabitants continued firm in their allegiance to their ſovereign.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Bretagne, Henry was levying in England, the money granted by parliament. That was a principal affair which he haſtened extremely, on pretence of the duke of Bretagne's preſſing occaſion for a ſpeedy aſſiſtance. All the counties, except Yorkſhire, and the biſhopric of Durham, readily paid the tax impoſed by the parliament. But in theſe parts, where the friends of the houſe of York, were very numerous, it was not collected with the ſame eaſe. Some factious perſons ſtirring up the people, the commiſſioners for gathering the ſubſidy met with ſo much oppoſition that they were obliged to make application to the earl of Northumberland[h], who immediately gave the court notice [and deſired the king's direction.] The king anſwered, he would not have one penny abated of the money granted by parliament, both by reaſon of the urgent occaſion, and becauſe other counties might be encouraged to deſire the like mitigation. Upon this anſwer, the earl of Northumberland, aſſembled the principal juſtices and freeholders of the county, and in very imperious terms declared to them the king's intention. The rough manner in which he ſpoke to them, without ſhewing any regard for perſons who were but too much incenſed, gave them reaſon to think, he himſelf adviſed the king to ſuch an anſwer. This being rumoured in York, the mob roſe and aſſaulting the earl's houſe, forced it open, and murdered him with ſeveral of his ſervants. But the mutineers did not reſt there. Preſently after, being inflamed by one John a Chamber, an incendiary, they ſet Sir John Egremond at their head, and publicly declared they were marching to London to give the king battle.

Henry being informed of the inſurrection, ſent into the north a body of troops under the command of the earl of Surrey[i], whom he had releaſed out of the Tower, and received into favour, preparing to follow him in perſon with more conſiderable forces. But whilſt he was on his way, he heard that Surrey had beaten and diſperſed the rebels, and John a Chamber was taken priſoner. As for Egremond, he had the good fortune to eſcape and retire into Flanders to the ducheſs of Burgundy, whoſe palace was a ſanctuary to all the king's enemies. Though this affair was ended, Henry, however, purſued his journey to York, where he ordered John a Chamber to be hanged on a gibbet raiſed in the midſt of a ſquare gallows, on which twelve of his accomplices were hanged round about him. After that, he returned to London, leaving the earl of Surrey preſident of the north, and Sir Richard Tunſtall his principal commiſſioner to levy the ſubſidy, of which he would not remit a farthing.

Mean time the news of the battle of St. Aubin being brought to the king, he ſeemed reſolved to ſend a powerful aid to the duke of Bretagne. But it was ſtill in hopes that the terror of his arms would oblige king Charles to conſent to a peace. This artifice was not, however, capable of deceiving the court of France, which plainly ſaw through all his deſigns.

The loſs of a battle had reduced the duke of Bretagne to a ſtate worthy of pity. He could no longer ſupport himſelf with his own forces alone, and ſaw no preparations for his defence, either in Flanders or England. Henry had put him in hopes of aſſiſtance, but was not in haſte to ſend him any. As for Maximilian, inſtead of being able to aſſiſt his future father-in-law, he was himſelf detained priſoner in a ſedition againſt him at Bruges, where ſeveral of his officers were killed. His captivity laſted from the beginning of January to the 15th of May, and his releaſe was then owing to the emperor Frederick his father, who had marched into the Low-Countries at the head of an army to his relief. So, inſtead of thinking to aſſiſt Bretagne, he was himſelf ſeeking on all ſides for foreign ſuccours againſt the Flemings. To that end, forgetting his engagements with the duke of Bretagne, he ſent this very year to the king and queen of Spain, to demand in marriage Iſabella their eldeſt daughter, and at the ſame time Jane their ſecond daughter for his ſon Philip. The firſt of theſe demands could not be granted, Iſabella being already promiſed to the Prince of portugal. But the other was effected in time. At laſt in September, Philip de Cleves lord of Roveſtein, heading the Gantios and ſurpriſing the city of Bruſſels, Maximilian retired into Germany, leaving in the Low-Countries, Albret duke of Saxony to command in his place, in the name of the archduke his ſon.

There was therefore no appearance of aid for the duke of Bretagne, either from England or the Low-Countries, or in ſhort from any other place. In this diſtreſs, the unfortunate duke humbly ſued to the king of France for peace, who very readily complied with his requeſt, not from a motive of generoſity, but to put it entirely out of his power to defend himſelf, by cauſing him to loſe the aſſiſtance of the king of England, whoſe intereſt it was to ſupport him. Though Henry had agreed to a truce with France, which was not to expire till January 1490, Charles was afraid however he would change his mind, and aſſiſt the duke his ally with all his forces next campaign. In order therefore to divert him from this thought, he very willingly concluded a peace with the duke of Bretagne, intending to keep it no farther than was conſiſtent with his intereſts. For in his whole conduct, with regard to Bretagne, he did not ſeem more ſcrupulous than his father king Lewis XI. was in all his negotiations.

The diſcuſſion of Charles's pretenſions upon Bretagne, delayed for ſome time the concluſion of the peace which was negotiating at Verger, a ſeat belonging to the marſhal de Rieux, where the king then was. Charles pretending, that after the deceaſe of the duke of Bretagne the guardianſhip of his daughters belonged to him as ſovereign lord of the duchy, this pretenſion was diſputed by the Bretons, who affirmed the dukes of Bretagne had never done liege-homage to the kings of France, and conſequently they had no right to claim the guardianſhip in queſtion. It was no favourable juncture to decide, in favour of the Bretons, that ſo long and as yet undetermined diſpute. But this pretenſion of Charles was a triſle, in compariſon of another, of much greater conſequence. He maintained that the duchy itſelf belonged to him, by virtue of a certain grant to king Lewis XI. from the lady de la Broſſe, heireſs of the houſe of Blois, who had formerly diſputed Bretagne with the anceſtor of Francis II. This was renewing an old quarrel, which had been ended by ſeveral treaties, and particularly by that of Guerande, whereby the houſe of Blois relinquiſhed all claim. However, Charles inſiſted not obſtinately upon theſe two articles, contenting himſelf with having intimated his pretenſions, in order to proſecute them in time and place. So, the treaty was concluded about the end of Auguſt, importing that Charles ſhould remain with the places he had conquered, and withdraw his forces out of the reſt of Bretagne. But he did not intend to obſerve this laſt article. The duke ratified the treaty at Coyron, where he then was, and therefore it is called by the Bretons, the treaty of Coyron, and by the French, the treaty of Verger, or Vergy.

A few days after, namely, on the 9th of September, died Francis II. duke of Bretagne, in a very advanced age, and with his underſtanding ſo impaired, that for ſome years paſt, he had been uncapable of governing the ſtate. Ann his eldeſt daughter, about twelve years old, ſucceeded him. The duke her father had appointed her for guardian, the marſhal de Rieux, who was to be aſſiſted by the earl of Cominge. But Philip de Montauban chancellor of Bretagne found means to carry away the young ducheſs to Guerande, where under colour of giving her advice, he made her ſpeak as he pleaſed. This occaſioned, between the marſhal and the chancellor, a quarrel, which proved very prejudicial to the ducheſs, and to all the Bretons in general.

Henry hearing of the duke of Bretagne's deceaſe, openly declared, that he conſidered the intereſt of the young orphan ducheſs as his own, and ſeemed to prepare in earneſt to aſſiſt her. But as he knew likewiſe that a few days before the duke's death, a proviſional treaty had been concluded till all the king of France's pretenſions were ſettled, he did not queſtion that the affair would be ended by way of negotiation. The buſineſs was only to hinder king Charles from taking advantage of the conſternation of the Bretons. This he imagined would be effected, by openly proclaiming his concern for the ducheſs's affairs. He ſtill believed, Charles feared him, and rather than break with him, would reſign much of his pretenſions. So, his aim was to become arbiter of the difference, and avoid a war which would have forced him to empty his coffers.

For this purpoſe it was that he ſent embaſſadors to the king of the Romans, to the archduke his ſon, and to the kings of Spain and Portugal, to make the king of France believe, he was labouring to form a league againſt him. He ſent alſo an embaſſy to Charles himſelf [k], to preſs him to end entirely the affair of Bretagne by a treaty. At the ſame time, he ſent Edgecombe and Ainſeworth to offer his aſſiſtance to the ducheſs, and empowered them to promiſe in his name, to find her ſuch a number of troops, upon ſufficient ſecurity for the re-payment of the charges. We ſhall ſee under the next year, to what all the embaſſies tended. But before we proceed, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention the revolution in Scotland.

The affair of Bretagne ſo employed the kings of France and England, that James III. could obtain no aſſiſtance from either, againſt the lords who had the prince his ſon at their head. The mal-contents would have been very glad to decide the quarrel by a battle. But the king ſtill kept in the caſtle of Edinburgh, where it was not poſſible to force him. Though Charles and Henry had promiſed him aid, they were not very deſirous to eſpouſe his quarrel. Mean-while he was ſtill in hopes, and therefore kept cloſe, expecting the performance of their promiſe.

Whilſt his affairs were in this ſituation, he was adviſed to quit the caſtle of Edinburgh for Sterling as the more convenient place, and there expect the foreign ſuccours. James taking this advice, began his march with his few troops, and immediately the lords followed him. He was however far enough before them to be ſecure, if the governor of Sterling, bribed by his enemies, had not refuſed him admittance. So, not knowing where to go, he reſolved to return to Edinburgh; but meeting the army of the mal-contents, was forced to fight, though much inferior in number of troops. He was killed in the battle, which was fought in the month of June. After his death, James IV. his eldeſt ſon, about fifteen years old, was proclaimed in his room by the lords who had placed him at their head. But all the Scots were not ſatisfied with this change. There were many that refuſed to own the young prince, whom they taxed with being the murderer of his father, and gave him great diſturbance for ſome time. In July the new king ſent embaſſadors to Henry, to notify his acceſſion to the crown [l].

[1489] On the 10th of February, this year, the embaſſadors ſent into Bretagne concluded a treaty with the ducheſs, of which the principal article was, that the king engaged to ſend into Bretagne an aid of ſix thouſand men. To conſider this alone one would be apt to imagine Henry acted only upon a principle of generoſity, or at leaſt for the intereſt of his kingdom. But he had no ſuch thought: his ſole aim was firſt to hinder Bretagne from being over-run by a ſudden invaſion of the French, in order to give room for a treaty; in the next place, to draw a pecuniary advantage from the ſuccours ſent the ducheſs, the expences whereof he was willing to advance, in order to be afterwards repaid with uſury. As the treaty manifeſtly ſhews his intereſted views in this affair, it will not be improper to inſert the ſubſtance of each article; which, added to what will be ſaid hereafter, will ſerve in great meaſure to give a juſt idea of this prince's character.

I. The ancient treaties between England and Bretagne ſhall be obſerved.

II. There ſhall be a conſtant friendſhip and alliance between the king of England and the ducheſs of Bretagne.

III. They ſhall mutually aſſiſt one another in caſe either is attacked.

IV. If the king ſhall carry war into France for the recovery of Guienne and Normandy, the ducheſs ſhall find him troops according to her power.

V. The king ſhall alſo aid the ducheſs, if ſhe carries the war into France for the recovery of her right, without prejudice however to the truce concluded between England and France, which is not to expire till the 17th of January, 1490.

VI. Neither of the two parties ſhall admit into his dominions the rebellious ſubjects of the other.

VII. The king ſhall ſend the ducheſs at his own charge an aid of ſix thouſand men, upon condition that a ſufficient number of theſe troops be allotted to guard the cautionary towns hereafter mentioned, which ſhall be delivered to the king. But the number ſhall not exceed five hundred.

VIII. Theſe ſix thouſand men ſhall ſerve the ducheſs at the king's expence till the firſt of November.

IX. Immediately after that day the ducheſs ſhall find ſhips with all neceſſaries, to tranſport the troops into England.

X. The ſix thouſand men ſhall be embarked at Portſmouth about the middle of this inſtant February, or at fartheſt by the end of the ſaid month, upon veſſels provided by the ducheſs.

XI. The ducheſs engages to repay the king all his expences for the tranſportation of the troops, both out and home, and for their maintenance whilſt in her ſervice, as alſo for the defence of the cautionary towns hereafter mentioned.

XII. The reimburſement ſhall be made in England.

XIII. It may be made at ſeveral payments; the cautionary towns remaining in the king's hands till the whole is paid.

XIV. Immediately after the arrival of the ſix thouſand men in Bretagne, the ducheſs ſhall deliver any two of the following places the king ſhall chuſe, Tonclaromneau, Hennebond, Averoy, Vannes, Guerande, with all their revenues, to be kept till the king is fully repaid, without any deduction, and then only he ſhall be obliged to reſtore them.

XV. If the king carries war into France upon his own account, and the ducheſs find him ſuccours, her expences ſhall be deducted out of what ſhe ſhall owe the king. In like manner, if the king aid the ducheſs in an offenſive war with France, ſhe ſhall repay his charges upon that occaſion.

XVI. If any of the places now poſſeſſed by the king of France be retaken, the king ſhall have liberty to chuſe one or two of thoſe places, in the room of one or two of thoſe which ſhall then be in his hands. Upon condition, however, that he chuſe not Breſt and Tonclaromneau at the ſame time.

XVII. Two commiſſioners ſhall be appointed on each ſide, to ſettle the king's expences for the aſſiſtance of Bretagne.

XVIII. The ducheſs ſhall ſwear before the Engliſh embaſſadors, that ſhe will not demand again the cautionary towns till the whole debt be paid. The marſhal of Bretagne with three or four of the principal lords ſhall take the ſame oath.

XIX. Before the cautionary towns ſhall be delivered to the king, they ſhall be furniſhed with a ſufficient quantity of artillery, and a fortnight's proviſions.

XX. The fairs and markets ſhall be kept there as uſual.

XXI. As ſoon as part of the king's troops ſhall arrive in any port of Bretagne, the ducheſs ſhall ſend to the ſhips ſixteen hoſtages; namely,—or at leaſt four of them to be detained till the cautionary towns are delivered.

XXII. The ducheſs, the marſhal, and three or four of the principal lords, ſhall ſwear upon the holy Goſpels, that ſhe will not make a contract of marriage with any perſon whatever, without the king's conſent.

XXIII. She ſhall make no alliance, nor hold intelligence with any prince, except the king of the Romans and the king of Spain, nor even with theſe without the king's conſent [m].

XXIV. She ſhall conclude neither peace nor truce for above two months, nor even make a truce for that time, without including the king.

XXV. The king promiſes the ſame thing on his part.

XXVI. The treaty of commerce between England and Bretagne of the 22d of July, 1486, ſhall be renewed.

XXVII. The king and the ducheſs ſhall give mutual ſecurity for the obſervance of the treaty of commerce.

XXVIII. Engliſh money ſhall paſs in Bretagne after this manner,—the king ſhall be obliged to receive the ſame money in payment.

It is eaſy to perceive that in making this treaty Henry had three different views. Firſt, to prevent Charles VIII. from becoming maſter of Bretagne, whilſt the ducheſs was ſo little able to reſiſt him. If Charles ſhould have finiſhed the conqueſt of Bretagne next campaign, as was very eaſy, Henry would have been blamed by all Europe; particularly he would have been inexcuſable to the parliament, who had granted him a very conſiderable ſubſidy for the defence of that duchy. His ſecond view was to frighten the king of France, by the ſending of Engliſh troops, into a compliance to end the affair by way of negotiation. This is manifeſt from his lending the ſix thouſand men for eight months only, and that too when they were of no ſervice but to prevent the court of France from violating the treaty of Vergy then in force.—His third and chief aim was, to ſecure the reimburſement of what he was going to advance for the maintenance of the ſix thouſand men for eight months. He had already projected the keeping for his own uſe the ſubſidy granted by parliament for the defence of Bretagne, in the expectation of deciding the affair by his mediation. Mean while, he ſaw that the young princeſs, in her circumſtances, could not reſiſt the king of France, if he thought of purſuing his conqueſts. So, to oblige king Charles to enter into treaty, it was neceſſary to ſhew him the ducheſs would not want protectors, if he pretended to continue to uſe the way of arms. He could not help therefore advancing the money, ſince the ducheſs was not able to do it. But withal he took ſo great care not to loſe his money, that it is viſible from the treaty his principal aim was the repayment of his expences. There are two farther remarks to be made upon his conduct: firſt, it is probable he would lend his troops but for eight months, leſt the ſum ſhould mount too high, and conſequently become difficult to be repaid. Secondly, he was willing not only to ſecure the principal, but to receive it alſo with intereſt. For after receiving places in mortgage for his ſecurity, he left the ſum undetermined, in order to have it ſettled by commiſſioners: he knew that when he had the towns in his hands, Anne would one day be forced to ſubmit to what he ſhould preſcribe, and it would be in his power to mount the charges of levying and maintaining his troops as high as he pleaſed. What I am ſaying is not a bare conjecture, ſince we ſhall find in the ſequel that he raiſed this expence to an exorbitant ſum. Thus Anne was ſo bound by the treaty, that this aid was no leſs expenſive to her than the French army itſelf, which remained quiet without any attempt, though it ſtill continued in the country. Charles had fully deſigned to take advantage of the conſternation of the Bretons after the death of their duke: but in a council held upon that occaſion, the chancellor de Rochefort was utterly againſt it, from motives of honour and equity. His opinion made the deeper impreſſion upon the king, as he ſtill feared that though the king of England acted but faintly, he would alter his mind: beſides, Henry's embaſſies at Spain, to the king of the Romans, and to the archduke, gave the court of France ſome uneaſineſs: as they were afraid of a league, which would have obſtructed the execution of a grand project already formed, and which will be mentioned hereafter.

Whilſt the treaty was negotiating at Redon, the ducheſs's affairs were in a deplorable ſtate. She not only ſaw a French army in the heart of her country, and in poſſeſſion of ſeveral towns, but moreover was deſtitute of men and money. What was ſtill more grievous in ſuch a juncture, was the diſſention among the principal lords. The marſhal de Rieux pretended to govern her as her guardian: but Philip de Montauban, her chancellor, had ſuch an aſcendant over her, that he cauſed her to conſider the marſhal as her enemy, ſo that ſhe abſolutely refuſed to be under his guardianſhip. Montauban's pretence to exaſperate her was, that the marſhal would marry her to the lord d'Albret: but the chancellor repreſented to her that the marſhal intended to ruin her, by giving her a huſband unable to protect her: he even inſinuated that the marſhal was bribed by the king of France, whoſe intereſt it was to marry her to a lord not ſupported by any prince in Europe. Perhaps the chancellor was himſelf gained in favour of the king of the Romans. Be this as it will, their diſſention was carried ſo far, that the marſhal de Rieux cauſed the gates of Nantz to be ſhut upon the ducheſs, and even threatened to beſiege her in Rennes. It is not therefore ſurpriſing that Montauban, who managed the ducheſs's affairs, ſhould agree to the treaty of Redon, ſince, by the arrival of the Engliſh forces, his party would be greatly ſtrengthened.

The Engliſh ſuccours at laſt arrived in March, which, with Henry's embaſſies to ſeveral courts, made king Charles imagine he intended to act vigorouſly in defence of Bretagne[n]. In that belief, finding he could not execute his deſigns by open force, without entering into a war with the Engliſh, and drawing perhaps other enemies upon himſelf, he thought ſome other courſe ſhould be taken. There was on foot a treaty of peace between him and Maximilian, and between Maximilian and the Gantios, by the mediation of the German princes aſſembled at Francfort. As this treaty was in a fair way, he did not queſtion but a peace would enſue. He had in his power Margaret, daughter of the king of the Romans, in order to eſpouſe her when marriageable, and was not ignorant of the late duke of Bretagne's engagement with that prince concerning his daughter's marriage. So, not at all doubting that his future father-in-law, with whom he was going to conclude a peace, would be ready to favour him, he ſent and offered the ducheſs of Bretagne to make him umpire of their differences. Anne gladly accepted the propoſal, being almoſt ſure of the favour of a prince who expected to marry her; and Maximilian did not want much intreaty to become arbiter of an affair, in which he himſelf was ſo much concerned. Thus Charles, Anne, and Maximilian, acted all three with inſincerity.

The embaſſadors of France and Bretagne being met at Francfort, concluded by the mediation of the king of the Romans, a proviſional treaty, importing that Charles ſhould reſtore the places conquered upon Bretagne, except Dinant, St. Aubin, Fougeres, and St. Malo: that theſe four towns ſhould be committed in truſt to Maximilian, and the duke of Bourbon and the French troops march out of the reſt of Bretagne: that on her part, the ducheſs ſhould ſend away the Engliſh: and in April next a congreſs be held at Tournay, to adjuſt all diſputes: that, in the mean time, both parties ſhould ſend their reaſons to Avignon, to be examined and diſcuſſed by civilians, that their opinions might ſerve for the inſtruction of the mediators.

This treaty was without effect, though both parties ſeemed pleaſed with it. Anne was obliged by the treaty of Redon to deliver two places to the king of England, and theſe two places were to be kept by five hundred Engliſh: by the preſent treaty ſhe promiſed to ſend away all the Engliſh. But as the five hundred men which kept the two places were not excepted, Charles pretended he was not bound to execute the treaty of Francfort till all the Engliſh were departed from Bretagne, to which Anne could not oblige them. So, though in November, purſuant to the treaty of Redon, the Engliſh forces returned into England, the five hundred men however remained, and it was not in the ducheſs's power to ſend them away, unleſs ſhe repaid the king of England all his charges, which was impoſſible. The affair reſted therefore in the ſame ſtate it was before the treaty of Francfort, and the two parties neither ſent their reaſons to Avignon, nor their embaſſadors to Tournay.

Mean-time Maximilian's marriage with Anne was negotiating with all poſſible ſecrecy. Maximilian's agents repreſented to the young princeſs the honour ſhe would enjoy of being queen of the Romans, and in time empreſs. But with this honour ſhe would have wanted a powerful aſſiſtance, which her lover was not able to give her: he could not draw any forces out of Flanders and ſend them into Bretagne without breaking with France, included in his late peace with the Gantios: beſides, that peace was ſo ill ſecured, that it did not laſt a whole year. Thus Maximilian, ſon of an emperor, himſelf king of the Romans, and governor of the Low-Countries, had only empty titles, which gave him little power. Nevertheleſs, the young ducheſs was ſtill made to expect a powerful aid from him; whether her adviſers wilfully ſhut their eyes, or becauſe there was then no other prince in Europe from whom ſhe could hope for aſſiſtance. The king of England might have protected her, but had entertained ſo wrong a notion of the affair, that the event alone was capable to undeceive him.

At laſt the marriage was accompliſhed in November, with a ceremony then altogether new in thoſe parts; for the prince of Naſſau, embaſſador and proxy of Maximilian, put his naked leg into the bed where the ducheſs was laid, as a ſort of conſummation. This was done however with ſuch ſecrecy, that neither Charles nor Henry appear to have known it till March 1491. It is true, Argentré, hiſtorian of Bretagne, ſays that from the beginning of the year 1490, all the public acts ran in the name of Maximilian and Anne. If ſo, it would be hard to conceive how their marriage could be kept private. But very probable Argentré was miſtaken one whole year; for we find in the Collection of the Public Acts of England, ſeveral commiſſions of the year 1490, in the name of the ducheſs alone, and the firſt there with Maximilian's name, is dated in March 1491[o].

[n] He ſent thither a reinforcement ſome time after, as appears by his proclamation, dated Auguſt 16, 1489. Rymer's Fœd. tom. xii. p. 377.

[o] There was a parliament held in the beginning of the year 1490, which met at Weſtminſter, January 13, wherein the following ſtatutes were enacted: 1. That no finer of gold or ſilver, nor parter of the ſame by fire or water, ſhould allay any fine ſilver or gold, or ſell either of them to any perſon, but only to the officers of mints, changes, and goldſmiths within the realm: and that all ſilver be made ſo fine, that it may bear twelve penny-weight of allay in a pound weight. 2. That no butcher kill any manner of beaſt within the walls of London, upon pain of forfeiting for every ox twelve pence, and for a cow and every other beaſt eight pence; this to extend to every city, borough, and town walled, within the realm of England; Berwisk and Carliſle excepted. 3. That benefit of clergy ſhall be allowed but once: and that perſons convicted for murder ſhall be marked with an M, upon the brawn of the left thumb; and other felons with a T. 4. That no perſon whatever ſhall hold more than one farm in the Iſle of Wight. There were ſome other laws then made, which are either repealed, or of ſmall conſequence. See ſtatute 4 Henry VII. cap. 2, 3, 13, 16. and Bacon, p. 596, 597.

Henry 7.

[1490] Though the Engliſh troops were returned, Charles renewed not hoſtilities in Bretange. This forbearance made Henry imagine he had attained his end, that is, had frightened Charles by the ſole appearance of a rupture. The truth is, Charles was greatly embarraſſed: he could not think of letting go Bretange, and on the other hand perceived it would be very difficult to finiſh the couqueſt without drawing on himſelf a war from England, and perhaps from ſeveral other ſtates.

Mean-while, Anne ſeeing the war would be infallibly renewed as ſoon as her marriage was divulged, uſed all her endeavours to convince Henry of the neceſſity of ſending freſh ſuccours to Bretange, without diſcovering however the true reaſon. For that purpoſe ſhe ſent to him, in February, 1490, chancellor Montauban and other embaſſadors, with orders to deſire aſſiſtance, and a poſitive power to promiſe in her name that ſhe would never marry without his conſent [p]. This ſhews her marriage with Maximilion was ſtill a ſecret which ſhe did not think fit to divulge. In their inſtructions, the embaſſadors were ordered to acquaint the king with her proteſtation in form againſt her farther's engagement with the lord D'Albret, and with whatever D'Albret and de Rieux had done to compel her to ratify the ſame. This was an inſinuation of her wanting his aſſiſtance, as well againſt her own ſubjects, as the king of France, and that Bretagne was in danger from both. But all this was not capable to move Henry. Inſtead of treating with the ducheſs about freſh ſupplies he ſent embaſſadors to France [q], with power to treat with king Charles concering all that princes differences with the ducheſs of Bretagne. He was ſtill of opinion, that Charles dreading the junction of England with Bretagne, wanted only a peace. In this belief, he reſolved to make him pay for it, inſiſting upon a freſh demand, hitherto unthought of, namely, the arrears of the penſion which Lewis XI. was bound to pay to Edward IV. by the treaty of Pequigny, which by a ſubſequent treaty was to continue till the death of the ſurvivor of the two kings. Theſe arrears amounted to the ſum of one hundred and twenty-five thouſand crowns, which, the embaſſadors had orders to demand. From that time, this article was always inſerted in the king's commiſſions to treat with France. Henry imagined that in Charles's treaty with Anne, of which he thought himſelf almoſt ſure, he would ſubmit to this article, leſt it ſhould be an oſtable to the peace.

Whilſt his embaſſadors were in France, he could not diſpenſe with appointing commiſſioners to treat with thoſe of Bretagne. But it was only to amuſe them. The negotiation ſolely tended to a treaty, which ſtill more ſtrongly than the former, ſecured him the reimburſement of his charges on the ducheſs's account, without any mention of the deſired aſſiſtance. The whole amounted to ſome verbal promiſes on the king's part, that he would never forſake the ducheſs. He believed this aſſiſtance was entirely needleſs in the preſent ſituation of the affair, ſtill imagining, king Charles was wholly inclined to a peace. Mean-while, Charles in his turn amuſed the Engliſh embaſſadors, reſolving to conclude nothing, till he could more plainly diſcover Henry's intention. He had an army in the bowels of Bretagne, and ſeveral towns in his poſſeſſion, and Anne was little able to expel him with her own forces alone. For that reaſon, he willingly waited for a favourable opportunity to end the affair otherwiſe than by the king of England's mediation, of whom he was too jealous. Henry thinking him peaceable inclined, made it his chief buſineſs to ſecure the payment of what he had advanced for the aſſiſtance of Bretagne. And therefore under colour that the city of Nantz was in danger of falling into the hands of the French, he demanded to have it in his power, promiſing to reſtore it whenever required. But preſently after he heard the lord D'Albret had prevented him, and that deſpairing to marrying the ducheſs, he had joined with France and taken that rich city, where he had made a great booty.

During theſe negotiations, freſh troubles aroſe in Flanders, very prejudicial to the affairs of the ducheſs of Bretagne. The duke of Saxony, who commanded in Flanders for Maximilian, having publiſhed an edict concerning the coin, the inhabitants of Breges refuſed to comply with it, and drew the Gantois into their revolt. The king of France who deſired nothing more than to ſee war kindled in Flanders, ſent aid [r] to the rebels, under the command of marſhal Deſquerdes governor of Picardy [s]. On the other ſide, Maximilian, or the duke of Saxony in his name, ſent embaſſadors to Henry to make a league with him againſt France.

When the aid arrived from Picardy, the rebels made great progreſs, and after taking Ipre and Sluys, beſieged Diximude. Henry, angry with Charles for delaying his anſwer ſo long, and moreover being concerned to ſupport the archduke, reſolved to ſend him aid. To that purpoſe, he ſuddenly diſpatched the lord Morley [t] with a thouſand men to Calais, with orders to the lord D'Aubeney, governor of that place, to relieve Diximude, if poſſible. D'Aubeney, joining a thouſand men of his garriſon [u] to thoſe come from England, marched directly to Diximude, which was not well inveſted. He entered the town by night without oppoſition, and at break of day, ſallying out of the oppoſite gate, fell upon the camp of the French and Flemings, and entirely routed them [w]. This affair bred a great coldneſs between Charles and Henry. But Charles durſt not complain, ſince he had no more right to aſſiſt rebellious ſubjects, than had Henry to aſſiſt the ſovereign.

Mean time, the embaſſadors of Bretagne waited at London to no manner of purpoſe. The king gave them however good words, which ſerved only to engage them the more to do his, inſtead of the ducheſs's affairs. On the 26th of July he required of them an acknowledgment, that he had punctually executed the treaty of Redon: a freſh engagement to reimburſe all his charges, and a promiſe to deliver to him Morlaix and Concarneu, upon the hopes of an aid which he never intended to give. However, it was neceſſary, in order to attain his ends, to make the king of France believe he really deſigned to aſſiſt the ducheſs of Bretagne, ſince it was the only means to ſtop his proceedings. Charles ſeemed to have ſome knowledge of Henry's thoughts, for he appeared more cold than ever with reſpect to his agreement with the ducheſs. He returned no direct anſwer, neither did he talk of reſtoring his conqueſts upon Bretagne, or of paying the arrears of the penſion due to the death of Edward IV. So, Henry thought it time to proceed more openly, and give that monarch reaſon to fear not only the arms of England, but alſo of ſeveral other ſtates. In the beginning of this year, he had renewed the treaties of alliance with Portugal and Denmark. In September he concluded with Maximilian and his ſon Philip a league againſt France for their mutual defence, and for that of the ducheſs of Bretagne. At the ſame time he publiſhed a treaty, made with Ferdinand and Iſabella in March the laſt year. By this treaty, the two kings engaged to make war upon the king of France, unleſs he would reſtore Rouſillon to Ferdinand, and Guienne and Normandy to Henry. Moreover, they agreed upon a marriage between Arthur prince of Wales, Henry's ſon, and Catherine third daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, as ſoon as the prince was fourteen, and the princeſs twelve years of age. His treaty with the king of the Romans was to the ſame purport. The three princes were to enter France at the ſame time, each at the head of an army, as well for their own as for the intereſts of the ducheſs of Bretagne. But by ſecret articles ſigned two days after, there were ſo many reſtrictions concerning the time, manner, and conditions of the war, that it plainly appears, Henry's ſole aim was to frighten the king of France. By one of the ſecret articles, the time of the invaſion was fixed to the 15th of Auguſt, 1492.

The 4th of October, Henry concluded with John Galeazzo duke of Milan a treaty of alliance, containing only general articles of amity and good underſtanding. Mean-while, Henry failed not to reap this advantage, that theſe negotiations which were openly tranſacting, embarraſſed the French, king. Indeed all theſe treaties, the ſecret articles whereof he knew not, gave him uneaſineſs. He had reaſon to fear, that a league was forming againſt him, which would obſtruct not only the conqueſt of Bretagne, but alſo that of the kingdom of Naples, which he had been ſome time meditating. It was this that hindered his renewing the war in Bretagne, though the ducheſs's circumſtances were ſuch, that it ſeemed eaſy to diſpoſſeſs, her entirely. Beſides, Henry's conduct appeared ſo extraordinary, that he knew not what to think. That monarch made great noiſe about the league he was forming for the defence of Bretagne, and yet ſent no aid.

In this uncertainty, Charles resolved to send an embassy into England, under pretence of detaching Henry from the duchess's party, but in reality to know by his answer what he was to hope or fear from him. He chose for that purpose Francis de Luxemburg viscount of Martigues, Waleram de Sams, and Robert Gaguin, general of the order of the Trinity. These embassadors being arrived in London, had their audience of the king, where nothing particular passed. Some days after, the king having nominated to treat with them Richard Fox, bishop of Exeter, Thomas earl of Ormond, and some others [x], in their first conference, the general of the order of the Trinity being the speaker, made the most submissive and cringing speech that ever came out of the mouth of a French embassador to a foreign prince, according to Henry VIIth's historian. As I have several reasons to suspect this speech to be rather the historian's than the embassador's, I shall only relate the principal points, without keeping to the very words, or mentioning certain articles which seem to me altogether improbable [y].

The embassador began with saying, "Their master had sent them to pray a peace with the king of England, and his respect for that great prince induced them to pass by all formalities, and make advances unusual in such sovereigns as he. He would not however conceal from him another motive which made him desirous of peace. Having resolved to carry his arms into remote countries, it could not but be for his advantage, that all the world should know he was in friendship with all his neighbours, and particularly with the king of England. Then the embassador himself took care to excuse Henry's sending aid into Bretagne and Flanders, though it was against France, and owned it to be no just cause of rupture between the two crowns. As for Flanders, he justified the king his master's sending troops thither, because it was his duty to protect the Flemings his vassals [z] against the king of the Romans their oppressor. After that the embassador added, king Charles intended to make war upon the kingdom of Naples, unjustly detained from him by a bastard of the house of Arragon. That kingdom belonging to him by undoubted right, he was bound in honour to try to recover it. But his thoughts did not rest there, his purpose being to make the conquest of Naples serve as a bridge to transport his forces into the east, and overthrow the empire of the Turks, to which he was invited, as by a voice from heaven, by a rent in the Ottoman family. This therefore being a resolution for a holy war, he was content for the honour and advantage of the Christian religion, to beg peace at the hands of all the princes of Europe, that he might not be diverted by any obstacle from them."

The embassador concluded with saying, "He had only another affair to mention, not as a subject of treaty, but as a mark of his master's great desire to preserve a good understanding with the king of England, namely, being sovereign lord of Bretagne, and as such guardian of the duchess, he requested that with the king of England's consent, he might dispose of her marriage as he should think fit.

Some days after, the embassadors of France being sent for to the council, the chancellor returned them the following answer from the king: "that the king his master had not forgot his former love and friendship with the king of France. That if the friendship was still the same, there was no occasion to talk of it: but if not, it was not words but deeds that must renew it: that as for the affairs of Bretagne, he could not help thinking it strange that the king of France should make him his instrument to ruin one of his best allies, and moreover pretend he was very much obliged to him for it: as for the duchess's marriage, he meant not to meddle with it, provided the king of France would proceed by law and not by the sword: that however, what had passed in Bretagne as well as in Flanders did not make so deep an impression, as to refuse to treat of peace, if all their other affairs might be debated at the same time. That as for the war upon Naples, the king had but one thing to say, which was, as the king of France thought himself bound in honour to try to recover that kingdom, so for the same reason the king brought himself obliged to exert his utmost for the recovery of Guienne, Normandy, and the kingdom of France itself, which of right belonged to him."

Henry had easily discovered the design of this embassy, and that by a general proposal to live in peace with him, Charles had no other view than to sound his intentions with respect to Bretagne. Wherefore, according to the maxim he had established which was to frighten him, he threatened a war not only for the interest of the duchess of Bretagne, but also for his own. Mean-while, it is likely he hurt himself by carrying the artifice too far, and that Charles was sensible this answer was only words, which would not be followed by deeds. It was not at all probable, that in the then situation of France, Henry who was not firmly fixed in the throne of a kingdom full of mal-contents, would renew a quarrel of that importance, of which he could not naturally expect to see a prosperous end. His reputation for being one of the most prudent princes of his time made it incredible that he would embark in such an enterprize. So Charles taking for granted, that he intended only to frighten him, still pursued his course with respect to Bretagne, and succeeded in the end, as will be seen under the next year. On the other hand, his embassadors, surprized at the chancellor's speech, answered with warmth that the king their sovereign feared not such threats, and was able to maintain his just rights against any person whatever [a]. The chancellor calmly replied, the king expected no other answer from them, but would forthwith send embassadors to the king of France, to acquaint him more fully with his intentions. Then he asked them whether the king of France would agree to have the disposal of the marriage of the duchess of Bretagne, with an exception that he should not marry her himself [b]. The embassadors answered, the king their masters, was so far from any thoughts of marrying the duchess of Bretagne, that he had given them no instructions upon that head.

During all these negotiations, Anne was extremely troubled to see no aid come either from Maximilian or the king of England. She had hitherto kept her marriage secret, but perceiving it could not be concealed any longer, and that it was not honourable to hide it from him whom she deemed her principal protector, sent a solemn embassy into England, consisting of the prince of Orange, the earl of Dunois, and the chancellor. Their business was to desire aid, and probably notify her marriage to the king. For, till after this embassy which arrived in England the beginning of the next year, we do not find in the Public Acts Maximilian's name joined with her's.

In February 1491, Henry sent embassadors into France [c], according to his promise. The commission was to treat of all his differences with king Charles, and in particular of a certain sum due to him from that prince, as also of the affair between Charles and the duchess of Bretagne. These instructions alone are a clear evidence, that Henry designed not vigorously to push his pretensions to the realm of France, or at least to Guienne and Normandy. For, is it probable that he would have comprised under the general word differences his claim to all France, or to two of the richest provinces, and have specified a debt of a hundred and twenty-five thousand crowns if the first had been the principal? It is therefore manifest, he still persisted in his desire to end the affair of Bretagne without a [illegible], and to secure the sums he had advanced.

A few days after, he appointed commissioners to treat with the embassadors that came last from Bretagne. Then it was probably, that the duchess's marriage with Maximilian was imparted to him [d]. Perhaps he was told of it before, though he pretended ignorance, because it had not been notified to him in form.

Mean-while, Charles having at last heard of the marriage, which had been made a great secret, resolved to use no more ceremony, but vigorously hasten the conquest of Bretagne. In all appearance, he plainly saw through all Henry's disguises, and perhaps believed the acquisition of Bretagne well worth the hazarding a rupture with England. As for Maximilian, he did not much fear him, and had an infallible expedient to pacify the king of Arragon, by restoring Rousillon, much less important to the crown of France than Bretagne. So, without further consideration, he ordered Rennes, capital of the duchy, to be invested, where the princess then was. During the siege, which lasted some months, Anne sent into England, John Bouteiller lord of Maupertuis, and Peter Cojalu, to desire Henry's assistance. Shortly after, he sent also the countess de la Val and the marshal de Rieux, and some others, to inform him of her condition, and demonstrate to him that Bretagne was going to fall into the hands of France. This embassy furnished the king with a pretence to borrow money of his subjects to enable him to make war upon France. And yet, though he seemed in haste, he gave no orders for levying troops, but was very intent upon collecting the loans.

Not long after, the league between Henry and Ferdinand was renewed. They agreed once more, that in May or at fartheſt in June the next year*, each should enter France at the head of an army. Maximilian promised likewise to do the same, and sent an aid of two thousand men to his duchess. But all this tended only to make a great noise, in order to deter the king of France from his design to conquer Bretagne. It was not the intention either of Henry or Ferdinand, or Maximilian, to make war upon France. Ferdinand was then entirely employed in the war of Granada, and if he leagued with Henry, it was only to oblige king Charles by the terror of the league to restore him Roussillon, being very ready to desist the moment he should be possessed of that province. Maximilian's aim, who had neither men nor money, was to engage the kings of England and Spain in a war with France, and reap all the fruit of it by the possession of the duchess and duchy of Bretagne. So, Henry not being able to depend in any manner upon such allies, and seeing Bretagne almost lost, was unwilling to engage alone in its defence. His sole aim was to secure by the dread of this league, the payment of what was owed him by France and Bretagne. Mean-while, Henry and Ferdinand, in order to attain their ends, were to feign a real intention to make war upon France.

Whilst these two monarchs were taking measures to accomplish their designs, and the embassadors of Bretagne were waiting in vain at London, Charles caused the siege of Rennes to be continued, but finding the siege was in an ill way, and the season now far advanced, he sought and found a readier and more effectual means than the sword to secure the possession of Bretagne. He gained, by his liberalities, all the young duchess's councellors, that they might persuade her to break off her marriage with Maximilian, and take himself for her husband. Perhaps he had formed the project before: but however, he first discovered it during the siege of Rennes. When he was secure of the concurrence of the lords of Bretagne, he caused the duchess, then above fifteen years of age, to be so importuned, that she had not a moment's repose. She at first couragiously withstood all their solicitations, affirming, she could not resolve to be false to a prince whom she had voluntarily espoused. But it was represented to her, that Maximilian had forsaken her first: that instead of coming in person to defend her, or at least of sending her aids proportionable to her wants, he had remained quietly in Germany, as if what passed in Bretagne no way concerned him: that in the present posture of affairs, it was impossible to hinder Bretagne from becoming a province of France, and then Maximilian would regard her still less, when he saw her dispossessed of her dominions: nay, perhaps she would have the confusion to see that he himself would cancel his marriage, and so lose at once both her duchy and spouse, and reduce her subjects to slavery: that in marrying the king of France, she might secure by a treaty, the sovereignty and liberties of Bretagne; whereas, by an obstinate and fruitless defence she would ruin her subjects, without reaping any advantage herself. In fine, that the king of France was more proper for one of her age: that the glorious title of queen of the Romans, and empress, ought not to tempt her, since that of queen of France, with a real kingdom, was not of less value. Mean while, as the duchess resisted, Charles thought of another expedient to conquer her resolution. He went himself and took the duke of Orleans out of the tower of Bourges, where he was confined after the battle of St. Aubin, and told him, that knowing how great confidence the young duchess of Bretagne placed in him, he required him, in return for his freedom, to try to persuade her to comply with his desires. The duke of Orleans, who was tired of his imprisonment, willingly accepted of the office, and repairing to Rennes, succeeded at last in determining the duchess to the marriage, which was accordingly concluded December the 16th, 1591.

Whilst this affair was in hand, Charles amused the English embassadors, being unwilling to conclude any thing, or even treat with them till he saw the success of his negotiating with Anne. At least, the embassadors hearing the marriage was upon the point of conclusion, withdrew about the end of November, without taking leave. Thus Henry saw, not without confusion, that he had lost the fruit of his avaricious policy, not only as he had not saved Bretagne, but chiefly as the reimbursement of the sums he had advanced, was become more precarious than ever. Nevertheless, he had still one refuge left, which he knew how to improve, and which brought him off, if not with honour, at least with a pecuniary advantage, the thing he had along aimed at. Happily for him, Charles was possessed with his design to conquer the kingdom of Naples. As a rupture with England would have laid invincible obstacles in his way, he thought it should by all means be avoided. Henry, on his part, well knowing that in the present juncture, Charles would not scruple to purchase a peace, feigned an extreme resentment of the affront he had received, and a resolution to be revenged at any rate. The moment his embassadors made their report, he issued out orders to levy forces, and prepare transports, intimating, he was going to undertake the most dreadful war that had ever been between England and France[f]. He seemed to prepare to tread in the steps of Edward III. and Henry V. and not think of resting till he had forced the crown of France from the house of Valois. We shall see presently to what all his ardour tended.

Maximilian was enraged when he heard Charles had thus injuriously robbed him of his wife. He threatened, like Henry, to carry fire and sword into the heart of France, in revenge of so deadly an affront. On the other hand, the archduke Philip demanded his sister Margaret who was at Paris, and affianced to king Charles: but the court of France did not yet think fit to send back that princess. They feared neither father nor son. Their whole attention was employed in laying the storm with which they were threatened from England and Spain, and which appeared much more violent than it really was. But before I relate the effects of this quarrel, it will be necessary briefly to mention the affairs of Scotland.

Since James IVth's accession to the crown of Scotland, he had found it very difficult to maintain himself in the throne. The troubles which immediately broke out, still continued by the policy of the king of England, who took care to foment them. He gave from time to time the Scotch malcontents some little aids, which enabled them to support themselves, but not to make any great progress against their king. It is a policy very usual with princes, to cherish the troubles of their neighbours, in a belief that it is a most effectual way to preserve peace at home, though there are some who would scruple to use such means. But Henry was not of this number. He even seems to have been less scrupulous than many others, since we find in the Collection of the Public Acts, that the lord Bothwel and sir Thomas Tod, both Scots, had engaged to deliver into his hands the persons of the king of Scotland and of the duke of Ross his brother, which could not be done without notorious treachery. It even appears by the Record, that he had lent the earl of Boghan and sir Thomas Tod, 266l. 13s. 4d. sterling, to enable them to execute this design, and that Tod left his son in hostage for security. This act is dated April 17th, 1491.

The project miscarrying, Henry, who was preparing for the war with France, would first be secured from the diversions the Scots might make in England during his absence. James for his part, desired nothing more than to deprive those of his subjects that were in arms against him, of the protection always afforded them by the king of England. So the two kings sending their embassadors to Caldstream upon Tweed, a treaty of truce was concluded, from the 21st of December, to that day five years 1496. By the treaty, the city of Berwick, with its territory, was to stand neuter, and the lordship of Lorn in Scotland, with the little island of Lundey belonging to England, were excepted out of the true. Henry ratified the treaty January the 9th, 1492. But probably, the king of Scotland, whether bribed by France, or some other motive, refused to confirm it. He agreed however to a much shorter truce, from the 20th of February, 1492, to the 20th of November following.

[1492] France seemed to be threatened from all sides with a furious war. Maximilian pressed it to the utmost of his power, reckoning that his son Philip, then twenty years old, would make a powerful diversion in Flanders, whilst the allies acted in other places. Henry was openly preparing for war with great noise and boastings. In fine, Ferdinand and Isabella, who had lately put a glorious end to the war with the Moors, by the taking of Granada, publicly threatened to invade France. Charles therefore would have been in great danger, had this powerful league been in reality what it was in appearance. After taking poſſeſſion of Bretagne, he thought of executing his grand project concerning the conqueſt of Naples. But he muſt firſt diſpel the ſtorm that was gathering in Spain, England and Flanders. Whilſt he was wholly employed in that affair, Henry was no leſs intent upon his own concerns.

In the beginning of the year 1492, he aſſembled a parliament, and communicated to both houſes his deſign to carry war into France, not with intent to aſk their advice, as in the caſe of Bretagne, but to acquaint them with his reſolution to exert his utmoſt endeavours to recover the kingdom of France, which he called the inheritance of his anceſtors. To inflame them the more, he ſet before them the glorious battles of Creſſy, Poictiers, and Azincourt, where the Engliſh alone, with a ſmall number of troops, vanquiſhed the ſtrongeſt armies, of France. He would thereby inſinuate, that he was no leſs a warrior than Edward III. the prince of Wales his ſon, and Henry V. In demanding an aid of money proportionable to the greatneſs of the enterprize, he exhorted the commons to ſpare the purſes of the poor, and lay the tax upon the rich, not all queſtioning whether what he required would be granted. Certainly great fault might have been found with his management of the former ſubſidy. It was granted for the defence of Bretagne, and yet the duchy was loſt without his uſing the leaſt endeavours to prevent it. But the conqueſt of the kingdom of France was a very proper decoy to draw in the parliament. The truth is, the king had no deſire to embark in ſo hazardous an undertaking. He knew that France being now at unity with itſelf, the conqueſt of it would be too difficult a taſk. Of his too allies, the one had will but not power, and the other had power but not will; Ferdinand's aim being by a ſhew of war to attain a peace, which might procure him the reſtitution of Rouſſillon. Beſides, as he had but newly ended his war with the Moors, he was not in condition to begin another with France. However, Henry expreſſed to his parliament and council an ardent deſire to render his name famous by the conqueſt of France, or at leaſt of Normandy and Guienne. Herein he had a view to his profit two ways, upon his ſubjects for a ſubſidy for the war, and upon his enemies for a peace, which would ſecure him the payment of what was due to him. He eaſily foreſaw, that the defection of the king of the Romans, and of Ferdinand, would afford him a plauſible excuſe to deſiſt from a war he was undertaking with ſo much noiſe. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the biſhop of Exeter, were the only perſons that knew his real intentions. Shortly after, the biſhop was removed to the ſee of Bath and Wells.

The parliament took fire, as the king expected, and granted him a very conſiderable ſum, which purſuant to his deſire, was to be levied upon the rich, by the name of Benevolence[g]. This ſort of tax was introduced by Edward IV. and raiſed without conſent of parliament. Richard III. to ingratiate himſelf with the people, aboliſhed it, but this parliament revived it[h], and gave it the ſeal of their authority[i].

Shortly after, Henry received embaſſadors from king Charles, with propoſals that were not made public. There was reaſon to believe, nothing was concluded in their conferences with the archbiſhop of Canterbury and biſhop Fox, ſince the warlike preparations were ſtill ſeen to continue. However very likely theſe embaſſadors laid the firſt foundation of the peace, which was made before the end of the year.

In June[k] the queen was delivered of a prince, who ſucceeded the king his father by the name of Henry VIII.

The preparations which were making in England were very ſeaſonable for the archduke Philip. Since the laſt year the Gantois had revolted once more, and ſet at their head Philip de Cleves, a great ſtickler for France. Some troubles in Holland preventing the archduke from endeavouring to ſuppreſs this revolt, it was the middle of the year before he marched againſt Philip de Cleves, and beſieged him in Sluys. He would have found it difficult to take that place, if Henry had not ſent him twelve ſhips, and two thouſand five hundred men[l]. With that aid he was enabled to compel the rebels to ſue for peace, and deliver Sluys into his hands.

As the king had no intention to puſh vigorouſly the war with France, he haſtened not his preparations, being glad to begin the campaign late, in order to end it the ſooner. Mean while he ſent embaſſadors to France[m], to ſhew he was willing to try fair means before he proceeded to arms. But it is very probable, the embaſſy was ſent only to finiſh, with king Charles, the terms of a peace. Moreover the king's honour was to be ſecured, who after making ſo much noiſe, was unwilling to deſiſt without a ſeeming neceſſity. To that end he muſt act in concert with the king of France. At the ſame time, Henry ſent embaſſadors[n] to the king of the Romans, and to Ferdinand, to ſummon them to take the field and enter France according to their treaty. But he knew they had neither power nor will to perform their engagements. Maximilian had no army, and Ferdinand was now in treaty with Charles, for the reſtitution of Rouſſillon, and yet, Henry pretending ignorance of theſe things, ſeemed to have great dependence upon them. In the beginning of Auguſt, he iſſued out orders for the levying a great number of forces, and on the 22d of the ſame month, appointed commiſſioners to confer at Caldſtream with thoſe of Scotland. All this afforded him pretences to delay his expedition. At length, though not till the 2d of October[o], he came to Dover in order to embark[p], having conſtituted by patent his eldeſt ſon Arthur prince of Wales, guardian of the realm. Such of his courtiers who were ignorant of his deſigns, could not forbare telling him, it was very late to begin a campaign. But he anſwered, "That he intended not to make a ſummer's buſineſs of the war, and therefore did not ſignify when it began. That he had Calais at his back, where he might winter, in order to be ready to open the campaign early next ſpring." He arrived the ſame day at Calais, where his whole army being aſſembled, amounted to twenty-five thouſand foot, and ſixteen hundred horſe[q].

Before he embarked, Henry received a letter from the marſhal Deſquerdes, offering a negotiation of peace in England[r]. But he thought it more proper, in order to ſave appearances, to treat in France itſelf. He was ſcarce landed at Calais, when the embaſſadors ſent to the king of the Romas arrived, and told him, that Maximilian was wholly unprepared to enter France as he had promiſed. The news was immediately made known to the whole army. Some days after, he received from his embaſſadors in Spain, letters which were likewiſe made public, importing that Ferdinand had concluded a peace with the king of France, upon promiſe to reſtore Rouſſillon, without demanding the three hundred thouſand crowns lent by Lewis XI. upon that country. Henry knew all this before, but had ſo ordered, that theſe advices came together after his arrival in France, that it might appear he was forced to the peace he intended to make. Upon theſe advices, at which he feigned to be very much ſurpriſed, he agreed, that Richard Fox, biſhop of Bath and Wells, and the lord d'Aubeney, governor of Calais, ſhould enter into conference at Eſtaples with the marſhal Deſquerdes. He marched however on the 15th of October to beſiege Boulogne, and in four days appeared before the place. It muſt be remarked that king Charles was then at Tours; and though the warlike preparations in England had made a great noiſe, there was no army in Picardy to oppoſe the invaſion of the Engliſh, at leaſt hiſtory mentions no ſuch thing. This is a clear evidence that all Henry's proceedings were concerted with the king of France, who was not ſo unprovided with troops, but he could have ſent an army ſufficient to ſtop his progreſs. So this pretended ſiege of Boulogne was only an artifice to diſcourage the Engliſh, that by conſidering the difficulties of a ſiege at ſuch a ſeaſon, they might be the leſs ſurpriſed at a peace. At the end of eight days, Henry received at the camp before Boulogne the articles of peace agreed by the commiſſioners of both parties, with the approbation of the two kings; the ſubſtance whereof was as follows:

[h] Hall makes a pertinant remark upon this occaſion; namely, "By this a man may perceive, that what is once practiſed for the utility of a prince, and brought to a precedent by matter of record, may be turned to the great prejudice of the people, if rulers in authority will ſo adjudge and determine it." fol. 22.

I. That the king of France ſhould diſcharge the debt contracted by his queen for the defence of Bretagne; which debt, according to the Engliſh embaſſadors account, amounted to ſix hundred and twenty thouſand crowns of gold, French money, which is 124,000l. ſterling.

II. That the king of France ſhould pay the king of England the arrears of the yearly penſion of fifty thouſand crowns paid by Lewis XI. to Edward IV. amounting in all to a hundred and twenty-five thouſand crowns, which is tewenty-five thouſand pounds ſterling.

III. That the king of France ſhould pay theſe two debts at ſeveral times, namely, fifty thouſand livres every year, every livre at twenty ſcutz or crowns, and to be paid half yearly till the whole was paid.

IV. Whereas in the obligation given by the ducheſs of Bretagne to the king of England, there was no ſum ſpecified, the king of England ſhould be obliged to make proof of his debt before commiſſioners of Bretagne or France, to be ſent to England for that purpoſe.

V. That the two kings ſhould name ſuch of their allies as they meant to include in the peace, who ſhould be obliged to declare within four months, whether they would be included or not.

VI. That in caſe the king of the Romans and the archduke Philip his ſon deſired to be included in the treaty, and if afterwards the king of France ſhould in any manner whatever invade their country, it ſhould be lawful for the king of England to aſſiſt them; but if on the contrary, they ſhould attack the king of France, the king of England ſhould give them no aid.

VII. That in caſe the two kings approved of theſe articles, they ſhould give each other hoſtages till the treaty was drawn and ſigned in form.

As theſe articles exactly correſponded with Henry's intentions from the beginning of the war of Bretagne, there is no queſtion that they were framed by himſelf or his own embaſſadors; and yet he would have them paſs for propoſals from the French king, and feigned to doubt whether he ſhould accept or reject them. For that purpoſe he called a council of all the lords and general officers, and ſent them the articles, with his orders to give them their real opinion. As probably the council was managed by ſome perſon of great credit who was in the king's ſecret, all that were preſent unanimouſly agreed he ought to accept of the terms. They gave their reaſons in a long memorial under all their hands, which in ſhort, omitting the exaggerations, were as follow:

I. The firſt reaſon was taken from the length of the nights, the coldneſs of the weather, the want of proviſions as they were to come by ſea, the fear of diſtempers and the like.

II. The ſecond reaſon was founded upon the conſideration of the ſum offered, far exceeding any ever yet paid by France to the king's predeceſſors, and likewiſe upon the apprehenſion of the murmurings the refuſal of a peace might occaſion in England and in the army.

III. They alledged as a third reaſon, the great advantage that would accrue by the peace to the king of the Romans and the archduke; the benefit they had already received in the reſtitution of Sluys: and laſtly, the fruits which the Engliſh merchants would reap, ſince the peace would ſecure their commerce with Flanders.

IV. They ſaid the king had honourably kept his word with his allies, notwithſtanding the inſtances of his council, who ſolicited him to defer his expedition to a more convenient ſeaſon, and till his allies ſhould be ready: that he had led his army into France, put himſelf in condition to encounter alone all the enemies' forces, and expoſed his perſon to the greateſt dangers at a time when his allies diſappointed him: that therefore, if the war was not continued, he might very juſtly caſt the blame upon them.

V. That the king was far from being in the ſame ſituation with Edward IV. when he led an army into France: that Edward was joined by the duke of Burgundy with all his forces and by ſeveral French lords who were in his intereſt: that he was in poſſeſſion of all the towns as far as the Somme, and began the war in the midſt of ſummer: that, on the contrary, the king was not aſſiſted with any foreign troops: that when he marched out of the gates of Calais, he entered the enemies' country and was advanced to Bulogne: that he had razed ſeveral places, as Ardres and Montory, and had ſtood four and twenty days ready for battle, defying the armies of France.

VI. That very likely the people of England would thank the king for a peace, which would put an end to taxes and exactions, and reſtore the public tranquillity.

VII. They added once more, that the reſtoring the archduke to his dominions would redound to the king's honour and the nation's advantage, by reaſon of their trade with his ſubjects.

VIII. They ſaid that before the ſiege of Boulogne it was thought to be a weak place and eaſy to be taken; but on the contrary, it was found to be well fortified, ſtrongly garriſoned, and plentifully provided with artillery and proviſions: that therefore, in all appearance, if the king continued the ſiege, he would be forced to raiſe it with diſgrace: whereas by making a peace he could retire with honour.

IX. Their laſt reaſon was, that it was impracticable to continue the war during the winter, without utterly deſtroying the army, which would extremely afflict the whole kingdom.

If theſe reaſons are never ſo little conſidered, they will be found to be all falſe and deceitful, except the article of the money, which was the only true one. Without weighing them too particularly, I ſhall only obſerve, that of all the inconveniences alledged by the officers, there was not one but what the king might have foreſeen, and actually did foreſee. He could blame himſelf only for beginning the campaign ſo late. All in the Vth article concerning Edward IV. is evidently falſe. As for the murmurs of the people, which were pretended to be feared in caſe the king rejected the peace, it was much more propable on the contrary that the nation would murmur to ſee the money given for a war with France, employed in making a diſhonourable peace, advantageous only to the king. In a word, the king's precaution to cauſe the peace to be approved by the officers of his army was a clear evidence he was himſelf convinced of the little advantage it would be to England.

Henry feigned to be determined by theſe reaſons to accept of a peace, the treaty was drawn up in form, and ſigned at Eſtaples the 3d of November[s]. Charles ratified it the 6th of the ſame month. He was then at Tours, unconcerned at the ſeemingly threatened invaſion, though an Engliſh army in France had ever made his predeceſſors extremely uneaſy. What was peculiar to the treaty, was, that though it was called a treaty of peace, it was however to expire with the lives of two kings: but the ſucceſſor of him that died firſt, was to ratify it within a year after his acceſſion to the crown. I imagine this was an expedient deviſed to excuſe the ſilence concerning the kingdom of France, or at leaſt Guienne and Normandy, of which there was no mention, though the war was proclaimed ſolely upon that occaſion. Mean-while, this treaty, which properly concerned only the payment of two debts, was to be approved and confirmed by the ſtates of France and the parliament of England. This ſhews it was not conſidered as a bare truce, and indeed it was called a treaty, of peace. But on the other hand it is hard to conceive how a treaty, wherein the principal difference was not ſettled, and which was to be in force but till the death of the two kings, could be deemed a treaty of peace: can any thing be more like a truce? however this be, Henry took care to ſee that the king of France ratified every particular article of the treaty, and eſpecially thoſe concerning the payment of the money. Charles was likewiſe, on his part very punctually in paying the fifty thouſand livres every year[t], as was alſo Lewis XII. his ſucceſſor.

After this manner ended the war of Bretagne, which had laſted ſince the year 1487. I ſay the war of Bretagne, becauſe that I have been ſpeaking of was only a conſequence of it. Henry reaped the intended advantage, that is to ſay, large ſums of money, which were not employed in the ſervice of the public. In the firſt place, he obtained of the parliament a tenth of all the perſonal eſtates of his ſubjects, of which he expended no more than was neceſſary for levying and maintaining ſix thouſand men for eight months. But this expence was only advanced, the money being repaid him with intereſt. We have ſeen that he mounted his charges to ſix hundred and twenty thouſand crowns of gold, a prodigious ſum in thoſe days, when money was much ſcarcer than at preſent[u]. In the next place he borrowed money throughout the whole kingdom, which probably was never repaid. There was likewiſe granted him a ſubſidy under the name of Benevolence, which amounted to a very great ſum, much beyond what was neceſſary for the maintenance of his army the two or three months it was on foot. Laſtly, he received a hundred and twenty-five thouſand crowns for the arrears of the penſion due to Edward IV. But, on the other hand, he ſuffered Bretagne to be loſt, to the irreparable damage of England, ſince her alliance with the duke of Bretagne gave her an advantage over France, which ſhe could never after recover. Beſides, the recovery of the money advanced for Bretagne is to be aſcribed rather to his good fortune than policy: he was ſolely indebted for it to the king of France's deſigns upon the kingdom of Naples, which induced him to purchaſe a peace with England; otherwiſe Henry would have found it very difficult to recover his money, and who knows what might have happened had he been forced to obtain it by dint of ſword? But the advantages Charles reaped by his peace were much more conſiderable: for the penſion of fifty thouſand livres paid a few years, and which he received with intereſt from Bretagne, he annexed that duchy to the crown of France, and deprived the Engliſh of their moſt conſiderable ally.

[u] We may gueſs how far a ſhillling went in thoſe days when a good while after, in king Edward VIth's reign, a large houſe within the precincts of the court in Channon-row in Weſtminſter was let to no leſs a perſon than the comptroller of the king's houſhold for thirty ſhillings a year. The

I have dwelt the longer upon the circumſtances of this affair, becauſe they perfectly diſcover the genius and character of Henry VII. That monarch, ever greedy of money, having always his intereſt in view, found means to make an advantage whether of war or of peace, and turn every thing to his profit. It was he that by his policy, wholly bent to his own private intereſt, gave the turn we have ſeen to the affairs of Bretagne [w].

The ſame day the peace of Eſtaples was ſigned, the embaſſadors of England and Scotland concluded at Caldſtream a truce from the 3d of November this year to the 30th of April, 1494.

Henry having concluded a peace with France according to his own ſcheme, ſet out for London, where he arrived the 17th of December.

On the 5th of November, the archduke's forces ſurpriſed Arras, which had been fifteen years in the hands of the French. Philip refuſing to be included in the peace of Eſtaples, the war continued in Flanders till the next year.

In Auguſt this year 1492, Chriſtopher Columbus ſailed the firſt time from Cadiz, with king Ferdinand's licence, in queſt of the new world [x].

Henry imagined he might for the future hope for a peaceable reign. He ſaw among his ſubjects no appearance of revolt. Not a prince or princeſs of the houſe of York was in condition to give him any diſturbance. He kept the earl of Warwick priſoner in the Tower. Edward IVth's daughters were in his power; and there was no lord of the York party of ſufficient credit to raiſe commotions in the kingdom. On the other hand he was in peace or truce with his neighbours; and in the ſeven years and a half that he had been on the throne, had by his œconomy heaped up ſuch large ſums of money as none of his predeceſſors had ever been maſter of at once: and yet this ſtate of proſperity was not capable of diſmaying his enemies. Whilſt he was wholly employed in the affairs I have been relating, the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy was labouring to raiſe him troubles at home; ſo much the more dangerous, as they were not ſuſpected. This princeſs was not ignorant how well diſpoſed the Engliſh and Iriſh were to the houſe of York, and upon their affection ſhe chiefly built her hopes of dethroning Henry. Though Lambert Simnel's affair had miſcarried, ſhe did not aſcribe the ill ſucceſs ſo much to the project itſelf, as to the managers. Beſides, Henry was expoſed to the hazard of a battle, which he might have loſt; and it was not impoſſible but he might be vanquiſhed for the future, if he was in the ſame caſe. Thus ſhe did not deſpair of wreſting the crown from the houſe of Lancaſter, or rather of Tudor, after which ſhe reckoned it would be eaſy to reſtore the houſe of York.

Since Simnel's misfortune, ſhe had never ceaſed to ſpread a report either by herſelf or emiſſaries, that Richard duke of York, ſecond ſon of Edward IV. had eſcaped the cruelty of his uncle Richard III. and was ſtill alive. This ſhe did to prepare people to receive a ſecond phantom, who was to perſonate the young prince her nephew, as Lambert Simnel had perſonated the earl of Warwick. To that end ſhe looked out carefully for young lads of the duke of York's age, fit for her purpoſe. At length ſhe met with one, in whom ſhe fancied to ſee all the qualities requiſite to repreſent that prince. His name was Perkin Warbeck, ſon of John Oſbeck, a Jewiſh convert of Tournay, who had long lived at London. Edward IV. having occaſion to know this Jew, and receive ſome ſervice from him, was pleaſed to do him the honour to ſtand godfather to one of his children, and gave him the name of Peter, from whence was formed the diminutive Peterkin or Perkin. Some years after, Oſbeck being returned into Flanders, placed young Perkin with one of his relations at Antwerp, who kept him ſome time. The boy was ſo handſome, and endowed with qualities ſo far above his birth, that many ſuſpected Edward IV. to be his father; and indeed it was ſomething extraordinary that Edward ſhould ſtand godfather to one of ſo mean a parentage. Be this as it will, Perkin going from Antwerp lived in ſeveral towns of Flanders, and ſhifted habitations ſo often, that when Henry afterwards would have traced him, in order to know the whole ſtory of his life, he found it very difficult. As Perkin generally converſed with the Engliſh ſettled in the Low-Countries, he was ſo perfect in the Engliſh tongue, that he might eaſily be taken for an Engliſhman, eſpecially as he had ſpent his childhood at London.

This youth being mentioned to the ducheſs of Burgundy, ſhe commanded him to be privately brought to her palace; and finding him fit for her purpoſe, took care to inſtruct him with reſpect to the part he was to act. Hence we gueſs Perkin muſt have been a youth of great wit and ſenſe, to enter into the ducheſs's deſigns, otherwiſe it would have been fruitleſs to give him inſtructions. However ſhe ſo often deſcribed Edward IV. his queen, prince Edward their eldeſt ſon, and the princeſſes their daughters, that after ſeveral repetitions of her leſſon, he could talk very pertinently of the court, of the king his pretended father, at leaſt as far as the duke of York could be ſuppoſed to know. The natural way he had learned of relating circumſtances fit for a child's memory, and certain particulars of Edward's court, made the ducheſs believe he would not fail to gain credit when he appeared in the world. Above all, ſhe took care to make him perfect in what he was to frame while in ſanctuary with the queen, and when taken from thence by the contrivance of Rich. III. and particularly in the manner of his eſcaping the hands of the executioners, who were ordered to murder him. Theſe were particulars ſo much the eaſier to be counterfeited, as there were but few people who could contradict them. Moreover, ſhe taught him to aſſume the air and character of a well-bred prince. She found the youth ſo apt a ſcholar, that ſhe was herſelf ſurpriſed at it. In a ſhort time, Perkin ſo uſed himſelf to talk and act like a prince, that one would have ſworn he had been born and educated in a palace.

It is not known when the ducheſs of Burgundy took Perkin home to inſtruct him: but very likely it was not long after the battle of Stoke, where the earl of Lincoln and Lambert Simnel were vanquiſhed. However that be, the affair of Bretagne cauſing that princeſs to think Henry would ſoon break with France, as himſelf would have had it believed, reſolved Perkin ſhould appear as duke of York ſo ſoon as the war was begun. Mean while, being very ſenſible if he appeared firſt in Flanders, or in any town in the Low-Countries, the world would not fail to ſuſpect her, ſhe ſent him into Portugal [y], where he lived unknown for a year. At length, in 1492, the war between England and France ſeeming unavoidable, ſhe diſpatched orders to Perkin to repair into Ireland, where probably ſhe had already been tampering with ſeveral perſons of note. Perkin inſtantly obeying, and arriving at Cork, called himſelf duke of York, ſon of Edward IV. in which he was countenanced by the mayor, who it is likely was in the plot. A few days after he wrote to the earls of Deſmond and Kildare, great friends of the houſe of York, acquainting them with his arrival, and deſiring them to come and join him.

Henry was then employed in his preparations for his expedition into France. As the ducheſs of Burgundy imagined he would depart early in the ſpring, ſhe expected he would be engaged in the war with France by the time Perkin appeared in Ireland, in which ſhe was miſtaken. The report that the duke of York was come from Portugal into Ireland, cauſed no alteration in the king's meaſures: he believed it to be only a contrivance to divert him from his enterprize. However, preſently after he was told the duke of York who had appeared in Ireland was gone into France, which made him very uneaſy. And indeed the news was but too true: it happened ſome time before, that one Frion, ſecretary to the king for the French tongue, had withdrawn from court, and retired to Paris, where he was very well received. This [w] The peace gave great diſcontent to the nobles and officers who had ſold or engaged their eſtates upon hopes of the war: they ſtuck not to ſay, "That the king cared not to plume his nobility and people, to feather himſelf." Henry 7.

Frion, who followed king Charles's court, hearing the duke of York was in Ireland, told that monarch of it, intimating, he might make that affair turn to account. Whatever Charles thought of this pretender, he really believed that though he was an impoſter, he might be ſerviceable to him in making a peace with Henry. In that belief he ſent Frion into Ireland, to invite the pretender in his name to come to him, with aſſurance of his protection and aid to recover the crown of his anceſtors. Perkin ſeeing himſelf invited by a prince ſo great and ſo capable to aſſiſt him, departed without a moment's conſideration. When he was arrived in France, he waited upon the king, who gave him a very gracious reception, treated him as duke of York, lodged him in his palace, and aſſigned him a guard, under colour of doing him honour, but in reality to hinder the king of England from cauſing him to be ſeized. The courtiers imitated their maſter, in paying the ſame reſpects to Perkin, as they would have done to the duke of York. Shortly after, above a hundred Engliſhmen, diſſatisfied with the king, repaired to Paris with offers of their ſervice to the pretender. But the honours Perkin received at the court of France were of no long continuance. As ſoon as Charles was almoſt ſure of a peace, he diſmiſſed him, for fear Henry, who had now demanded him, ſhould make it one of the articles of the treaty. He was unwilling to be thought to ſurpriſe the young man, in order to deliver him to his enemy; as on the other hand, he would not have the peace miſcarry for his ſake.

Perkin thought himſelf very happy to be thus freed. He was afraid of worſe uſage, when he heard a peace was treating between the two kings. Having readily quitted the court of France, he retired into Flanders to the ducheſs of Burgundy, taking great care not to diſcover he had ever ſeen her before. At the firſt interview, Margaret acted her part extremely well. She treated him very roughly, and ſeemed much ſurpriſed, that in her preſence he ſhould dare to call himſelf duke of York. She ſaid publicly, that having been already impoſed upon by a counterfeit earl of Warwick, ſhe ſhould be more upon her guard, and it would not be ſo eaſy to deceive her a ſecond time. That therefore ſhe adviſed him to retire, leſt he incurred the puniſhment due to his boldneſs. Perkin ſeemed not at all troubled at theſe threats, and confeſſing ſhe was in the right to doubt, perſiſted however in affirming, he was the duke of York her nephew. The ducheſs feigning a deſire to convict him of impoſture before her whole court, put certain queſtions to him, to which, ſhe knew, he could make pertinent anſwers. Accordingly, he replied in ſo natural and unaffected a manner, that the ducheſs ſeemed aſtoniſhed. In ſhort, they played their parts ſo well, that the ducheſs, pretending ſhe could not reſiſt ſuch evident proofs, owned him for her nephew, aſſigned him a guard of thirty halberdiers, and gave him the title of the White Roſe, the badge of the houſe of York. Perkin, on his part, laboured to convince the world, he was the real duke of York, by his natural way of relating the principal paſſages of his life. If at any time his diſmiſſion out of France was objected to him, he anſwered with a ſigh, it was not very ſtrange a young prince, perſecuted by fortune, ſhould be ſacrificed to the policy of two powerful monarchs. That this very thing was a ſtrong argument in his favour, ſince the peace between Charles and Henry could not be eſtabliſhed but upon his ruin. What Perkin ſaid, added to the ducheſs's public approbation, ſatisfied the whole court, he was the true duke of York, and from thence the rumour ſpread throughout all the Low-Countries, and at laſt over all Europe.

News being brought into England, about the beginning of the year 1493, that the duke of York was in Flanders, and owned by the ducheſs of Burgundy, it cauſed great commotions in the kingdom. The thing was preſently credited by an infinite number of people, ſome of whom were diſſatisfied with the king, and others greedy of novelty. Some blindly followed their leaders, and others, whoſe fortunes were deſperate, wiſhed for a change in the government. The king was not generally beloved. The loſs of Bretagne; his late peace with the king of France; the uncivil uſage the queen and the whole houſe of York had received, and daily did receive at his hands; and, laſtly, his unneceſſary taxes, were but too apt to make the people wiſh the report to be true.

The king was ſurpriſed to ſee with what greedineſs the news was received. It convinced him of his great danger from the Yorkiſts, and of their conſtant readineſs to embrace all opportunities to ruin him if it was poſſible. He appeared however unconcerned, leſt his fears ſhould encourage his enemies. So, continuing to act as uſual, he waited till they more plainly diſcovered their deſigns.

In the beginning of March, Henry ſent [z] the order of the garter to Alphonſo duke of Calabria, eldeſt ſon of Ferdinand king of Naples. Alphonſo had been extremely deſirous of this honour, to inſinuate to the princes of Italy, that he had in the king of England a protector who would not ſuffer him to be oppreſſed. He would have thereby induced them to league with the king his father, againſt Charles VIII. who was going to undertake the conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples.

A few days after, Henry concluded at London a treaty of perpetual peace and amity with Ferdinand and Iſabella, king and queen of Caſtile and Arragon. This alliance, which was a reciprocal engagement of mutual aſſiſtance upon all occaſions, was particular in that it extended not to all the kings of England and Spain without diſtinction, but only to all their ſucceſſors deſcended from them [a]. In the treaty, the marriage articles between prince Arthur and Catherine, daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, were confirmed and renewed [b].

Mean while, the king's enemies, not content with countenancing the report concerning the duke of York, were now labouring to form a conſpiracy to dethrone him. His covetous temper had alienated ſeveral of the firmeſt friends to his perſon and the houſe of Lancaſter. William Stanley lord chamberlain, brother of the earl of Derby, John Ratcliff lord Fitz-Walter, ſir Robert Clifford, ſir Simon Montfort, ſir Thomas Thwaites, William Barley, were the heads of the conſpiracy. The lord chamberlain had greatly contributed to his victory of Boſworth, by declaring for him in ſo critical a minute. The king owned it, but thought him well rewarded with the ſpoils of Boſworth Field, and the office of lord chamberlain. But Stanley thinking that too mean a recompence was not ſatisfied. Sir Robert Clifford was ſon of him that murdered the young earl of Rutland, brother of Edward IV. at the battle of Wakefield, and aftewards loſt his life in fighting for the houſe of Lancaſter. Probably, Henry had forgot the conſtant attachment of that family to his houſe, and neglected to give him a ſhare in his favours. Clifford and Barley were deputed by the conſpirators to go into Flanders, and concert meaſures with the ducheſs of Burgundy and the pretended duke of York, for the accompliſhment of their deſigns. The ducheſs gave them a very civil reception, deeming it a good omen, that profeſſed enemies of her houſe ſhould be the firſt to offer their ſervice. Shortly after their arrival, Clifford wrote to his friends in England, that the duke of York, ſon of Edward IV. was in Flanders, and that he knew him perfectly well. The news inflamed the conſpirators, and from that time they ſpared no pains to gain adherents to the pretended duke of York.

Whilſt the king's enemies were labouring to create him freſh troubles, he himſelf was no leſs intent upon deviſing means to prevent the gathering ſtorm [c]. His principal buſineſs was to undeceive the people, and to ſucceed, there was occaſion for two ſorts of proofs. Firſt, it was neceſſary to ſhew that the duke of York was dead; in the ſecond place, that though he were alive, the perſon that borrowed his name was a counterfeit.

To prove the duke of York was not living, it was neceſſary to produce the teſtimonies of thoſe who had taken away his life, or ſeen him dead, and who were but four in all; namely, ſir James Tyrrel, ordered by Richard III. to put that prince to death; John Dighton, employed by Tyrrel to commit the fact; Miles Forreſt, his ſervant, who aſſiſted him, and the prieſt who buried the two princes. Of theſe four perſons, the prieſt and Foreſt were dead, and there remained only Tyrrel and Dighton. Theſe were apprehended by the king's order, and ſent to priſon. Then, after a private examination, it was given out that they agreed in their depoſitions, namely, that Dighton and Foreſt ſmothered the two princes in their bed, and ſhewed their dead bodies to Tyrrel, and that the prieſt afterwards buried them under a ſtair-caſe. That ſoon after, Richard ordered them to be removed elſewhere, by the ſame prieſt, who was ſince dead, without diſcovering where he had laid them. It is likely, however, that Tyrrel's depoſition was not ſo favourable for the king's purpoſe as Dighton's, ſince he was detained in priſon, whereas Dighton was releaſed, probably, that he might divulge his own evidence.

The publiſhing of theſe teſtimonies produced not the effect the king had expected. For, what proof could a confeſſion form, taken at private examination, and publiſhed by him whoſe intereſt it was to make it appear to his advantage? In the next place, the removal of the bodies from the place where they were firſt laid, to another unknown, gave cauſe for ſtrong ſuſpicions. Had it not been for this removal, nothing would have been more eaſy than to prove the death of the two princes, ſince the bodies would have been ſtill found under the ſtair-caſe. So people imagined, the king, wanting ſo natural a proof, had invented the removal, that his not uſing ſo convincing a proof might not be thought ſtrange. Beſides, the teſtimony of two villains who confeſſed themſelves guilty of ſo black a crime, whoſe evidence was ſo advantageous to the king, could not be of any great weight. Accordingly, the king, finding this method inſufficient to undeceive the people, applied himſelf chiefly to diſcover who the impoſtor was, that pretended to be the duke of York.

To ſucceed in that deſign, he found no better way than to bribe ſeveral perſons, who repaired to the counterfeit duke, under colour of offering him their ſervice. He charged them to uſe all their endeavours to know who and whence he was, and to trace him from his birth to the day he came to the ducheſs of Burgundy. At the ſame time, he ordered them to make ſtrict enquiry after his correſpondents in England, and obſerve narrowly every thing that paſſed about him. Eſpecially he enjoined ſome of the diſcreeteſt, to ſpare nothing to gain ſir Robert Clifford, much ſuſpecting him to be concerned in the ſecret. It is ſaid that in order to make diſcoveries, he bribed the ſervants, and even the very confeſſors of the great men he ſuſpected. Moreover, to procure his ſpies in Flanders the more credit, he uſed to have them pronounced excommunicate every Sunday at St. Paul's, by virtue of pope Innocent VIIIth's bull. He was ſo well ſerved by theſe ſpies, that, in ſhort, he came to know the pretended duke of York was no other than Perkin Warbeck. He had perfect information of his birth, life, actions, profeſſion, and of all the places he had lived at from his childhood, which was inſtantly divulged throughout the whole kingdom. However, as the particulars were publiſhed by the king, the principal party concerned, the generality of the people did not think themſelves obliged to believe him upon his bare word. Their prejudice made them require more convincing proofs.

Whilſt the king's ſpies were acting in Flanders and England, he had two affairs upon his hands from which he wanted to be diſengaged, in caſe any troubles ſhould ariſe in the kingdom on account of the pretended duke of York. The firſt was, to make peace with Scotland; the ſecond, to get the peace of Eſtaples confirmed by the pope, according to agreement with the king of France. For that purpoſe, he ſent embaſſadors to Edinburgh and Rome. The former concluded with king James a truce from April the 30th, 1494, to that day ſeven years 1501, upon the ſame terms with that of Caldſtream, which expired the day this was to commence. It appears by the embaſſador's inſtructions, that he deſired to conclude a marriage between the king of Scotland and Catherine, daughter of the counteſs of Wiltſhire, and grand-daughter of the duke of Somerſet. But the marriage was not propoſed, or at leaſt the negotiation did not ſucceed [d].

As to the affair of Rome, the embaſſadors preſented to pope Alexander VI. a petition for a bull of excommunication againſt whichſoever of the two kings ſhould not obſerve the treaty of Eſtaples. The pope owned it to be one of the articles of the treaty, and anſwered, he was ready to grant ſuch a bull, provided the king of France did not oppoſe it, an inſtrument whereof he ordered to be given to the embaſſadors.

The emperor Frederick dying in Auguſt this year, Maximilian, his ſon, king of the Romans, aſcended the imperial throne in his room.

The 21ſt of the ſame month, John Morton archbiſhop of Canterbury, was made cardinal of St. Anaſtaſius.

Henry having had perfect information of every thing relating to Perkin Warbeck, ſent embaſſadors [e] to archduke Philip, to deſire him to deliver him up. He repreſented, "That it was contrary to the law of nations, and their alliance, to protect a counterfeit, who ſought to rob him of the crown by an evident impoſture. That he was informed of all the circumſtances of Perkin's life from his cradle, and offered to produce authentic proofs of the cheat, as well as of the death of the duke of York, whoſe name Warbeck had borrowed. That Perkin being only a theatrical king formed by the ducheſs of Bergundy, he hoped the archduke would not ſcruple to deliver him into his hands." Philip being ſtill a minor, his council told the embaſſadors, "That the archduke's intention was, always to preſerve a good underſtanding with the king of England, and therefore would give no manner of aſſiſtance to the pretended duke of York: but the ducheſs of Burgundy being ſovereign in the lands of her dowry, the archduke could not meddle with her affairs, or hinder her from doing what ſhe thought fit."

Philip believed he had then the leſs reaſon to regard the king of England, as he had made a peace with Charles VIII.

By a treaty concluded at Senlis the 23d of May, Charles had reſtored to the archduke his ſiſter Margaret, with the earldom of Artois and Burgundy; but kept ſome towns on promiſe to deliver them as ſoon as Philip was of age.

The embaſſadors brought Philip's anſwer to the king, and withal told him, there was a colluſſion between him and the ducheſs of Burgundy. Henry was ſo provoked at this proceeding, that he broke off all commerce with the archduke, and baniſhed all the Flemings out of his kingdom [f]. The archduke did the like by the Engliſh who were in Flanders. But the animoſity between theſe two princes went no farther, each fearing he might one day want the other's aſſiſtance.

Mean-while, Henry having at length gained ſir Robert Clifford, who was intruſted with Warbeck's and the ducheſs's ſecrets, had exact information of their correſpondents in England. As it could not but be dangerous to let the evil increaſe, he reſolved to apply proper remedies. For that purpoſe, he cauſed to be arreſted in one day, and almoſt at the ſame inſtant, John Ratcliff lord Fitz-Walter, ſir Simon Montfort, ſir Thomas Thwaites, William D'Aubeney, Robert Ratcliff, Thomas Creſſener, and Thomas Aſtwood. All theſe were convicted and condemned for high-treaſon, in adhering and promiſing aid to Perkin. The lord Fitz-Walter was ſent priſoner to Calais, with ſome hope of obtaining his pardon. But his impatience cauſed him to attempt an eſcape, he was diſcovered and beheaded. Sir Simon Montfort, ſir Robert Ratcliff, and William D'Aubeney, were executed immediately after their condemnation. The reſt were pardoned, and thoſe that were apprehended upon the ſame account, among whom were certain Dominican friars, and William Worſely dean of St. Paul's, were releaſed. Sir William Stanley lord chamberlain, whether he was not yet informed againſt, or the king had a mind to ſtay for ſtronger proofs to convict him, was not touched at that time.

On the 1ſt of November, Henry wrote to the king of France, deſiring to be included in the peace of Senlis, according to the tenor of the treaty. The 17th of the ſame month, he notified to him the ſame thing from Ferdinand king of Naples, and Alphonſo duke of Calabria his ſon, who were expreſly included in the peace of Senlis, on the part of the emperor and archduke. But however king Charles deſiſted not from his project of conquering Naples.

[1494] England was very quiet during this year. Perkin Warbeck ſtill remained in Flanders without offering to ſtir, the execution of his adherents convincing him, the king knew more of his affairs than he imagined. Mean-time, Henry laboured underhand to inform himſelf more fully concerning the circumſtances of the conſpiracy, and what the ducheſs of Burgundy was contriving in England and elſewhere. In this ſir Robert Clifford, whom he had gained, was very ſerviceable. He learnt by his means that Perkin had ſtill ſome dependence in Ireland, and had wrote to the earls of Deſmond and Kildare, when he landed there from Portugal. This diſcovery made him reſolve to take care of the affairs of that iſland, which had been hitherto much neglected. To that end, he made Henry his ſecond ſon, then but two years old, lieutenant governor of Ireland, but appointed for deputy, ſir Edward Poynings, a man verſed in affairs, and employed in ſeveral embaſſies. He gave him a very extenſive power, as well over the militia, as the civil government, that he might put the iſland upon a good foot [g].

Poynings, upon his arrival in Ireland, made ſtrict enquiry after thoſe that were ſuſpected of diſaffection to the king, particularly he vigorouſly attacked the earls of Deſmond and Kildare [h]. The firſt took care of himſelf and kept out of the reach of the lord-deputy; but the earl of Kildare was ſent priſoner into England, from whence he was quickly ſent back by the king with marks of eſteem and good-will. he dreaded freſh troubles in Ireland, where a rebellion in his circumſtances would have been very incommodious, he thought he ſhould prevent them by acts of grace, rather than ſeverity; and therefore ſent a commiſſioner[i] with a general pardon in form, as well for the earl of Deſmond, as for all the Iriſh rebels, in order to ſtifle, if poſſible, all the ſeeds of rebellion in the iſland, where the houſe of York had but too many friends.

Whilſt Poynings was in Ireland, he held a parliament famous for the ſtatutes enacted to the advantage of the crown of England and of the Engliſh ſettled in the iſland. One of theſe ſtatutes ſtill called Poynings's Law, ran, that the parliament of Ireland ſhould not be aſſembled before the lord lieutenant and council had acquainted the king with the reaſons, and obtained the royal licence under the great ſeal. It was alſo enacted, that all the ſtatutes of England concerning the public ſhould be obſerved in Ireland. Theſe two ſtatutes are ſtill in force to this day[k].

Though Henry had given ſeveral proofs of his ſelf-intereſted and covetous temper, they might be coloured with ſome pretence, becauſe the ſecret ſprings of his policy were not yet fully known. But it was not the ſame with regard to his proceedings this year, by which he plainly diſcovered himſelf. The pretence of foreign affairs failing him, he extorted large ſums from private perſons, by forfeitures upon penal laws, on purpoſe to fill his coffers. This proceeding was the more diſpleaſing to the people, as they eaſily perceived it flowed from his natural diſpoſition, ſince he was not obliged by any neceſſity to uſe ſuch extraordinary methods. He was in peace with all the princes of Europe: he had drawn from the parliament two very conſiderable ſubſidies, of which he had not expended a fourth part, and even that was repaid him with intereſt: moreover, beſides divers confiſcations, he received every year fifty thouſand livres of the king of France. All this, added to the uſual revenues of the crown, which were not leſs than in the foregoing reigns, ſeemed to enable him to eaſe, rather than oppreſs his ſubjects with frivolous accuſations to drain their purſes. The firſt he attacked in this manner was ſir William Capel, alderman of London, who was fined two thouſand ſeven hundred pounds, and forced to compound with the king for ſixteen hundred. The archbiſhop of Canterbury was accuſed of being the contriver of theſe methods to procure the king money: but whether Henry's avarice daily increaſed, or the miniſters who ſucceeded that prelate were ſtill leſs ſcrupulous than he, people had but too much reaſon to lament him after his death.

Towards the end of this year, Henry gave a freſh inſtance of his deſire of money, which proved very injurious to his good name, eſpecially as he endeavoured to cover it with the veil of juſtice. By ſecret advices from ſir Robert Clifford, he was informed ſir William Stanley lord chamberlain was one of Perkin Warbeck's adhererents. Though that lord had done him the greateſt ſervice imaginable, ſince he had procured him the victory which raiſed him to the throne, he reſolved to ſacrifice him to his avarice, under colour of puniſhing his crime. I ſay to his avarice, and not to juſtice or revenge; for, if we may judge by his uſual conduct with regard to the ſtate-criminals, of whom there was nothing to be got, he would doubtleſs have pardoned Stanley, if the deſire of confiſcating his eſtate had not rendered him inexorable.

To attain his ends, he ordered Clifford, who was ſtill in Flanders, to repair privately into England. When he heard the informer was arrived, he removed to the Tower, that the great ones who ſhould be accuſed, might be arreſted more conveniently and without noiſe. Clifford being come to London without diſcovering himſelf, the king aſſembled the council[l] in the Tower, and ſent for ſir Robert, who falling down at his feet, craved his pardon, offering to declare whatever he knew of the conſpiracy. The king immediately pardoned him, but on expreſs condition he would conceal nothing of what was come to his knowledge. Whereupon Clifford impeached ſeveral perſons, and amongſt the reſt the lord chamberlain. The king ſeeming extremely ſurpriſed, bid him take care what he ſaid, ſince his life lay at ſtake in caſe the accuſation was groundleſs. Clifford perſiſting, the lord chamberlain was preſently apprehended. Next day he was examined by the council, where he confeſſed enough to condemn him. The great ſervice he had done the king, and the intereſt of the earl of Derby his brother, made him hope he ſhould not be treated with rigour. But two things rendered his crime unpardonable: the firſt was his immenſe riches, which promiſed the king a plentiful confiſcation[m]; the ſecond, that he was accuſed, and probably convicted of ſaying to Clifford, ſpeaking of Perkin Warbeck, "If he were ſure that young man were king Edward's ſon, he would never bear arms againſt him." This was wounding the king in the moſt ſenſible part, ſince he ſeemed to acknowledge the houſe of York had a better title than the houſe of Lancaſter. Had he been guilty only of that crime, it is a queſtion whether the judges would have ſentenced him to die; but it is likely he was convicted of acting more directly againſt the king, and holding intelligence with Warbeck and the ducheſs of Burgundy. All the favour he could obtain was a delay of ſome weeks, to prepare for death, which he ſuffered not till the beginning of the next year[n]. The king's ſeverity on this occaſion ſeemed exceſſive. All the world imagined he would pardon a lord to whom he was ſo much obliged, and who had even enabled him to exerciſe acts of mercy by procuring him the crown: beſides, he was brother to the earl of Derby, a zealous ſervant and father-in-law of the king.

The execution of the lord chamberlain terrified the whole kingdom. He was condemned for a crime of which few Engliſhmen were innocent, namely, for preferring the title of York to that of Lancaſter. But what cauſed ſtill greater dread, was that the king was perceived to have had ſpies about the lord chamberlain, to obſerve his conduct, which might be every man's caſe. The great men durſt not ſpeak their thoughts to one another, for fear thoſe whom they counted their beſt friends, were the king's ſpies. But this reſtraint was in ſome meaſure made up by ſwarms of libels againſt the judges, the council, and the king himſelf. This licence ſo diſpleaſed the king, that he ordered five perſons, convicted of diſperſing the libels, to be executed.

Richard Fox biſhop of Bath and Wells, one of the king's favourites, was tranſlated this year to the ſee of Durham.

It was likewiſe this year that Henry, the king's ſecond ſon, two years old, was created duke of York[o].

Though there was a truce concluded with Scotland to the 30th of April, 1501, there ſtill remained ſome differences between the Engliſh and Scots, concerning certain lands on the borders of the two kingdoms and the fiſhery of the river Eſke. Henry always dreading ſome inſurrection in the kingdom, was extremely deſirous to have no conteſts with his neighbours: for that reaſon he had, in May this year, moved that the differences between England and Scotland might be adjuſted. King James ſeeming to deſire the ſame thing, they both ſent embaſſadors to Caldſtream, to agree upon ſome expedient. Richard Fox was the head of the Engliſh embaſſy[p]. But with all his addreſs, he could not end an affair, which in itſelf ſeemed not very difficult. This cauſed Henry to ſuſpect that the king of Scotland reſerved it for an occaſion of quarrel, and to order the earl of Surrey to be upon his guard in the north.

Charles VIII. undertook this year the long meditated conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples. This affair is ſo well known, it would be needleſs to relate the particulars. It is neceſſary however briefly to mention the riſe and principal events.

The poſterity of Charles of Anjou, firſt king of Sicily of the houſe of France, was divided into two branches, whereof one reigned in Naples, the other in Hungary. After ſundry revolutions, the crown of Naples fell at length to Joan the firſt of that name. But in 1380, Charles de Durazzo, of the branch of Hungary, pretending to the ſame crown, and repairing into Italy, attacked queen Joan, who finding herſelf preſſed, adopted Lewis I. duke of Anjou, uncle of Charles VI. king of France. From that time there was a continual war between the two houſes of Anjou. At laſt, Charles de Durazzo remained in poſſeſſion of Naples, and was ſucceeded by Ladiſlaus his ſon, who dying in 1414, left the crown of Naples to Joan II. his ſiſter. Mean time, Lewis I. duke of Anjou, and Lewis II. his ſon, always ſtiled themſelves kings of Sicily, and preſerved their pretenſions to Sicily on this ſide the Pharo, or the kingdom of Naples. Lewis II. who died in 1471, left three ſons, namely, Lewis III. Renè, and Charles.

In 1421, Lewis III. led an army into Naples to dethrone Joan II. who for ſupport adopted Alphonſo king of Arragon. Alphonſo arriving in the kingdom of Naples, forced Lewis III. to quit the country and retire into France. Shortly after, upon ſome quarrel between Joan and Alphonſo, Joan revoking the adoption of Alphonſo, adopted the ſame Lewis of Anjou, who would have deprived her of the crown, and declared him her preſumptive heir and ſucceſſor; but Lewis died without iſſue in 1431. Joan departed this life the next year, having made a will in favour of Renè of Anjou, brother of Lewis III.

Renè made ſome attempts to take poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Naples, but to no purpoſe. Alphonſo, king of Arragon kept the crown till he died, in 1458. He left the kingdom of Arragon to John his lawful ſon, and that of Naples to Ferdinand his baſtard.

In 1474, Renè made a will, and appointed for his heir Charles earl of Main his nephew, ſon of Charles his younger brother, to the prejudice Violante his daughter, ducheſs of Lorrain, and Renè duke of Lorrain, his grandſon.

Charles earl of Main, nephew and heir of king Renè, died in 1481, leaving Lewis XI. king of France his ſole heir. By virtue of which will, Charles VIII. ſon of Lewis XI. pretended the kingdom of Naples was fallen to him.

If what has been ſaid be ever ſo little conſidered, it will doubtleſs be perceived that Charles's title to the kingdom of Naples was very diſputable. To decide the caſe in a judicial way, it would have been neceſſary to examine two points of equal importance in the affair. Firſt, whether Joan II. had power to revoke the adoption of Alphonſo king of Arragon, and to adopt Lewis of Anjou in his room. It is true, the French hiſtorians pretend Alphonſo would have dethroned his benefactreſs, and upon that ſuppoſition the reaſon of the revocation ſeems juſt. But the Arragonians grant not the fact: they aſcribe it to Joan's levity, who was inconſtant and capricious. In the next place, ſuppoſing the houſe of Anjou's title better than the houſe of Arragon's, this ſecond point muſt have been examined, whether king Renè could ſet aſide Violante his daughter and her heirs, and give the kingdom of Naples to Charles earl of Main his nephew. It could not be alledged in favour of the will, that the kingdom of Naples was a male fief, ſince the houſe of Anjou's title was derived from a daughter. So Charles VIII. could pretend to that kingdom only upon ſuppoſition that the laws decided theſe two points in his favour, which was very doubtful, not to ſay worſe: beſides, the houſe of Arragon had another title founded upon a ſixty years poſſeſſion. But what rendered the affair very intricate, was that the popes, as ſovereign lords of Naples, ſeemed to have determined it in favour of the houſe of Anjou, by inveſting the princes of that houſe with that kingdom.

But it was not ſo much his title to the kingdom of Naples that induced Charles VIII. to this conqueſt, as the juncture of time, and the ſituation of the affairs of Italy. Ferdinand king of Naples, had two ſons, namely, Alphonſo, who bore the title of duke of Calabria, and Frederick. Alphonſo had a ſon called Ferdinand, after his grandfather. Theſe Arragonian princes were not beloved in Naples nor in the reſt of Italy: beſides, old king Ferdinand had baniſhed the prince of Salerno, with all the other heads of the Angevin faction; and theſe exiles it was that excited Charles to the conqueſt. But this alone would not have ſufficed to determine him to that undertaking, had he not been encouraged by Ludovico Sforza, uncle of the duke of Milan. The occaſion was this:

The duchy of Milan was paſſed from the family of Viſconti to that of Sforza, Philippo Maria Viſconti laſt duke of that houſe, having adopted Francis Sforza, who had married Blanch his only daughter.

Franciſco Sforza becoming duke of Milan after the death of his father-in-law, died in 1466, leaving two ſons, Galeazzo who ſucceeded him, and Ludovico ſirnamed the Black. Galeazzo being aſſaſſinated, John Galeazzo his ſon ſucceeded him, under the guardianſhip of his mother, a woman infamous for her lewdneſs, and of Ludovico his uncle. Some time after, the young duke married Iſabella, daughter of Alphonſo duke of Calabria, eldeſt ſon of Ferdinand king of Naples. John Galeazzo being a prince of narrow genius, Ludovico his uncle engroſſed the whole power, leaving to his nephew only the bare title of duke, without his being much concerned. But Iſabella his ducheſs, not bearing to ſee the duke her ſpouſe without any authority, complained to the duke of Calabria her father of the ill uſage. Shortly after, the duke perſuaded Ferdinand his father to proclaim war againſt Ludovico, to compel him to reſign the government to his nephew.

To avoid the war it was that Ludovico excited Charles VIII. to undertake the conqueſt of Naples, by putting him in hopes he would aſſiſt him with all his forces. He had alſo a further deſign to make uſe of Charles's aid to become maſter of the duchy of Milan, and diſpoſſeſs John Galeazzo his nephew. He had now taken ſome private meaſures to that end with the emperor Maximilian, to whom he had given Blanch his niece in marriage, with a dower of four hundred thouſand crowns, and Maximilian had privately inveſted him with the duchy of Milan for him and his heirs.

Upon the rumour of Charles VIIIth's preparations for the conqueſt of Naples, old king Ferdinand offered him a yearly tribute of fifty thouſand crowns, but the offer was rejected. Ferdinand died a little before Charles's expedition, and was ſucceeded by Alphonſo his eldeſt ſon.

The war of Naples ſeems to be entirely foreign to the hiſtory of England. However, as it was the ſource and origin of many great events in Europe in the next century, I thought it not improper to ſhew the occaſion, and for the ſame reaſon it is neceſſary to relate the principal events.

Charles VIII. departed from Paris in July 1494, and came to Aſti in Piedmont, where he fell ſick of the ſmall-pox. This diſtemper detaining him at Aſti, he could not go from thence till the 6th of October to Turin, where he was forced to borrow the ducheſs of Savoy's jewels, ſo ill provided was he of money for an enterprize of that conſequence. Ludovico Sforza made haſte to meet him, and accompanied him to Pavia, where they found duke John Galeazzo out of order, upon eating ſomething that his uncle Ludovico had cauſed to be given him. When they came to Placentia, they heard of John Galeazzo's death: upon which Ludovico left the king, to go and take poſſeſſion of the duchy of Milan, though the late duke his nephew had left a ſon. Ludovico having obtained what he wanted, had not the ſame attachment to the king of France as before: on the contrary, he thought only how to drive him out of Italy by a league, of which he was the principal promoter.

[1495] Mean while, Charles purſuing his march, entered the ſtate of Florence, and compelled Peter de Medicis the duke to deliver him four of the beſt towns, and lend him money. He made his entry into the city of Florence the 17th of November, and publiſhed a manifeſto concerning the war of Naples. Then he took the rout to Rome, and all the places in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate readily brought him their keys. Alexander VI. upon the king's approach, deſired prince Ferdinand, ſon of the king of Naples, to depart from Rome, where he was received ſome time before. On the other hand, Frederic, brother of Alphonſo, who was upon the coaſt of Genoa with a fleet, came to Naples, where all was in the utmoſt conſternation. Thus Charles having paſſed through Italy without the leaſt oppoſition, entered Rome the 28th of December, whilſt the pope in a fright ſhut himſelf up in the caſtle of Angelo for the ſecurity of his perſon. It is time now to return to the affairs of England.

Henry perceiving the negotiation with Scotland proceeded very ſlowly, without his being able to diſcover any viſible reaſon, was apprehenſive that king James would take occaſion from their differences about the fiſhery of the river Eſke to break the truce. So, not to be ſurpriſed, he ſent the earl of Surrey orders to levy troops for the defence of the north, againſt the attempts of the Scots and Iriſh. Theſe attempts which he pretended to fear, were only an excuſe to put himſelf in a ſtate of defence, in caſe the king of Scotland ſhould attack him.

Shortly after, he made the duke of York, his ſecond ſon, preſident of the northern marches, though he was but three years old. He had made him laſt year lord lieutenant of Ireland, and by that means kept in his own coffers the ſalaries of theſe two poſts, which muſt have been given to two ſeveral lords. Never prince better underſtood the art of huſbanding his money, and making every thing turn to his profit.

The ducheſs of York, mother of Edward IV. and Richard III. died this year in a very advanced age [q].

[q] Cecily, youngeſt daughter of Ralph earl of Weſtmorland, and relict of Richard duke of York, died on May 31, in the caſtle of Berkhamſtead, in Hertfordſhire, and was buried at Fotheringham college in Northamptonſhire, by her huſband. She had lived to ſee three princes of her body crowned, and four murdered. See Sandford, p. 387.

Henry 7

In July Alexander VI. ſent into England a bull, impowering all the biſhops of the kingdom to abſolve the rebels which by Innocent VIIIth's bull was granted to the archbiſhop of Canterbury alone.

Hitherto Perkin Warbeck had not ventured to make any attempt in England, knowing that the king was informed of all his correſpondents. But as the ducheſs of Burgundy could not think of relinquiſhing her hopes of gaining ſome advantage by the idol formed by herſelf, ſhe reſolved at length to ſend him into England. She judged it neceſſary to ſound the people's affection for the houſe of York without waiting any longer for the aſſiſtance of the great men, who being narrowly watched, were very cautious. Beſides, ſhe perceived if the people ſeemed ready to riſe, there would be no want of great men to ſupport and conduct them. Wherefore, ſhe gave orders to aſſemble ſome forces and ſhips, and cauſed Perkin Warbeck to imbark, and make a deſcent in the county of Kent. Mean while, Henry knowing nothing of theſe preparations in Flanders, reſolved to go in progreſs to Yorkſhire [r] to viſit the counteſs his mother, which ſeemed to be a juncture very favourable to Perkin's deſign. But as the projected deſcent miſcarried, it was not doubted, that the king being informed of the pretended duke of York's intent, had taken that journey on purpoſe to draw him into the ſnare, ſo perſuaded were people that policy governed all his actions.

Perkin, purſuant to the ducheſs of Burgundy's directions, arrived upon the coaſt of Kent, near Sandwich, and landed ſome men to ſound the inclination of the inhabitants. Theſe troops made great boaſts of the powerful armament the duke of York had made in Flanders, pretending the ſhips in ſight were but a ſmall part of the fleet which would ſoon appear. But the people perceiving theſe men were almoſt all foreigners, inſtead of joining them, adviſed with the gentlemen of the county to know how they were to behave: and it was reſolved, they ſhould feign to be ready to aſſiſt Perkin, in order to allure him to land and take him priſoner. Purſuant to this reſolution, the people took up arms and appeared on the coaſt, making ſigns to invite Perkin and his men to land. But Perkin and his counſellor Frion ſuſpecting the artifice, kept on board, expecting the return of ſome of the people to inform them of what paſſed on ſhore. At laſt, the Kentiſhmen finding they could draw in no more, fell upon thoſe that were already landed, and cut them in pieces, except about a hundred and fifty, who being taken alive were all hanged by the king's orders. Perkin being eye-witneſs of his people's misfortunes, weighed anchor and returned into Flanders. Henry who was then on his progreſs, hearing of the deſcent, was about to turn back towards Kent; but preſently after receiving news of what had paſſed, he continued his journey [s] and ſpent ſome time with the counteſs his mother at the earl of Derby's houſe [t]. His intent was to make a ſort of excuſe to that lord for putting his brother to death, and give him withal a proof of the continuance of his favour.

The 13th of October the king called a parliament, where it was enacted, that no perſon ſhould be impeached or attainted for aſſiſting the king for the time being. It was eaſy to ſee the deſign of the act was to hinder a cloſe examination of the king's title to the crown, ſince let what would be the conſequence, thoſe that ſerved him would be always ſafe [u]. Indeed, the precedent he had himſelf given, in cauſing thoſe to be condemned that bore arms for Richard III. muſt have made his friends apprehenſive of being in the ſame caſe, if the like revolution ſhould happen. But the clauſe added in the body of the ſtatute, that if for the future, any act of attainder ſhould paſs againſt ſuch as aſſiſted the king for the time being, it ſhould be of no force; this clauſe, I ſay, was void and of no effect. For how could an act of this, limit the power of a future parliament, and cauſe an act, in its nature revocable, not to be ſo? mean while, this ſtatute, which ſeemed to be made ſolely for the people's ſafety, but was however only for the king's ſecurity, diſcovered Henry's uneaſineſs and uncertainty concerning his title.

There was alſo an act paſſed to oblige thoſe who had not paid their quota of the benevolence, to pay the arrears by ſuch a time. This act brought in large ſums to the king, the arrears of this tax being very conſiderable, becauſe the war with France not having laſted any time, many perſons had declined to pay either in full or in part. It appears in the Collection of the Public acts, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury was indebted fifteen hundred pounds ſterling [w].

Whilſt the parliament was yet aſſembled, the king received advice, that Perkin Warbeck was landed in Ireland. As this could not be but with ſome ill deſign, he gave orders that the coaſt ſhould be ſtrictly guarded, to be ready to oppoſe a deſcent wherever it was made. It was but too true, that the ducheſs of Burgundy had ſent Perkin into Ireland to raiſe a rebellion, and to that end ſhe had privately treated with the king of Scotland, who it is likely, had promiſed to aid him. The common opinion is, that the emperor, the archduke Philip, and the king of France, were likewiſe in the plot; the two firſt, in revenge of Henry's prohibition to his ſubjects of all commer with the Low-Countries; and the other, to hinder his entering into a league that was forming in Italy, to which he was ſtrongly ſolicited. Be this as it will, very probably James, in promiſing to eſpouſe the intereſt of the pretended duke of York, had been led thereto by ſome private view, or by the ſolicitation of ſome other prince.

Mean-while, ſince Poynings had been in Ireland, the affairs of that iſland were quite altered. So Perkin not finding the country inclined to favour his deſigns, departed for Scotland, where in all appearance he knew he ſhould be welcome. When he came to Edinburgh, he demanded an audience of the king by the name of the duke of York. James feigning an extreme ſurpriſe, gave him a ſolemn reception in the preſence of the whole court. Perkin made a long ſpeech, recounting his pretended adventures, and how he eſcaped the cruelty of Richard III. Then he inveighed againſt Henry Tudor, who had uſurped the crown of England, and unjuſtly detained it from the lawful heirs of Edward IV. He enlarged upon the methods he had uſed to endeavour to recover his kingdom: he concluded with ſaying, that ſundry accidents having prevented him from ſucceeding, he was come to put himſelf under his protection, in hopes, that with the aſſiſtance of ſo generous a prince, he ſhould expel the uſurper, and aſcend the throne of his anceſtors: that then he ſhould always regard him as a brother, and never miſs an opportunity of ſhewing his gratitude.

James ſeemed to be moved with Perkin's misfortunes, and told him, whoever he was, he ſhould not repent of putting himſelf into his hands. However, he pretended ſtill to have ſome doubt, to ſhew it was upon mature examination that he was convinced of the truth. Shortly after, he publicly owned him for duke of York, and gave him in marriage Catherine Gordon, daughter to the earl of Huntly, one of the handſomeſt and moſt accompliſhed ladies in Scotland.

Henry, whether he had received private notice of what was plotting againſt him, or it was a pure effect of his foreſight, ardently wiſhed to live in good underſtaning with the king of Scotland. To that end, he had empowered his embaſſadors [x], who were to repair to Caldſtream, to treat of the marriage of Margaret his eldeſt daughter with that prince. The marriage was indeed accompliſhed ſome years after; but in all likelihood it was not mentioned in this congreſs, the embaſſadors of England having doubtleſs perceived that ſuch a propoſal would be unſeaſonable.

The 28th of January 1495, Charles VIII. departed from Rome, after receiving the ſtrongeſt towns of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, with cardinal Cæſar Borgia, natural ſon of pope Alexander VI. in hoſtage. Whilſt he was upon the march, the embaſſadors of Ferdinand king of Spain told him from his maſter, that when he promiſed not to moleſt him in the conqueſt of Naples, he did not mean that the conqueſt was to extend to all Italy. That notwithſtanding he ſaw him in poſſeſſion of Florence, Piſa, and all the papal dominions. That therefore he declared, he did not think himſelf bound to the obſervance of their treaty, and accordingly the embaſſador tore it in pieces before his face. Charles, who was ſailing with a proſperous gale, made a jeſt of theſe threats, and purſued his march.

[u] My lord Bacon obſerves, that though this law ſeemed to aim more at the people's ſafety than the king's, yet did it take off from his party that great tie and ſpur of neceſſity, to fight and go victors out of the field, conſidering their lives and fortunes were in ſafety whether they ſtood or run away.

[w] The other remarkable ſtatutes enacted in this parliament were theſe: 1. That vagabonds, idle and ſuſpected perſons, ſhall be ſet in the ſtocks three days and three nights, and have no other ſuſtenance but bread and water, and then ſhall be put out of the town. And whoſoever ſhall give ſuch perſons more, ſhall forfeit twelve-pence. This act was afterwards explained, 39 Elizabeth. 2. That poor perſons who are not able to ſue according to the laws of the land, for the redreſs of injuries and wrongs to them done, ſhall be admitted in Formâ Pauperis, without paying fees to councellor, attorney, or clerk. 3. That no manner of perſon ſhall carry, or ſend any horſe or mare, above the value of ſix ſhillings and eight-pence, out of the realm, upon pain of forfeiting the ſame; except it be for their own uſe. 4. That no perſon ſhall make, or put to ſale any feather-beds, bolſters, or pillows, but what are ſtuffed with dry pulled feathers, or clean down; and not with ſcaled feathers, or fenn-down. Mean while Alphonſo, the new king of Naples, finding himſelf attacked by a powerful king who was now upon the borders of his dominions, was entirely diſcouraged. As he knew he was not beloved by his ſubjects, he reſigned his crown to Ferdinand his ſon, and retired to a monaſtery, where he died that year. The new king willing to defend his kingdom, advanced towards the frontiers to endeavour to ſtop the king of France: but he ſaw himſelf ſuddenly deſerted by his own troops. In his extremity he would have retired to Naples, but found the gates ſhut. In ſhort, he was forced to ſeek a retreat in the little iſle of Iſchia, having firſt garriſoned the caſtles of his metropolis, where he could enter without paſſing through the city.

In the mean time, Charles ſtill continued his march: Triulzi, a Milaneſe, who was in the ſervice of the king of Naples, having ſurrendered Capua, all the reſt of the towns ſent him deputies with offers of ſubmiſſion. At laſt, he entered Naples the 22d of February, and within few days became maſter of the caſtles.

Such a torrent of ſucceſs ſo blinded the young monarch and his council, that they knew not how to take any juſt meaſures for the preſervation of the conqueſt. By degrees the towns that had ſubmitted, returned to their ſovereign; his army, which was not very numerous, being unable to furniſh garriſons every where. Beſides, the French made themſelves ſo odious to the people of Naples, that they ſoon repented of receiving them.

But what moſt embroiled the conqueror's affairs, was a league formed againſt him by the pope, the emperor, the king of Spain, the archduke, the king of Naples, Ludovico Sforza the new duke of Milan, and the republic of Venice. This league, which was for twenty-five years, was ſigned the 25th of March 1495, and at the ſame time the confederates began to aſſemble their forces.

Charles found then, it was time to think of his return. But he was reſolved firſt to make a triumphant entry into Naples, from whence he departed the 20th of May in order for France, leaving but few troops to defend his conqueſt. But the allies did not intend to ſuffer him to retire thus peaceably. They expected him upon his rout, with an army of forty thouſand men, and poſted themſelves at Fornova to oppoſe his paſſage. Though Charles was very inferior in number of troops [y], he was determined to give them battle, being ſenſible he muſt either conquer or periſh. The battle was fought on the 6th of July, and the ſucceſs was favourable to the king of France, who defeated that formidable army, and came to Aſti the 15th of the ſame month [z].

Whilſt he was retiring through Italy, Naples ſubmitted again to Ferdinand, and almoſt all the reſt of the towns that were ſtill in the French intereſt, followed that example. The duke of Montpenſier, left by Charles at Naples with a few troops, retired to the caſtle of le Ovo, where after maintaining a ſiege of three months, he was forced at laſt to capitulate. Thus Charles, who had conquered the kingdom of Naples in the ſpace of three weeks, loſt it with the ſame rapidity. He formed afterwards ſeveral projects to recover his conqueſt, which, by the obſtacles that occurred, came to nothing.

This year the emperor Maximilian came into the Low-Countries, and reſigned the government to his ſon Philip, though he ſtill wanted ſome years of being of age. After that, he returned into Germany. Philip, being no longer under the emperor's guardianſhip, ſent, about the end of the year, embaſſadors to Henry, to deſire the renewal of the commerce between England and the Low-Countries.

The embaſſadors found no great difficulty to ſucceed in their negotiation. The renewal of the commerce which they were come to deſire, was no leſs neceſſary for the Engliſh than for the Flemings. So, the 24th of February 1496, was concluded at London a treaty of peace and perpetual amity between Henry and Philip, and the trade between the two nations was ſettled to the ſatisfaction of both parties.

Among the articles of the treaty, there were two particularly remarkable. By the firſt, the two princes engaged to give neither aid nor refuge to the rebellious ſubjects of either. Particularly, Philip obliged himſelf expreſsly to hinder the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy from harbouring the king's rebellious ſubjects in the lands ſhe poſſeſſed, by what title ſoever ſhe held them, whether of dower or otherwiſe. That in caſe ſhe acted contrary to his prohibition, he promiſed to deprive her of all her poſſeſſions in the Low-Countries.

By another article it was expreſsly agreed that any veſſel ſuffering ſhipwreck on the coaſts of either of the two princes, ſhould not be liable to confiſcation, provided there was left alive a man, a woman, or child, a dog, a cat, or a cock.

The Flemings called this treaty [Intercurſus Magnus] or the great Treaty of Commerce, not only by reaſon of the great number of articles, but chiefly with reſpect to another made afterwards, and which not being ſo much to their advantage, was termed [Intercurſus Malus] or the bad treaty.

We find the Collection of the Public Acts, that March the 5th this year, the king granted a patent to John Cabott, a Venetian, and to three of his ſons [a], to go in queſt of new lands with Engliſh colours [b]. The terms were, that after all charges deducted, they ſhould give the king a fifth of the profit [c].

Mean-while, the king of Scotland, not content with affording the pretended duke of York a ſanctuary in his dominions, would likewiſe undertake to place him on the throne of England. He was told, that as ſoon as he appeared in that kingdom at the head of an army, all the Yorkiſts would riſe in favour of the pretender. To that end it was, that immediately after his arrival in England, he took care to diſperſe the counterfeit duke's proclamation, wherein the king was termed uſurper, tyrant, and murderer. Moreover, he promiſed all ſorts of favours to ſuch as would join the lawful heir, to deſtroy him that unjuſtly detained the crown. But the proclamation was ſo ineffectual, that not a man offered to join the Scots. The truth is, Henry was not beloved, eſpecially in thoſe parts. But as, ſince Perkin had begun to appear by the name of duke of York, many were undeceived, and others in doubt, it was not thought proper to hazard life and fortune, without a greater aſſurance that it was really for a ſon of Edward IV. Beſides the execution of the lord chamberlain was a terror to all, as no man could reaſonably expect the king's pardon, ſince that lord was not ſpared. At length, James ſeeing he waited in vain that the Engliſh would take up arms in favour of the duke of York, and being unwilling wholly to loſe his labour, ravaged Northumberland and got a great booty. Then Perkin feigning to be extremely moved with the calamities of the Engliſh, conjured that prince, before his whole court, to ſpare his miſerable ſubjects. This was a very artful advice to perſuade the public he was really what he pretended to be. James replied with a ſmile, he thought him very generous to be ſo careful for what was none of his, in order to ſave it for his enemy's uſe. Mean-while, the news that an Engliſh army was advancing, made him reſolve to return into his own country, being unwilling to expoſe his great ſpoils to the hazard of a battle. Thus the expedition, from which he expected ſo great effects, ended only in the ruin of the people of Northumberland.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, Charles VIII. fearing Henry would enter into the league of Italy, took care to have the peace of Eſtaples confirmed by the ſtates, as he was bound by the treaty, which he had hitherto neglected, tho' it was confirmed by the parliament of England the laſt year. However, as he thought not proper to aſſemble the ſtates-general, he cauſed the peace to be approved by the ſtates of each province, with which, in all appearance, Henry was ſatisfied. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, the approbations of the ſtates of Languedoc, Normandy, and ſeveral other provinces, as likewiſe of particular towns of little note, ſigned by great numbers of common people, as tradeſmen and huſbandmen.

Though the king of Scotland's invaſion had produced no great effect, Henry was however apprehenſive of the conſequences. He knew his ſubjects were not pleaſed: that the Yorkiſts were very numerous; that Ireland was not well-affected; and that Perkin Warbeck was in Scotland ready to take advantage of theſe diſpoſitions. So, to prevent danger which might ariſe from all theſe quarters, he granted firſt a general pardon to all the Iriſh adherents of the pretended duke of York, leſt the dread of puniſhment ſhould carry them to revolt. In the ſecond place, he commiſſioned Richard Fox, biſhop of Durham, to try, as of himſelf, to enter into negotiation with the king of Scotland, to treat of the marriage of his eldeſt daughter Margaret, with that prince. Laſtly, he ſent embaſſadors [d] to Ferdinand and Iſabella, to confirm his

But it appears from cardinal Bembo, and other Italian authors, that the king of France retired, after this battle, in the utmoſt hurry; and that Ludovico Sforza, and Franciſco Gonzaga, the Italian general, favoured his eſcape. As their forces were much ſuperior to thoſe of the French king, they might eaſily have cut off his retreat, if they had not acted treacherouſly, as it is undeniably plain they did. See card. Bemb. alliance with them, and ſecure, by freſh engagements, the marriage of Arthur his eldeſt ſon, with Catherine their third daughter.

Some time before he had diſpatched to Rome Robert Sherburn, who had in his name entered into the league of Italy[e] againſt Charles VIII. and the 23d of September ratified what his embaſſadors had done. He thereby thought himſelf ſufficiently ſupported: for he had nothing to fear from the king of France, who was elſewhere employed, and the moſt potent princes of Europe were his friends and allies. As for the king of Scotland, he believed he could eaſily reſiſt him in caſe of attack. However, though he had now taken meaſures to make peace with that prince, and had reaſon to hope for ſucceſs, he believed he ought not to loſe the opportunity to demand an aid of money of the parliament, as well to put himſelf in a ſtate of defence, as to revenge the inſults of the Scots. For that purpoſe he called a parliament the 16th of January following. It was however eaſy to foreſee the king of Scotland being ſupported neither by France, nor the archduke, nor the ducheſs of Burgundy, would not undertake to maintain alone a war for the ſake of Perkin Warbeck, though he were ſo blind as to believe him the real duke of York.

In October this year, Jane ſecond daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, came into the Low-Countries to marry the archduke Philip, to whom ſhe had been contracted. Iſabella her eldeſt ſiſter had been married in 1490, to Alphonſo king of Portugal, who died ſhortly after. The ſame ſhips that brought Jane into the Low-Countries, ſerved to carry Margaret of Auſtria, Philip's ſiſter into Spain, to conſummate her marriage with prince John, heir apparent of Caſtile and Arragon[f].

[1497] The parliament being aſſembled the beginning of this year[g], the king made a ſpeech to both houſes, highly aggravating the affront received from the king of Scotland: he repreſented very pathetically the calamities endured by his northern ſubjects, at a time when the truce ſhould have ſecured them from ſuch inſults: in ſhort, he told them, his honour and the protection he owed to his people would not ſuffer him to let theſe wrongs paſs unrevenged. The parliament underſtanding him well, gave him a ſubſidy[h], after which they were inſtantly diſſolved as having been called purpoſely for that affair.

Though Henry hoped much from his negotiation with the king of Scotland, he perceived it neceſſary to prepare for war; otherwiſe negotiations generally proved fruitleſs. The levy of the ſubſidy granted by the parliament was the firſt and principal preparation. The neceſſity of a war with Scotland afforded the king a pretence to haſten that affair, from which he expected the ſame advantage as from that of Bretagne, that is to ſay, to put the whole ſubſidy into his coffers. To that end it was neceſſary it ſhould be levied before the peace was concluded with Scotland, elſe the people would pay their money with reluctance. As the king ſet his heart upon this buſineſs, he gave very ſtrict orders to the commiſſioners who were to gather the ſubſidy in the ſeveral counties.

The commiſſioners proceeding with great rigour, met in the country of Cornwall with unexpected oppoſition. The Corniſhmen being leſs tractable than thoſe of other counties, loudly complained, that for ſome petty damage done to the other end of the kingdom, they were robbed of their neceſſary ſubſiſtence. Theſe murmurs were encouraged by Michael Joſeph a farrier of Bodmin, and Thomas Flammock a lawyer. Flammock affirmed, that ſubſidies were not to be granted or levied for the war of Scotland (the law having provided for it by eſcuage,) much leſs when the Scotch invaſion was made a pretence to fleece the whole kingdom: that it would be a ſhame to ſubmit to ſuch an oppreſſion, that all the miſchief ſolely proceeded from the king's miniſters, who made their court at the poor people's coſt: that to free themſelves from theſe grievances, it was proper to take up arms, and without injuring any perſon, go and preſent a petition to the king, to pray him to deſiſt from the tax, and puniſh his evil counſellors, for a warning to others how they gave him ſuch advice for the future: that a greater ſervice could not be done to the kingdom, than to deliver it from ſuch harpies, who ruined it under colour of procuring the king's good. Flammock's chief aim was at Morton archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Reginald Bray, becauſe they were generally the king's inſtruments in affairs of this nature.

Flammock and Joſeph perceiving the people began to take fire, offered to lead them, till ſome perſon of quality ſhould head them, which as they ſaid would ſoon happen. And indeed it appeared afterwards they were encouraged by perſons of greater conſideration. This was ſufficient to excite all the rabble of the country to an inſurrection, and arming themſelves in the beſt manner they could, they marched under the conduct of theſe two incendiaries into Devonſhire, and from thence into Somerſetſhire. The number of the rebels daily increaſed by many people of the place where they paſſed, who had nothing to loſe, and were inflamed by the king's ſecret enemies. At Taunton they killed a commiſſioner[i], who had ſignalized himſelf by his rigour in levying the ſubſidy. This was all the miſchief they did in their march. Then they proceeded to Wells, where the lord Audley[k], a nobleman of a reſtleſs and diſcontented ſpirit, came and joined them, and was immediately accepted as their general. Audley putting himſelf at their head, led them directly to Saliſbury and from thence to Wincheſter, without ſuffering them to commit any violence, and obliging them to be ſatisfied with a bare ſubſiſtence. When they came to Wincheſter, inſtead of marching to London, as was intended at firſt, they forced their general to lead them into Kent. Flammock having told them the people of that county were very fond of liberty, they fancied they ſhould be immediately joined by them in defence of the rights and privileges of the nation: but when they came there they were greatly diſappointed: by the diligence of ſome Kentiſh lords[l], not a man offered to take up arms in their favour. This coldneſs diſcouraged many of the rebels, who foreſeeing their enterprize would not be ſucceſsful, returned quietly to their homes. But thoſe that remained, being encouraged by the king's remiſſneſs, who had ſuffered them to proceed ſo far unmoleſted, inſolently boaſted they would give him battle, or take London before his face. In this reſolution they went and encamped[m] between Greenwich and Eltham, within a few miles of London.

When the king firſt heard of the inſurrection, he was under ſome conſternation. A war with Scotland, a rebellion in the kingdom, and a pretender to the crown, ſeemed to him to be three affairs of the laſt importance, eſpecially as they came upon him at once: beſides, his inward uneaſineſs concerning the doubtfulneſs of his title, helped to magniſy objects. He was apprehenſive that the Corniſh rebellion was the beginning of a general conſpiracy, whereof Perkin was waiting the event in Scotland. Happily for him, this rebellion was at a time when he had an army in readineſs, which was to march into the north under the command of the lord D'Aubeney. But the news of the inſurrection made him keep his forces about London, not thinking it fit to ſend them into the north at ſuch a juncture. He contented himſelf therefore with detaching the earl of Surrey, and ſending him towards the borders of Scotland, to oppoſe king James, in caſe he thought of making a ſecond inroad into England. Mean-while, the rebels traverſed the counties, and the king made no motion to ſtop them. This conduct ſurpriſed all the world, conſidering it was his cuſtom ſpeedily to march to the place where danger began to appear. But upon this occaſion he thought beſt to act otherwiſe, for ſeveral reaſons: firſt, he was very glad the rebels were ſo far from their homes, and harraſſed themſelves with long marches: in the ſecond place he did not ſee any neceſſity to haſten to attack them, ſince they committed no outrages: beſides, he could not find that their numbers increaſed. But the chief reaſon of his ſlowneſs was to ſee if they had any correſpondents in other counties, in order to divide his army, if neceſſary, to haſten to the relief of the weakeſt. In fine, age and the continued enjoyment of a crown had doubtleſs rendered him leſs careful of dangers. Any other way ſeemed to him leſs hazardous than a battle to remedy evils of this nature.

But when the rebels were encamped on Blackheath, in view of the city of London, the king could no longer delay to attack them; he would have given occaſion to believe his coolneſs proceeded from fear, which might have produced very ill effects among the people. However, as he was much ſuperior to the mal-contents, both in number of troops and military knowledge, he reſolved ſo diſpoſe all things as to

To that end, he divided his army into three bodies, the firſt whereof, commanded by the earl of Oxford [n], was ordered behind the hill, where the rebels were encamped, to cut off their retreat, and if neceſſary, attack them in the rear. The ſecond, led by the lord d'Aubeney, was appointed to charge them in front. The king retained the third about his own perſon, and encamped in St. George's Fields, that in caſe of ill ſucceſs he might be ready to renew the fight, or throw himſelf into London and ſecure the city as he ſhould think proper: beſides, he was not ſo far off but he could ſuccour his people during the battle.

Every thing ſucceeded as the king expected. The rebels ſuffered themſelves to be deceived by a report he had cauſed to be ſpread, that he intended to give them battle on the Monday following, whereas he attacked them on the Sunday, which of all the days in the week he fancied to be the moſt fortunate. As they expected it not, they were ſo ſurpriſed that they had ſcarce time to draw up. On the other hand, for want of intelligence, they ſuffered themſelves to be ſurrounded by the earl of Oxford, who being poſted behind them hindered their retreat: ſo, of ſix thouſand [o], which was their number, two thouſand were ſlain on the ſpot, and the reſt forced to ſurrender at diſcretion, there being no way to eſcape. The king cauſed to be executed only the lord Audley [p], Flammock, and the Farrier [q], who were taken alive, but gave the priſoners to the captors, with leave to compound with them for their ranſoms as they ſhould judge fit. It is not unlikely that the moderation of the rebels in their march from Cornwal to London, tempered alſo the king's ſeverity, eſpecially as they had not aſſerted the title of the houſe of York, a crime he never forgave. Be this as it will, he was ſatisfied with theſe three victims to atone for this great rebellion.

Shortly after the battle, the archduke's embaſſadors ſigned at London articles of agreement, whereby, in explaining the late treaty of commerce, the archduke deſiſted from the duty of a florin, which he before exacted upon every piece of Engliſh cloth imported into his dominions.

The 18th of July, Henry ratified the marriage articles between Arthur, his eldeſt ſon, and Catherine of Arragon. The marriage had been concluded in 1491, and confirmed October 1, 1496.

About the ſame time Charles VIII. ſent an embaſſy into England on purpoſe to confirm the peace of Eſtaples by the reparation of certain outrages committed on both ſides.

But whilſt Henry was employed againſt the Corniſh rebels, the king of Scotland thinking it a favourable juncture, made a ſecond irruption into England, and appeared before the caſtle of Norham. But the earl of Surrey, then in Yorkſhire, haſtening to its relief [r], James raiſed the ſiege and retired into his own kingdom. The earl of Surrey, not ſatisfied with driving him out of England, purſued him into Scotland, and took the little town of Aton. This war was inconvenient to the king upon ſeveral accounts: firſt, he could not continue it without uſing all the money given by the parliament, which he would have gladly avoided: beſides, Perkin Warbeck made him uneaſy, and he perceived it would be eaſier to remove him from Scotland by treaty than by arms. He would not, however make the firſt advances, but wiſhed the propoſal of peace to come from another, to avoid the diſgrace of a refuſal in caſe the king of Scotland was diſinclined.

Whilſt he was in this perplexity, he bethought himſelf that don Pedro d'Ayala the Spaniſh embaſſador, would be a proper inſtrument to accompliſh the affair. Ayala willingly undertook to go to the king of Scotland, and propoſe, as of himſelf, an agreement with the king of England. He uſed for pretence that king Ferdinand, his maſter, could receive no greater ſatisfaction than to ſee the two kings his friends and allies, live in peace and good neighbourhood. The expedient ſucceeded according to Henry's expectation. The embaſſador found the king of Scotland ſo well inclined, that he wrote to the king, if he would enter into a negotiation he did not queſtion the ſucceſs: whereupon the two kings ſent their embaſſadors [s] to Aton, to treat of a peace, Ayala performing the office of mediator. The greateſt difficulty in the negotiation was concerning Perkin Warbeck, whom Henry demanded, and the king of Scotland would not deliver. The biſhop of Durham [t] perceiving he could not gain that point, propoſed an interview of the two kings at Newcaſtle: but when it was mentioned to the king of Scotland, he ſaid, though he was very deſirous of peace, he would not go and beg of his enemy. At length an expedient was found agreeable to both parties; and that was, the king of Scotland ſhould honourably diſmiſs the pretended duke of York, before the negotiation of a peace was carried any farther, leſt he ſhould be thought to be forced to it; that afterwards they ſhould treat as if Perkin had never been in Scotland.

Purſuant to this agreement, James told the pretended duke he had done for him all that lay in his power: that he had twice entered England at the head of an army, to try the diſpoſition of the Engliſh: that not having found what was expected, there was no likelihood that with his forces alone he could place him on the throne, and diſpoſſeſs a king ſo firmly eſtabliſhed: that his misfortune proceeded ſolely from the Engliſh refuſing to eſpouſe his quarrel, and his being forſaken by thoſe who had engaged him in the undertaking, whilſt the Scots expoſed their lives for his ſake: that therefore he adviſed him to ſeek his fortune elſewhere; but nevertheleſs he would make good what he told him at firſt, "That he ſhould not repent of putting himſelf into his hands." Perkin ſeeing the king of Scotland bent to diſmiſs him, thanked him for the protection he had hitherto given him, and for all his other favours, entreating him to convey him into Ireland with his wife, which the king immediately granted.

As ſoon as Perkin was removed from Scotland there were no farther obſtacles to a peace. The embaſſadors, aſſembled at Aton, ſigned a truce for ſeven years, commencing the 30th of September, the day of ſigning the treaty. It was expreſly agreed that neither of the two kings ſhould make war upon the other by himſelf or ſubjects, or by any other perſon, whereby Perkin Warbeck was plainly meant, without naming him: that with reſpect to certain points not ſettled by the two embaſſadors, the two kings referred them to the deciſion of Ferdinand and Iſabella. Afterwards this truce, limited to ſeven years, was prolonged till a year after the death of the ſurvivor of the two princes. In fine, each of the two kings gave letters patent to the mediator, deſiring him to report to Ferdinand and Iſabella the differences yet undecided, promiſing to ſtand to their determination. Theſe letters were full of marks of eſteem and acknowledgment for the embaſſador, and the two kings ſhewed how well pleaſed they were with his equity, wiſdom, impartiality, and the trouble he had readily taken upon him. Nothing could be more honourable for Ayala (whom the Engliſh and Scotch writers call Hialas or Elias) than the perfect confidence placed in him by theſe two monarchs. But then it may be ſaid, he had the good fortune to find them equally inclined to a peace ſo neceſſary for both.

I obſerved that in 1495 and 1496, Henry empowered his embaſſadors to treat of a marriage between Margaret his daughter and the king of Scotland. But it does not appear, the affair was mentioned in any of the former negotiations, or even in this I have been ſpeaking of. It is however very probable, that Henry, who deſired the marriage, did not fail to inſinuate the propoſal by the Spaniſh embaſſador, who was in his intereſt and confidence. It was a very proper occaſion ſince Ayala might make the overture as from himſelf, without engaging Henry in caſe of refuſal. It went no farther then, but we ſhall ſee preſently the happy effects of this overture, which gave birth to the union of the two kingdoms.

In the beginning of the year, Margaret, of Auſtria, ſiſter of the archduke, went into Spain to Don John her huſband. The nuptials were celebrated with great ſolemnity and magnificence. But in a few months after, Don John died, leaving the princeſs with child, who was delivered of a ſtillborn infant.

By the death of Don John, his ſiſter Iſabella, widow of prince Alphonſo, of Portugal, became heir-apparent of the kingdoms of Caſtile and Arragon. Since the death of the prince her ſpouſe, ſhe had been contracted to Don Manuel, the new king of Portugal, who hearing of Don John's ſickneſs, ſo preſſed his marriage that it was conſummated before that prince expired.

The laſt year, as was related, Charles VIII. loſt the kingdom of Naples. Though the diviſions among the princes of Italy ſeemed to invite him again to that conqueſt, he could never reſolve, becauſe he had turned all his thoughts to love and pleaſure. He duly paid Henry twenty-five thouſand livres every half year, as bound by the treaty of Eſtaples, for fear of drawing upon himſelf new troubles from England.

[1498] After the treaty of Eſtaples, there was neither war nor difference between France and England during the reſt of Henry VIIth's reign. Charles and Henry ſtood in awe of each other. Charles, who at firſt had formed vaſt projects, perceived the king of England was the only prince that could lay obſtacles in his way. Afterwards, when he deſiſted from the war of Italy, and indulged his pleaſures, he always feared that a war with Henry would diſturb his tranquillity. Henry on his part dreaded all foreign wars, and particularly with France, by reaſon of his domeſtic enemies. Thus the two monarchs having the ſame intereſt, lived in peace till Charles's death, on the 6th of April 1498. The duke of Orleans, who ſucceeded him by the name of Lewis XII. was no leſs careful to preſerve a good underſtanding with England [a]. As he turned all his thoughts to Italy, it highly concerned him to keep fair with Henry, who would have it in his power to overthrow all his projects by a diverſion in Picardy. As ſoon as Lewis was on the throne, he cauſed his marriage with Jane daughter of Lewis XI. to be annulled in order to eſpouſe Anne of Bretagne his predeceſſor's widow. Otherwiſe he would have run the riſk of ſeeing Bretagne once more ſevered from France, and in the hands of a foreign houſe.

Though Henry had nothing to fear from abroad, ſince he was in peace with all the princes in Europe, it was not the ſame with regard to his own ſubjects. Before he could acquire that perfect tranquillity, he ſo earneſtly longed for, he had a freſh attack to maintain from the Corniſhmen. Perkin, who having learnt to live like a prince, could not reſolve to return to his primitive ſtate, embraced this opportunity to create him new troubles.

The Corniſh rebels had been treated more gently than they had reaſon to expect, conſidering the nature of their crime, which ſovereigns never willingly pardon. Moſt of them had compounded for two or three ſhillings a man, ſo miſerable were they. Theſe being returned home, publicly ſaid, if the king had treated them with lenity, it was not from a motive of clemency, but becauſe he was ſenſible if he puniſhed all that were of their mind, he muſt hang up three parts in four of his ſubjects. Theſe diſcourſes making their friends and neighbours believe, the whole kingdom was ready to riſe, they began to flock together, and ſhew they were not diſcouraged by the battle of Blackheath. At laſt ſome of the moſt fiery hearing Perkin was in Ireland, propoſed to ſend for him and ſet him at their head. The propoſal meeting with applauſe, they ſent to Warbeck, that if he would come among them, he ſhould find no contemptible aid, and that with the aſſiſtance of other good Engliſhmen, they hoped to place him on the throne.

Perkin being without any refuge in Ireland, and expecting nothing more either from Scotland or France, or the Low-Countries, gladly accepted the invitation. He had with him for counſellors, Hern a broken mercer, Skelton a taylor, and Aſtley a ſcrivener, who perſuaded him to take that courſe. They told him, he had committed a great error in relying on the ducheſs of Burgundy, and the kings of France and Scotland, who without regarding his, had only their own intereſts in view: that he had been ill adviſed when he landed in Kent, which was too near London; but if he had been ſo fortunate as to have been in Cornwal when the Corniſhmen took up arms, he had been crowned at Weſtminſter before now: that the Scots were not proper inſtruments to place him on the throne, by reaſon of the averſion the Engliſh had for them; but, he muſt wholly depend upon the people of England, who alone were capable of procuring him the crown: that therefore they adviſed him to repair into Cornwal, where he was expected.

Purſuant to this advice, Perkin embarked for Cornwal, having with him about ſeventy men [x] on four ſmall veſſels, and arrived in September [y] at Whitſand-Bay. As ſoon as he had landed his little troop, he came to Bodmin, the farrier's town, who was hanged after the battle of Blackheath. There aſſembling about three thouſand men, he iſſued out a proclamation aſſuming the title of king of England, and the name of Richard IV. He was very free of his reproaches and invectives againſt Henry and his government, with magnificent promiſes to ſuch as ſhould take up arms to dethrone the uſurper. After publiſhing his proclamation, he formed a deſign to become maſter of Exeter, as well to make it ſerve for a magazine, as a retreat in caſe of need. At firſt he tried to bribe the inhabitants with promiſing them the preſervation and augmentation of their privileges. But finding they would not hearken to him, he reſolved to ſtorm the city. As he had no artillery, he was forced to ſcale the walls, and at the ſame time attempted to fire one of the gates. But the attempt miſcarried, and he loſt two hundred men in the aſſault.

Henry hearing that Perkin had joined the Corniſh rebels, and was before Exeter, ſaid merrily, "he hoped now to have the honour to ſee him which he could never yet do." He intimated withal, he ſhould receive with pleaſure and thankfulneſs, the ſervices the nobility ſhould do him upon that occaſion. Whereupon, ſeveral lords and gentlemen of Devonſhire, and the neighbouring parts, uncalled from court, drew ſome forces together, and put themſelves under arms [z]. On the other hand, the king ordered the lord d'Aubeney to march to the relief of Exeter, ſpreading a report of his following in perſon with a numerous army.

Perkin, upon news of the preparations againſt him, raiſed the ſiege of Exeter, and retired to Taunton, where he prepared all things as if he intended to fight. But that very night he fled to Bewley monaſtery, in the New Foreſt, where he and ſeveral of his company regiſtered themſelves ſanctuarymen. The lord d'Aubeney hearing Perkin had forſaken his army, detached three hundred horſe [a] to purſue him, and prevent his eſcaping by ſea. The purſuers arriving too late at Bewley, contented themſelves with beſetting the ſanctuary till further orders. Mean while, Perkin's troops, which were increaſed to ſix thouſand, being deſtitute of their head, ſubmitted to the king's mercy, who pardoned them all except a few ring-leaders who were hanged for an example. Preſently after, he ſent a detachment of horſe to St. Michael's mount, to bring away Perkin's wife who was retired thither, leſt, if ſhe was with child and eſcaped, the buſineſs ſhould not end in the perſon of Perkin. This virtuous lady, who loved her huſband entirely though unworthy of her, ſo gained the king's favour by her modeſty, that he gave her a very gracious reception. He comforted her himſelf in a very affectionate manner, had her conducted to the queen, and aſſigned her an honourable allowance, which ſhe enjoyed during the king's life, and many years after. She was called the White Roſe, as well on account of her beauty, as becauſe of the name given by the ducheſs of Burgundy to her huſband.

Though Perkin was in a place from whence he could not eſcape, the king however came to Exeter, to inquire more ſtrictly into the cauſes and origin of the rebellion. As he entered the city, he took his ſword from his ſide and gave it to the mayor, to be always carried before him, honouring by that mark of diſtinction the zeal ſhewn by the citizens for his ſervice. On the morrow, he cauſed ſome of the rebels to be hanged in ſacrifice to the inhabitants of Exeter, and as a ſort of ſatisfaction for what they had ſuffered. For the reſt who had ſubmitted to his mercy, he gave them indeed their lives, but withal appointed commiſſioners [b] to puniſh them by fines. He proceeded on this occaſion with exceſſive ſeverity. One would have thought he repented of giving them their lives, and deſigned to ſtarve the miſerable wretches after freeing them from the gallows.

After that, he adviſed with his council, upon what ſhould be done with Perkin, who was ſtill inveſted in his ſanctuary. Some were for taking him out by force, and putting him to death, not at all queſtioning, that after his execution, the king might eaſily agree with the pope. Others on the contrary believed, that according to the licence granted by Innocent VIIIth's bull, it ſufficed to have him narrowly watched, and that, without neceſſity, ſuch an advantage ſhould not be given to the pope. Moreover, that the king ought carefully to avoid being deemed a violator of ſanctuaries, of which his enemies would not fail to take the advantage. In ſhort, ſome there were who plainly told the king, he would never ſatisfy the people, that Perkin was an impoſter, unleſs Warbeck himſelf freely undeceived thoſe that were ſeduced by his artifices: that therefore the beſt method that could be taken was, to engage him by a pardon to make himſelf a confeſſion of his crime. The king following this advice, ſent to offer Perkin his life, if he would voluntary ſurrender himſelf. Perkin readily accepted the offer. He ſaw himſelf ſo ſtrictly watched and guarded, that he deſpaired to make his eſcape. Beſides, ſuppoſing he could have eſcaped, he was deſtitute of all hopes, after an unſucceſsful trial of ſo many different means.

Shortly after, the king ordered Perkin to be brought to court, as if he was in full liberty, but however, attended by ſeveral perſons who were commanded to guard him with all care leſt he made his eſcape. Every one might ſee and talk with him, but he could never obtain leave to throw himſelf at the king's feet, though the king, to ſatisfy his curioſity, ſaw him without been ſeen. After that, Perkin was conducted to London. He was all the way expoſed to the inſults and deriſion of the people; but ſeemed to bear all with great courage and conſtancy. Never did he act the prince better than upon this occaſion, without affecting too great an inſenſibility, or ſhewing too much dejection. When he was come to London, he was made to ride twice through the city, that people might have time and opportunity to view him well, after which he was confined in the Tower [c]. A few days after was executed one of his chief confidents, who not caring to take ſanctuary with him in Bewley, choſe rather to wander about the country in a hermit's dreſs [d]. This execution being over, Perkin was privately examined, and his confeſſion publiſhed, giving an exact account of all his actions, and the places where he had lived ever ſince he was born. But all were ſurpriſed to find no particulars of the conſpiracy or the authors. The ducheſs of Burgundy herſelf was not ſo much as named. Some took occaſion from thence to confirm themſelves in the belief, that the perſon called Perkin Warbeck was the true duke of York. They were perſuaded, that this affected ſilence was not without myſtery, and that the king durſt not inſert in Perkin's pretended confeſſion, any of the circumſtances relating to foreign princes, for fear of being publicly contradicted by perſons who would not have for him the ſame regard as his own ſubjects. As for what was publiſhed concerning Perkin's life and kindred, nothing, as they ſaid, was eaſier than to invent ſuch ſtories. Some however believed the king was thus ſilent, out of complaiſance to the king of France, the emperor, archduke, ducheſs of Burgundy, and king of Scotland; and that there were even Engliſh lords engaged in the plot, againſt whom he did not think fit to proceed.

The year 1498, ended with an accident which gave the king no ſmall concern. Whilſt he was at his palace of Shene, a fire broke out the 21ſt of September with ſuch violence that in a few hours the building was entirely conſumed, with all the rich furniture. As Henry was very fond of that palace, he cauſed it ſoon after to be rebuilt from the ground, calling it Richmond, which name it retains to this day [e].

The ſame year Iſabella queen of Portugal was ſolemnly acknowledged preſumptive heir of Caſtile and Arragon, by the ſtates of thoſe two kingdoms. But ſhortly after, ſhe died in childbed at Saragoſſa, having been delivered of a prince, who was named Michael, and proclaimed preſumptive ſucceſſor of Ferdinand and Iſabella.

Since Lewis XII. aſcended the throne of France, he had been employed in contriving how to recover the duchy of Milan, which claimed in right of Valentina of Milan his grandmother.

The truce between England and Scotland being concluded, as I ſaid to the ſatisfaction of both kingdoms, the Scots converſed familiarly with their neighbours the Engliſh, particularly with the inhabitants of Norham. This town, which was fortified with a good caſtle and a ſtrong garriſon, is ſituated on the little river Tweed, which parts the two kingdoms. It happened one day, ſome Scotchmen walking out of the town, ſtood looking attentively upon the caſtle, which breeding ſuſpicion in the ſoldiers of the garriſon, they ſent to them to retire. The Scots taking it ill to be ſuſpected, returned an angry anſwer, and in ſhort, falling from words to blows, ſome of them were killed. The affair being brought before the wardens of the Marches, was neglected, ſo that after many delays, the king of Scotland ſent a herald into England to demand a ſpeedy ſatisfaction. Henry, who had no mind to quarrel with James, replied, that what had been done was a meer chance, and without his privity; but however, he was ready to make all convenient ſatisfaction, and to that end, would ſend embaſſadors to the king of Scotland. Buchanan, and the lord Bacon, Henry the ſeventh's hiſtorian, affirm, the firſt overture of the marriage between king James and the princeſs Margaret was made during this negotiation, and that James himſelf propoſed it to Richard Fox, biſhop of Durham. Whereas it appears in the Collection of the Public acts, that, above four years before, Henry had projected the marriage, and probably cauſed it, as I ſaid, to be ſuggeſted to the king of Scotland, by ſome indirect means. As the biſhop of Durham could not be ignorant of the king's intentions, ſince he had been twice commiſſioned to treat of this marriage, he failed not to inſpire king James with hopes, that the affair would be ended to his ſatisfaction. Shortly after, the embaſſadors of the two kingdoms [f] meeting at Sterling to decide the Norham affair, renewed the former truce, adding certain articles to prevent the like accidents. After that, Henry appointed the biſhop of Durham to ſettle with the king of Scotland the articles of the intended marriage. This affair was not however finiſhed till January 1502.

Perkin Warbeck, accuſtomed to live like a prince, was heartily tired of the Tower, where doubtleſs he was not treated as ſuch. Though according to appearance, the king had ordered him to be ſtrictly guarded, he found means to eſcape, and take the road into Kent, where he hoped to meet ſome ſhip to carry him out of the kingdom. But hearing that orders were every where ſent to apprehend him, he thought proper to fly to the monaſtery of Bethlehem [g], which enjoyed the privilege of ſanctuary [h]. It was difficult for the prior to protect ſuch a perſon, and yet he could not reſolve either to let him go elſewhere, or violate the privilege of the houſe, in delivering him to the king. In this perplexity, he choſe to wait upon the king, and acquainting him that Perkin was in his hands, petitioned for his life, leaving him otherwiſe to the king's diſcretion. The king readily ſaw, it would not be poſſible to draw Perkin out of the monaſtry to put him to death, without making great noiſe. So, on pretence of his great reſpect for the prior, who was a perſon very much reverenced, he granted the priſoner his life, but ordered him to be ſet in the ſtocks a whole day, in the palace court of Weſtminſter, and the next day at the Croſs in Cheapſide [i], from whence he was conveyed in the Tower [k]. Such a priſoner naturally ſhould have been thrown into ſome dungeon, and yet his confinement was not the moſt rigorous, ſince he had the liberty to converſe with the reſt of the priſoners.

After he had remained ſome time in this ſtate, he found means to gain four ſervants of ſir John Digby, lieutenant of the Tower, with whom he plotted to kill their maſter, ſeize the keys of the Tower, and eſcape with the earl of Warwick, who had alſo been perſuaded to come into the plot out of hopes of recovering his liberty, of which he had been ſo long unjuſtly debarred. But unhappily for them, the affair was diſcovered before it could be executed. It was ſcarce doubted that the king himſelf was the contriver of the plot, and that his aim was to draw at once Perkin Warbeck and the earl of Warwick into the ſnare, in order to put them both to death. Indeed ſeveral reaſons rendered it credible. Firſt, it was very ſurpriſing that Perkin was not more cloſely confined after the attempt to make his eſcape. Secondly, it was not likely that in his circumſtances, unable to reward ſir John Digby's ſervants, they ſhould expoſe themſelves to ſuch danger for his ſake. In the third place, Perkin was too cunning to join with the earl of Warwick, who would have been a thorn in his ſide, though they had been ſo fortunate as to eſcape. Laſtly, ſuppoſing they had killed the governor without being diſcovered, and got the keys of the Tower, how could they expect that the guards would have opened the gate or ſuffered it to be opened in the night, without examining the perſons that went out, or without the governor's expreſs order. But what farther confirms this ſuſpicion of the king was, that about the ſame time a young man, one Wilford, a ſhoemaker's ſon, pretended to be the earl of Warwick. He was accompanied or rather guided and directed by an

Henry 7.

Auguſtin Friar, called Patrick, who had the boldneſs to preach publickly in ſome town in Kent, that Wilford was the earl of Warwick, and exhort the people to take up arms in his favour. They were both apprehended, and Wilford was hanged, but the friar was pardoned [l]. This gave occaſion to believe, Wilford had been ſeduced by the friar and by the king's particular direction, that it might be thought leſs ſtrange, that he put him to death, under colour of cauſing freſh troubles.

However it is certain the king was reſolved to free himſelf at once from all his uneaſineſs occaſioned by Perkin and the earl of Warwick. Though it cannot poſitively be ſaid, that he laid a ſnare for them, at leaſt the plot furniſhed him with a plauſible reaſon to deliver him over to juſtice. Perkin was condemned [m] by commiſſioners of oyer and terminer to be hanged, and was executed with the mayor of Cork [n] and his ſon, who had been his conſtant companions in all his adventures. Of eight others that were condemned with them, among whom were ſir John Digby's four ſervants, there were but two executed. Such was the end of Perkin Warbeck, who had been acknowledged for lawful king in Ireland, France, Flanders, England, Scotland, and made Henry ſhake in his throne. Perhaps he would have ſucceeded in his deſigns, had he been to deal with a leſs politic prince. However, it is certain the king was not enough careful to undeceive the public, and that the proofs produced to ſhew Perkin was an impoſter being taken only from a private examination, ſeemed not ſufficiently evident.

In a few days after Perkin's death [o], the earl of Warwick was brought before the houſe of Peers, the earl of Oxford exerciſing by commiſſion the office of high ſteward. He was arraigned, not for attempting to eſcape, which could not be deemed high-treaſon, ſince he was not impriſoned for any ſuch crime, nor even for any other, but for conſpiring the king's death jointly with Perkin Warbeck. The poor prince confeſſing that he gave his conſent to the project laid by Perkin and Digby's ſervants, was condemned to loſe his head, and the ſentence was executed on Tower-hill [p]. He was the laſt male heir of the houſe of York, which in truth was the crime that coſt him his life, the king chuſing rather to ſacrifice his own reputation than be diſapointed of ſecuring the crown both to himſelf and his heirs. To leſſen in ſome meaſure the people's horror of rhis cruelty, the king cauſed it to be publiſhed that king Ferdinand had poſitively declared, he would never conſent to marry his daughter Catherine to prince Arthur ſo long as the earl of Warwick was alive. Strange ſort of apology, tending to inſinuate that the marriage of the princeſs of Spain was ſo neceſſary for England, that it muſt be purchaſed with blood! but if the marriage was not requiſite for the ſtate, it was at leaſt very beneficial to the king, who was to receive two hundred thouſand crowns of gold for Catherine's dowry. This alone would have induced him to ſacrifice the earl of Warwick, though he had no other advantage by his death. From a like motive he had beheaded the lord-chamberlain. Mean while, very probably what was publiſhed concerning king Ferdinand, was only a mere pretence to excuſe Henry, ſince Arthur's marriage with Catherine was ſolemnized by proxy the 19th of May this very year before the earl of Warwick's death [q].

Lewis XII. had ſolemnly ratified and ſworn the peace of Eſtaples a little after his acceſſion to the crown. But being deſirous to ſhew Henry, he really intended to keep it, he cauſed it to be approved and ratified by the ſtates general, aſſembled at Nantz in the beginning of the year. Then he ſent embaſſadors to the pope, to pray him to confirm it by his authority. The pope ſeeing no farther obſtacle from France, iſſued out a bull of excommunication againſt whoever of the two kings ſhould not obſerve the treaty.

It was not without reaſon that Lewis deſired to preſerve the peace made by his predeceſſor with England. He had formed a deſign to ſeize the duchy of Milan, and to that end made a league with the Venetians, who were to have for their ſhare all that part of the Milaneſe ſituate beyond the Adda. This ſame year the confederates attacked the duchy of Milan, and Ludovico Sforza, the moſt perfidious of men, being forſaken by all the world, was forced to fly to the emperor, having loſt all his places, except the caſtle of Milan. Genoa, of which he was poſſeſſed, followed the example of the Milaneſe, in voluntarily ſurrendering to the king of France.

Frederick, king of Naples, who had ſucceeded Ferdinand his nephew, fearing the preparations in France were deſigned againſt him, gave Henry ſpeedy notice that he deſired to be included in the peace he had lately renewed with France. But it was not with him that Lewis intended to deal this year. He reſerved the war of Naples after the conqueſt of the Milaneſe.

Alexander VI. having publiſhed a jubilee for the year 1500, the laſt of the century, had granted by his bull to all Chriſtians at a diſtance from Rome, the privilege of the jubilee, without being obliged to viſit the churches of that city, but on condition of paying ſuch a ſum for the favour. This was an infallible way to draw money from all the ſtates of Chriſtendom, where he had ſent commiſſioners to levy it. The commiſſioner appointed for England was Jaſper Pons, a Spaniard, who wiſely diſcharged his commiſſion without noiſe or ſcandal, and carried a good ſum of money to his maſter [r].

Beſides this affair, he was charged with another which ſeemed of great moment, but tended like the firſt, only to fill the pope's coffers. He had orders to acquaint the king that the pope was reſolved to publiſh a cruſade againſt the Turks: that therefore it was agreed with the embaſſadors of ſeveral potentates, that the Hungarians, Polonians, and Bohemians, ſhould make war upon the Turks in Thrace, the French and Spaniards in Greece, and himſelf, with the king of England, the Venetians, and princes of Italy, who were moſt powerful at ſea, ſhould attack Conſtantinople: that in conſequence of this reſolution, he had ſent nuncios to all the courts, to exhort the ſovereigns amicably to end their private quarrels, that all the forces of Chriſtendom might be united together for ſo pious an undertaking. Alexander VI. was too well known to be thought to act upon this occaſion from a motive of religion and zeal for the glory of God. Conſequently it was eaſy to ſee that the ſole deſign of the cruſade was to heap up money by voluntary contributions, as well from private perſons as ſovereigns. However, as Henry was unwilling to ſhew his diſlike of the project, which probably would meet with obſtacles enough elſewhere, he told the nuncio. "That no prince in all Chriſtendom ſhould be more zealous than himſelf, to promote the affair, to the glory of God and the good of the church: but as his dominions were ſo remote from Conſtantinople, as he had no galleys, and as his mariners were not ſufficiently acquainted with the Mediterranean ſea, he judged it more proper that the kings of France and Spain ſhould accompany his holineſs by ſea, whereby, not only all things would be ſooner ready, but the jealouſy wiſely avoided, which would infallibly ariſe between theſe two monarchs, in caſe they ſhould march together by and without a ſuperior: that for his part, he would freely contribute both men and money towards the undertaking. But if the kings of France and Spain ſhould refuſe to accompany the pope, he would go himſelf and command under him, provided all differences between the Chriſtian princes were firſt appeaſed, (which he ſhould not obſtruct, ſince he was in peace with all the world) and ſome good towns on the coaſt of Italy put into his hands, to ſerve for retreat in caſe of neceſſity."

The pope eaſily perceived the meaning of this anſwer, and as probably the reſt of the princes would return the like, the cruſade vaniſhed into air. Mean while, Henry, to diſplay his zeal, appointed embaſſadors to go to Rome, to treat with the pope concerning that affair. But I do not know whether the embaſſadors ever went from London. Henry's anſwer being made public, the knights of Rhodes elected him for protector of their order, imagining there was no prince in Chriſtendom more zealous than himſelf for religion.

The plague having for ſome time raged in England [s], the king, after frequent change of places, reſolved to go and make ſome ſtay at Calais with his family, till the danger was over. Upon his arrival, the archduke Philip ſent embaſſadors to welcome him into thoſe parts, and expreſs his deſire of paying him a viſit. But withal, prayed him to appoint for their interview ſome place that was not a walled town, not but that he had a perfect confidence in him, but becauſe he had already refuſed to confer with the king of France in a fortified place. Henry very civily accepted the compliment, and appointed the place to be at St. Peter's church without the gates of Calais. Then he ſent embaſſadors to Philip to return his compliment, and tell him with what impatience, he expected him. Some days after, being informed that the archduke, was near Calais, he rode out of the town to receive him. When Philip ſaw him, he alighted and offered to hold the king's ſtirrup: but Henry not permitting him, they embraced, and, withdrawing into the church, had a long conference. The archduke, willing to efface the impreſſion which his protection of Perkin might have made in the king's mind, ſhewed an ardent deſire to live in a good underſtanding with him, calling him his patron and father, as appears in the king's letter to the mayor of London, acquainting him with what paſſed at the interview. It is ſaid alſo, that overtures were made of croſs marriages between Henry duke of York the king's ſecond ſon, and Margaret ſiſter of Philip, and widow of the prince of Spain; and between Charles ſon of Philip and Mary the king's ſecond daughter. Charles was born the 24th of February this year, and by the death of prince Michael of Portugal about the ſame time, was become preſumptive heir of the crown of Caſtile and Arragon.

This year, the pope, at the requeſt of Lewis XII. himſelf, gave a bull, whereby that prince was declared excommunicate, if he failed in his payments contained in the treaty of Eſtaples.

The embaſſadors of England and Scotland being at length agreed upon the terms of the marriage between king James and Margaret, the pope granted a diſpenſation. But as the princeſs was only between ten and eleven years old, it was not conſummated till three years after.

Henry was then in peace with all the princes of Europe, and there was no appearance of any troubles in his kingdom. Conſequently he had no ſort of pretence to demand of his parliament new ſubſidies. This way of raiſing money, of which he was ſo greedy, failing him, other methods were to be deviſed. Perkin Warbeck's affair was a plentiful fountain, which was not yet exhauſted. The commiſſion he had eſtabliſhed whilſt at Exeter, regarded properly ſuch only as had actually taken up arms againſt him. But though that commiſſion had brought him in very large ſums, he was not yet ſatisfied. Under colour that thoſe who had any way adhered to Warbeck's party were ſtill liable to the rigour of the law, he was ready to grant them a pardon unaſked; but it was on condition, they paid the fines laid upon them. For that purpoſe he appointed new commiſſioners[t] to make inqueſt of thoſe that aſſiſted Michael the farrier, author of the firſt Corniſh rebellion, and Perkin Warbeck the impoſtor, with power to pardon them upon their paying fines at the commiſſioners' diſcretion. He ordered likewiſe the eſtates of ſuch as were dead to be ſeized and ſold, if the heirs refuſed to make a reaſonable compoſition. It is eaſy to ſee from hence, that if the king had been favourable to the rebels during the troubles, it was only out of fear of driving them to deſpair, whilſt they were yet heated, ſince he ſpared them not as ſoon as he believed them to be no longer dangerous.

Cardinal Morton archbiſhop of Canterbury was accuſed of being the author of theſe oppreſſions. But it was afterwards perceived, they ſprung from the king himſelf. The archbiſhop died the latter end of this, or the beginning of the next year[u], little regretted by the Engliſh, who were greatly prejudiced againſt him. Henry Dean biſhop of Saliſbury ſucceeded him, but had not poſſeſſion till the Auguſt following[w]. Before we cloſe this year, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention what paſſed in Italy.

After Lewis XII. was become maſter of the duchy of Milan, he turned his thoughts to the conqueſt of Naples. Though probably he might alone have conquered that kingdom, he made however an alliance with the king of Arragon, whereby they agreed to join their forces, and ſhare the conqueſt between them. Ferdinand was to have Apulia and Calabria, and Lewis the city of Naples, Abruzzo and Terra di Lavaro. The treaty being ſigned, Ferdinand ſent an army into Italy under the command of the famous Gonzalvo, commonly called the Great Captain. Lewis gave the conduct of his army to d'Aubigni, to the earl of Galazzo, and Cæſar Borgia the pope's baſtard, who having quitted the cardinalate was become duke of Valentinois. The French fleet was commanded by Philip of Cleves lord of Ravenſtein. In a very ſhort ſpace, each of the two kings became maſter of the portion aſſigned him by the treaty, and the unfortunate Frederick king of Naples was forced to caſt himſelf upon the mercy of Lewis XII. who ſent him to live in France with a penſion of thirty thouſand crowns.

[1501] Henry having no war with any of his neighbours, lived in great tranquillity, and the more, as he ſaw in England no lord in condition to create him uneaſineſs. The ability he had ſhewn in ſeveral affairs, as well foreign as domeſtic, which had unexpectedly come upon him, kept his neighbours in awe, and his ſubjects in obedience. So, which way ſoever he turned his eyes, he ſaw nothing capable of diſturbing his quiet. Mean while, when he leaſt expected it, he thought a new ſtorm was gathering againſt him, but he was more afraid than hurt. The earl of Suffolk[x], nephew of Edward IV. and Richard III. and brother of the earl of Lincoln, ſlain at Stokefield, quarreling with a man, had the misfortune to kill him. This accident might have given the king a pretence to free himſelf from the earl, who could not but be odious to him, ſince he was by his mother of the houſe of York. However, whether the action itſelf was not ill, or for ſome other reaſon, the king was pleaſed to forgive him on condition he openly pleaded his pardon. The earl, more offended at this ignominy, than grateful for the favour granted him, retired ſhortly after into Flanders to his aunt, the ducheſs of Burgundy. Henry was ſtartled at his retreat, imagining he was gone into the Low-Countries to contrive ſome plot againſt him. His conſtant uneaſineſs, with reſpect to his crown, made him apprehenſive, that the leaſt beginnings would be attended with ſad conſequences. And therefore, not to give the earl of Suffolk time to concert new projects with the ducheſs of Burgundy, he ſo wrought with him by meſſages, that he returned into England, where he was very readily pardoned. The ducheſs of Burgundy was grown old, and tired with ſo many fruitleſs attempts to dethrone Henry. Beſides, ſhe could expect no farther aſſiſtance from the archduke, who was willing to live in a good underſtanding with him.

This year abounded in marriages, and projects of marriages of conſequence. The archduke going into Spain by land, had an opportunity to confer with Lewis XII. and conclude with him a marriage between his ſon Charles, and Claude eldeſt daughter of that monarch.

On the other hand, Margaret, of Auſtria, the archduke's ſiſter, and widow of the prince of Spain, eſpouſed Philibert, duke of Savoy.

In fine, Catherine, of Arragon, daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, coming into England in October[y], her marriage with Arthur prince of Wales, was ſolemnized the 14th of November. Though the prince was but in the ſixteenth year of his age[z], it was not queſtioned whether the marriage was conſummated. The prince himſelf next morning ſaid ſeveral things which left no room to doubt it. And yet, there were afterwards very warm diſputes upon it, Catherine or her council affirming, there was no conſummation. But it is not yet time to ſpeak of that matter.

Thomas Wolſey, afterwards archbiſhop of York and cardinal, who made ſo great a figure in England, was now rector of the pariſh church of Lymington, in the dioceſe of Bath and Wells. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, that in November this year, the pope, in conſideration of his diſtinguiſhed merit, granted him a diſpenſation to hold two benefices that were inconſiſtent.

[1502] Though the diſpenſation for the king of Scotland's marriage was come, Henry made no haſte to finiſh that affair, by reaſon of his daughter's tender age. At length, the princeſs being entered upon her thirteenth year, the 29th of November 1501, James ſent embaſſadors to London, where every thing concerning the marriage was ſettled, and the contract drawn in form the 24th of January 1502. Henry gave with his daughter thirty thouſand angel nobles of gold[a], (each noble worth twenty groſſes, or groats) payable in three years. James ſettled upon the princeſs his ſpouſe, a jointure of two thouſand pounds ſterling a year in land, of which however he was to receive the income during his life, and allow her only a thouſand pounds a year at her own diſpoſal. It was farther agreed, that ſhe might have twenty-four Engliſh ſervants, and when one died, ſhe might appoint another in his room: that the marriage ſhould be performed "per verba de Præſenti," about the feaſt of purification; but the king of Scotland ſhould not think of having Margaret in his hands till September the firſt, 1503: that then Henry ſhould cauſe her to be conducted, at his expence, to the borders of the two kingdoms. Before the contract was ſigned, a privy counſellor repreſented to the king, that it was not impoſſible but the marriage might one day give England a Scotch ſovereign[b]. Whereupon the king replied, ſuppoſing that ſhould be, the ſtrongeſt would carry it from the weakeſt, and Scotland be annexed to England, and not England to Scotland, which fell out accordingly.

The ſame day were ſigned alſo two other treaties, one of perpetual peace and amity between Scotland and England, and the other concerning the outrages that might be committed on both ſides contrary to the peace.

Whilſt the court was rejoicing for the marriage of the queen of Scotland, prince Arthur her brother was ſeized with a diſtemper which laid him in his grave. He died the 2d of April, about five months after his marriage, and in the ſeventeenth year of his age[c]. As the princeſs, his widow, might be with child, the king delayed two or three months to create Henry his ſecond ſon prince of Wales. The lord Bacon ſays in his hiſtory, that Henry was not made prince of Wales till February, 1503[d]. But we find in the Collection of the Public Acts, letters patent of the 22d of June, 1502, wherein he is ſtiled prince of Wales; a clear evidence that he was now inveſted with that principality.

Shortly after, Henry received an embaſſy from the emperor Maximilian, to propoſe a league againſt the Turks. This embaſſy was properly only a pretence to demand of the king an aid of money, which the emperor promiſed punctually to repay. But the king knowing Maximilian to be always in want, choſe rather to make him a preſent of ten thouſand pounds, than to lend him the ſum he deſired. As for the league propoſed by the emperor, Henry did not think fit to engage in it, contenting himſelf with ſtipulating, that the ten thouſand pounds ſhould be employed in the war againſt the Infidels. He concluded with him however a treaty of commerce, and another of friendſhip and alliance, which was to laſt one year after the death of the ſurvivor. Moreover it was agreed, that Maximilian, and his ſon the archduke, ſhould be admitted in the order of the garter, and Henry into that of the Golden Fleece. Purſuant to the agreement, Henry ſent embaſſadors[e] to Maximilian with the order of the garter, and to ſee him ſwear to the treaties.

About the ſame time Ladiſlaus, king of Hungary, finding himſelf preſſed by the Turks, and deſiring the aſſiſtance of the Chriſtian princes, Henry ſent embaſſadors to treat with him. But their power was limited to a promiſe, in his name, of a ſum of money to be employed againſt the Infidels.

During the reſt of the year nothing extraordinary paſſed in England. James and Henry were entirely taken up with confirming and ratifying their three late treaties, and ſwearing to obſerve them. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, the embaſſadors of the king of England[f] having delivered to king James a writing, containing the oath he was to take, and he reading it as it was, inadvertently gave Henry the title of king of France. But afterwards perceiving his error, he took publickly another oath, wherein the words, "and of France," were omitted, and made that his authentic act. He was afraid, no doubt, the king of France would be diſpleaſed with his giving Henry that title, though it was of no great importance.

We ſee likewiſe in the Collection, that on the 9th of December, Henry gave a patent to James Elliot and Thomas Aſhurſt, merchants of Briſtol, to John Gonſalez and Francis Fernandez, natives of Portugal, to go with Engliſh colours in queſt of unknown countries, upon certain terms expreſſed in the patent[g].

Elizabeth, Henry's queen, died the 11th of February, 1503, without being much lamented by the king, who never loved her[h]. On the contrary, he had given her ſenſible mortifications. His hatred to the houſe of York was extended to his own wife, eſpecially as he always deemed her a dangerous rival. The concern he gave her by confining the queen her mother in a convent, and confiſcating all her eſtate, plainly ſhewed his little regard for her[i].

At this time the king's affairs were ſo proſperous, that he ſeemed to have all he could deſire. He was in peace with all the princes of Europe, and without troubles at home, or the appearance of any thing to vex or embarraſs him. But his ſubjects were not the happier. As his avarice was inſatiable, he was continually ſeeking new ways to heap up riches, which he wanted not, ſince it was not to uſe them, and ſince never a prince was a greater œconomiſt than himſelf. His inſtruments for that purpoſe were two infamous miniſters, ſir Richard Empſon and Edmund Dudley, who, regardleſs of their own and the king's reputation, ſought only to gratify his humour, and deviſe new means to fill his coffers. Dudley was of a good family, well ſkilled in the laws of the land, and able to give a favourable turn to the moſt odious actions. Empſon was ſprung from the dregs of the people[k], impudent to the laſt degree, and ſo little aſhamed of the injuſtices he committed, that he uſed to glory in them. Theſe are ſome of the means they uſed to draw money from the people, into the king's treaſury, beſides numberleſs others too long to be recounted.

In the firſt place, they cauſed ſuch as were reputed rich, to be indicted of ſundry crimes, and when the bills were found by the grand jury, committed them, without bringing them to their trial, till of themſelves they deſired to compound with the king. If they delayed too long, the miniſters found means to terrify them with emiſſaries, who made them believe their lives were in danger. By this means the parties were forced at length to come to a compoſition, which tore from them the beſt part of their eſtates, and which the miniſters termed however mitigations, as if the king had done them a favour in allaying the too great rigour of the law.

2. They came at laſt to that point, that they proceeded without obſerving any form of juſtice. They ſent forth their precepts, to attach and cite people before themſelves at their private houſes, in a court of commiſſion, and there, after a ſummary proceeding by examination, without proofs or witneſſes, paſſed ſentence, and condemned them in large fines to the king's uſe. Thus without vouchſafing to make uſe of juries, and the methods preſcribed by the law, they aſſumed themſelves to deal as well in controverſies civil, as in pleas of the crown. One would have thought, all criminal cauſes had belonged to that kind of juriſdiction, which, having been very rare in the foregoing reigns, was grown common in this.

3. They charged the ſubjects lands with Tenures in Capite, by finding falſe offices[l], refuſing upon divers pretences and delays to admit people to traverſe thoſe falſe offices according to law. Hence they formed variety of proceſſes, whereof they themſelves were the judges, and which were always decided in favour of the crown.

4. When the king's wards had accompliſhed their full age, they could never have livery of their lands without paying exceſſive fines, contrary to the expreſs tenor of Magna Charta[m].

5. When men were out-lawed in perſonal actions, the miniſters would not permit them to purchaſe their charters of pardon, unleſs they paid great and intollerable ſums; ſtanding upon the rigour of the law, which upon out-lawries gives forfeiture of goods. Nay, contrary to all law and colour, they maintained, the king ought to have the half of men's lands and rents during two whole years.

6. They would alſo threaten the jurors, and force them to find as they ſhould direct; and if they refuſed to act ſo unjuſtly, they were cited, impriſoned, and fined[n].

It

It is needleſs to repeat any more of their courſes. Thoſe I have mentioned are ſufficient to ſhew, that men of this character ſcrupled not to commit the moſt enormous injuſtices, provided it was for the king's advantage. Herein leſs blameable than the king himſelf, who ſuffered them to abuſe thus his name and authority.

We do not find in the life of this monarch, that he ever exerciſed one act of grace in point of fines or confiſcations. On the contrary, he was always inflexible, even with regard to his moſt faithful ſervants. His hiſtorian relates a very remarkable particular, which ſerves to diſcover plainly the character of this prince. Of all the lords of the kingdom, he had the moſt confidence in the earl of Oxford, who had indeed done him the greateſt ſervice, as well in war as in peace. One day the king went to viſit him at his caſtle at Henningham, and was entertained with all poſſible magnificence. When the king was ready to depart, he ſaw a great number of men dreſſed in rich liveries, and ranged on both ſides to make him a lane. The earl it ſeems had forgot, that it was forbid by ſeveral acts of parliament to give liveries to any but menial ſervants, but the king remembered it. Wherefore turning to the earl, he ſaid, "My lord, I have heard much of your magnificence and hoſpitality; but I find they exceed all report. Theſe handſome gentlemen and yeomen I ſee on both ſides of me, are ſure your menial ſervants."—The earl not perceiving the king's aim, ſmiled and anſwered, he did not keep ſo many domeſtics, but theſe people were only his retainers, come to do him ſervice on ſuch extraordinary occaſions. The king ſtartled a little, and ſaid, "By my faith, my lord, I thank you for your good cheer; but I muſt not ſuffer to have my laws broken before my face. My attorney muſt talk with you." The hiſtorian adds, this treſpaſs coſt the earl fifteen thouſand marks[o].

The ſame hiſtorian ſays, he had ſeen a book of accounts of Empſon's, with the king's hand almoſt to every leaf, by way of ſigning, and was in ſome places poſtilled in the margin with the king's hand likewiſe, where among many others was this memorandum:

"Item, Received of ſuch an one, five marks for the pardon to be procured; and if the pardon do not paſs, the money to be repaid, except the party be ſome other ways ſatisfied." And over-againſt this memorandum of the king's own hand, was written by him in the margin, "Other ways ſatisfied." He was unwilling to pardon the man, and yet could not reſolve to reſtore the five marks. Hence it is plain he did not neglect ſmall profits.

It is eaſy to gueſs, the king's and the miniſtry's conduct bred great diſcontent and murmurs among the people. The great men themſelves meeting with no better quarter than the meaneſt, groaned under the oppreſſion of Empſon and Dudley, two leaches, who ſpared neither friend nor foe. The earl of Suffolk, whom the king had lately pardoned, fancied theſe diſcontents would raiſe in the end ſome violent ſtorm againſt the king, if the people could find a perſon of diſtinction to head them. As he was of the houſe of York by his mother, he imagined, the time was come to proſecute his rights, and the people would not fail to declare for him. In this belief he perſuaded ſeveral lords and gentlemen to promiſe to ſupport him at a proper ſeaſon, and then retired into Flanders, from whence he made his friends expect a powerful aid by means of the ducheſs of Burgundy[p].

The king ſurpriſed at the earl of Suffolk's retreat, did not queſtion that he had contrived ſome plot in England before his departure, and had his accomplices. To be fully informed, he believed the beſt way was to recur to the ſame arts he had uſed with repect to Perkin Warbeck. To that end, he ſent orders to ſir Robert Curſon, governor of the caſtle of Hammes near Calais, who he knew to be fit for his purpoſe, and entirely at his devotion. Purſuant to his inſtructions, Curſon relinquiſhing his government, under colour of ſome affront deſignedly put upon him by the king, came to the earl of Suffolk with offers of his ſervice. He played his part ſo well, that the earl imparted to him all his ſecrets. By that means the king came to know, that William Courtney, earl of Devonſhire[q], married to Catherine daughter of Edward the fourth, William de la Pole, brother of the earl of Suffolk, ſir James Tyrrel, ſir John Windham, and ſeveral other meaner perſons, were concerned in the plot. They were all apprehended in one day[r]. But as probably there was not ſufficient evidence againſt the two firſt, the king was contented with detaining them in priſon. This gave occaſion to think they were not guilty, but that the king uſed that pretence to ſecure them, becauſe their relation to the houſe of York made him uneaſy. As for Tyrrel, againſt whom the blood of Edward V. and the duke of York cried for vengeance, he was beheaded, with Windham his accomplice. The reſt of inferior rank ſuffered the puniſhment of traitors.

Mean while Henry deſiring to be better informed of the earl of Suffolk's ſecrets, took care to preſerve Curſon's credit by an extraordinary method. He cauſed Innocent VIIIth's bull of excommunication to be publiſhed at Paul's-Croſs, againſt all perſons that ſhould diſturb him in the poſſeſſion of the throne, and particularly againſt the earl of Suffolk and ſir Robert Curſon. But when Curſon had drawn from the earl all his ſecrets, he returned into England, where he was graciouſly received by the king, but the people looking upon him with horror, loaded him with curſes. The earl of Suffolk being diſconcerted by Curſon's flight, roved about for ſome time in Germany, and at length returned into Flanders, where the archduke, notwithſtanding his treaties with Henry, took him into his protection.

The king knowing the earl had not in England a party capable to ſupport him, ſhewed no farther uneaſineſs. Another affair troubled him much more. He had now received a hundred thouſand crowns of gold, in part of the portion of the princeſs of Wales his daughter-in-law, Arthur's widow. As that prince died without iſſue, he muſt either ſend back the widow to Spain, and conſequently return the hundred thouſand crowns, or, if he kept her in England, give her the third part of the principality of Wales[s], which was ſettled upon her. Both were equally grievous to a prince of Henry's temper. However, he could not diſpenſe with one or other, without breaking with Ferdinand, which did not agree with his preſent circumſtances. For indeed, the deference paid him by all other princes, and particularly by the king of France, was properly owing to his ſtrict alliance with the Spaniſh monarch. In this perplexity, he thought of a very proper expedient to preſerve the friendſhip of Ferdinand, with the ſum already received, and procure him the other hundred thouſand crowns which remained to be paid. And that was to marry Catherine to his ſon Henry, now prince of Wales by the death of his elder brother. The propoſal being made to the king and queen of Spain, they agreed to it, on condition the pope's diſpenſation was firſt obtained. This was the ſubject of an agreement between the two crowns the 23d of June, without a particular mention of the two articles of the intended marriage. It muſt be obſerved, that in this agreement, it was alledged, as a neceſſary reaſon for demanding the diſpenſation, not only that Arthur and Henry were brothers, but moreover that Arthur's marriage with Catherine was duly ſolemnized and conſummated.

Alexander VI. dying in the mean time, Pius III. ſucceeded him. But as he out-lived not the 18th of October, it was to Julius II. elected the firſt of November, that the two kings applied for the diſpenſation. The new pope granted a bull for that purpoſe, where he ſaid, that in the petition lately preſented to him, Henry and Catherine declared, that Catherine was married "per verba de preſenti," to the late prince Arthur, and that the marriage was ſolemnized in form, and perhaps conſummated[t]. Upon the word "perhaps," it muſt be remarked, that on this occaſion, it cannot be a term denoting a doubt, ſince it is not the pope that ſpeaks in the petition, but Catherine, who muſt know whether the marriage was conſummated or not. It is only a term which gives more ſtrength to the diſpenſation, or obviating all the objections that might be made. This evidently appears in the ſequel of the bull, where the pope permits Henry and Catherine to remain in the ſtate of matrimony, though they ſhould be married before, publicly or privately, and had perhaps conſummated their marriage by carnal copulation. It is eaſy to ſee, the word "perhaps," is inſerted only to give the more force to the diſpenſation, by preventing all caſes that might render it invalid. It was neceſſary to make theſe obſervations, by reaſon of the important conſequence of this affair in the following reign.

[o] It is ſaid in the original fifteen hundred; but I ſuppoſe it is an error of the printer; for the lord Bacon ſays, fifteen thouſand.

[p] Hall ſays, that the earl having made a very great appearance at prince Arthur's marriage ſolemnity, had thereby run himſelf extremely in debt, which was the occaſion of his retiring now into Flanders, fol. 54.

Henry 7

The king of Scotland's marriage was conſummated in September[u] according to agreement, Henry having conducted the queen his daughter, to York, from whence ſhe purſued her journey into Scotland[w].

The archduke Philip, returned this year into Flanders, having ſtaid about a year in Spain. As he paſſed through France, he endeavoured to adjuſt a difference between king Ferdinand, his father-in-law, and Lewis XII. concerning the kingdom of Naples. He even took upon him to conclude, in Ferdinand's name, a treaty which was afterwards diſclaimed. Had he been concerned with a prince of leſs goodneſs and equity than Lewis XII. that diſclaiming might have thrown him into great trouble. But Lewis was ſo generous as not to take the advantage. The occaſion, in ſhort, of the rupture between the two monarchs was this:

They had, as I have obſerved, divided the kingdom of Naples after conquering it. It was hardly poſſible that theſe two princes ſhould long poſſeſs the portion fallen to each, without ſome occaſion of quarrel. Accordingly a diſpute aroſe concerning the province of Capitanata, which each would have to be in his diviſion. Whereupon the French and Spaniards came to blows. At firſt the French had the advantage, but afterwards loſt two battles, one near St. Severina, in Calabria, the 21ſt of April, the other on the 28th of the ſame month at Cerignoles, where the duke of Nemours, their general, was ſlain. After theſe two victories, Gonzalvo, who commanded Ferdinand's troops, became maſter of the whole kingdom of Naples. Lewis, deſirous to repair his loſſes, ſent a powerful army into Italy, which was by ſundry unexpected accidents rendered unſerviceable.

[1504] The 16th of January, the king aſſembled the parliament on pretence of the neceſſity of reviving certain ſtatutes, and making ſome new ones. But the real motive was to demand a ſubſidy for his eldeſt daughter's dowry. The cuſtom of demanding money on ſuch occaſions was too advantageous to the king to ſuffer it to be aboliſhed. The queen of Scotland's portion was but thirty thouſand nobles[x]; but this ſubſidy granted by the parliament may well be thought to be much more conſiderable, beſides a handſome preſent made him by the clergy on the ſame account. So, inſtead of emptying his coffers by the marriage of his daughter, he filled them the fuller. Nothing ſhews more the almoſt abſolute power of the king, then the choice of Dudley for ſpeaker of the houſe of commons[y]. He was the moſt generally hated perſon in the kingdom, except Empſon, his aſſociate, who was as odious as himſelf. Wherefore it muſt be that the fear of diſpleaſing the king, by rejecting the perſon he recommended, led the commons to that choice.

The ſubſidy was not the only thing the king politically turned to his advantage in this parliament. He found means to obtain acts which ſeemed to aim wholly at the good of the public, but in reality tended only to procure him money. For inſtance, all patents of leaſe or grant were diſannulled to ſuch as came not upon lawful ſummons to ſerve the king againſt the rebels[z]. As the number of delinquents in that reſpect was very great, this act was a very fertile ſource of treaſure to the king, by reaſon they were obliged to renew their leaſes and grants which could not be done but upon very hardy terms.

Another ſtatute made all ſorts of clipped or impaired coins of ſilver not to be current in payments, without ſuffering them even to paſs for the value of their weight. As there were ſcarce any other in the kingdom, every one was forced to bring in his ready money to the mint, in order to be new coined, by which the king was a very conſiderable gainer.

The ſtatute againſt giving liveries to any but menial ſervants, was alſo revived, from whence Empſon and Dudley had an opportunity to attach many perſons[a].

Thus the king continually amaſſing without being obliged to any extraordinary charge, at a time when his ordinary expences were very moderate, and huſbanded in the beſt manner poſſible, could not but be extremely rich in ready money. But then he doubly ruined his ſubjects; firſt by draining their purſes, and ſecondly by hindering the coin, of which he had great quantities in his coffers, from circulating in trade. On the other had, Empſon and Dudley continued their extortion without any reſerve, and with a rigour unexperienced by the Engliſh, under any of their former kings.

About this time Henry had thoughts of canonizing Henry VI. the laſt king of the houſe of Lancaſter. But there were two grand obſtacles. The firſt, that the miracles aſcribed to that prince ſince his death were not well atteſted, and the actions of his life, which were oſtentatiouſly diſplayed, ſhewed rather his weakneſs than ſanctity. But the ſecond difficulty, that is the neceſſary charges of this canonization, quite fruſtrated the project. As this is an act of grace and favour, the pope generally proportions the expences not to the perſon of the ſaint himſelf, but to the riches of him that ſolicits the canonization. The king even perceived, that the court of Rome's queſtioning Henry the ſixth's ſanctity, tended only to magnify the favour, and inhance the price accordingly. This was ſufficient to cauſe him to deſiſt from his intention. So avaricious a prince could hardly reſolve to empty his coffers for ſo needleſs a thing, and which at moſt, would have procured him only the praiſes of the Lancaſtrians. He was contented therefore to obtain a bull for the removal of Henry VIth's body to Weſtminſter, among his anceſtors[d]. He was obſcurely buried at firſt in Chertſey monaſtery, near London, from whence he was removed to Windſor.

The 19th of Auguſt, Henry iſſued out a proclamation, giving notice that he had appointed commiſſioners to whom his creditors, and ſuch as had any demands upon him, might apply for the ſpace of two years, to commence the 19th of Auguſt, and to continue until Michaelmas 1506. It is hard to to judge whether he did this from a principle of equity, and with intent to ſatisfy thoſe he had injured, or deſigned only to blind people's eyes by this act of juſtice. The firſt would be moſt probable, if from that time he had put a ſtop to the exactions of Empſon and Dudley. But it is difficult to believe that whilſt he ſuffered his ſubjects to be oppreſſed by theſe miniſters, he really intended to do juſtice to all the world.

Iſabella, queen of Caſtile, dying the 26th of November, Ferdinand, her ſpouſe, wrote the ſame day to Henry to give him notice thereof. He told him in his letter that the deceaſed queen had appointed him in her will adminiſtrator of the kingdom of Caſtile, for Jane, their daughter, wife of the archduke of Auſtria, and who, by the death of the queen her mother, was become queen of Caſtile.

When the archduke received the news of Iſabella's death, he was employed in making war upon the duke of Gueldres. This war preventing him from repairing into Spain ſo ſoon as he could have wiſhed, he was obliged to leave to king Ferdinand, his father-in-law, the government of Caſtile, fully bent however, to take it from him as ſoon as poſſible. On the other hand, Ferdinand improving Iſabella's will, pretended to keep the adminiſtration of that kingdom during his life, probably, becauſe the deceaſed queen had not limited the continuance.

This diſpute bred ſome uneaſineſs in Henry, whoſe caſe was the ſame with Ferdinand's in the opinion of many people. He was not ignorant that moſt of his ſubjects were perſuaded, Elizabeth his ſpouſe had been of right the true queen of England, and conſequently the crown was fallen after her deceaſe to Henry her ſon and lawful ſucceſſor. Though he affected to hold for certain, that the houſe of York had never any right to the crown, he was however very uneaſy, becauſe in general the Engliſh were of another opinion. It is true, that beſides his deſcent from the houſe of Lancaſter, he founded his right upon two other titles, namely, conqueſt, and the approbation of the parliament. But he perceived how weak theſe two foundations would prove, ſhould the houſe of York, by ſome revolution, come to gain ground.

[1505] Upon this account, he was very attentive to what paſſed in Spain, looking upon the deciſion of that conteſt as a precedent for or againſt him. On the other hand, he was afraid that Philip, who had appeared for ſome time cloſely

[y] Hollingſhead ſays, that there was a parliament in 1503, in which a ſubſidy was granted by the lords and clergy, and another on Jan. 25, 1504, of which latter Dudley was choſen ſpeaker, p. 791.

[z] The like act had been made before (in the 11th of this king's) for offices, and by this ſtatute it was extended to lands. Bacon, p. 631.

[a] The other ſtatutes made in this parliament were theſe: 1. That no pewterers and braſiers ſell or change any pewter or braſs, new or old, at any place, within the realm, but in open fairs or markets, or in their dwelling-houſes. What gave occaſion to this law, was, that many perſons went about the kingdom privately, buying pewter and braſs, which encouraged wicked people to ſteal diſhes, plates, &c. knowing they had receivers for them. 2. It was ordained, That no bodies corporate make any acts or ordinances, but what are examined and approved by the chancellor, treaſurer of England, chief juſtice of either benches, or juſtices of aſſize, upon pain of forfeiting forty pounds. 3. That perſons concerned in a riot, ſhall forfeit twenty pounds, and be impriſoned. 4. That perſon bring, or cauſe to be brought into the realm, to be ſold, any manner of ſilk, wrought by itſelf, or with any other ſtuff, upon pain of forfeiting the ſame. See Stat. 19 Hen. VII.

[b] At the ſame time the pope ſent a bull, wherein he ordered, That traitors and robbers, &c. who had taken ſanctuary, ſhould be carefully watched, ſo as not to be ſuffered to eſcape; and if they did, they ſhould be then delivered to juſtice. Rymer's Fœd. tom. xii. p. 104.

united with Lewis XII. would join in a league with that monarch and the emperor, to oblige Ferdinand to reſign him Caſtile. In that caſe he foreſaw, he ſhould be forced either to abandon Ferdinand to theſe three potent enemies, or enter into a war with them to ſupport him. Both were equally oppoſite to his intereſts. In fine he had caſt his eyes upon the queen-dowager of Naples, widow of king Ferdinand, for a wife, in order to enjoy the large dower aſſigned her in that kingdom. Perhaps he hoped by marrying that queen, to render himſelf umpire of the differences between Lewis XII. and Ferdinand, concerning the kingdom of Naples.

To be fully informed therefore of the diſpoſition of the Caſtilians, and the qualities of the queen of Naples, he ſent three perſons into Italy and Spain, not as embaſſadors, but as travellers for their pleaſure [c]. However to procure them acceſs to the queen of Naples and Ferdinand, he ſo ordered that the princeſs of Wales gave them letters both for the king her father and the young queen. Theſe gentlemen's private inſtructions, with reſpect to the queen, were very particular. The king wanted to be exactly informed of her age, complexion, ſtature, health, temper, inclination, behaviour, and eſtate. This ſhews he was not willing lightly to reſolve. But the project vaniſhed when the king heard, from his envoys, that indeed the queen's jointure was very conſiderable; but had been changed by Ferdinand, ſince he was poſſeſſed of the kingdom of Naples, into a penſion for life.

When the gentlemen arrived in Spain, the conteſt between Ferdinand and Philip his ſon-in-law was ſtill in the ſame ſtate. They therefore acquainted the king, that Ferdinand continued to govern Caſtile as adminiſtrator, and even hoped to perſuade Philip to leave him the adminiſtration freely during life, both by means of ſome of his council, whom he had gained, and by threatening him to marry again, and ſo give an heir to the kingdom of Arragon: that therefore, there was a project of marriage between Ferdinand and Germaine de Foix, which would be certainly accompliſhed, in caſe Philip moleſted the king, his father-in-law. They informed him moreover, that Ferdinand's ſecretary had diſcovered to them, as a great ſecret, that the marriage of prince Charles, of Auſtria, with Claude of France, would not take effect, becauſe Lewis XII. was reſolved to give his daughter to Francis, duke of Angoulême, his preſumptive heir. That then, on ſuppoſition that Philip would remain in the Low-Countries with his queen, Ferdinand intended to demand Mary, the king's ſecond daughter for the young prince of Auſtria. Theſe informations containing nothing certain, Henry could take no meaſures, till he ſaw the courſe of the Spaniſh affairs.

Whilſt Ferdinand and Philip were in treaty concerning their differences, Philip and Jane were proclaimed king and queen of Caſtile at Bruſſels; which ſhewed, they intended not to reſign for ever the adminiſtration of Caſtile to Ferdinand, as he had flattered himſelf. Mean while, the war of Gueldres, and queen Jane's being near her time, hindered them from executing their reſolution of going to Caſtile. They knew, the Caſtilians were not pleaſed with Ferdinand, and did nor doubt that as ſoon as they appeared, all would declare for them. For the ſame reaſon, Ferdinand uſed all ſorts of artifices to diſſuade them from the voyage.

In the mean while, Margaret of Auſtria, Philip's ſiſter, loſt her ſpouſe, the duke of Savoy, who died the 10th of September. Some days after, the new queen of Caſtile was delivered of a princeſs, who was called Mary, and was afterwards queen of Hungary.

This year was very barren of remarkable events with regard to England. Beſides what has been related, we find only a treaty of alliance between Henry and George duke of Saxony, hereditary governor of Friſe, to whom Henry had ſent embaſſadors [d] ever ſince February. The treaty was concluded the 30th of December.

The war of Gueldres being ended, and queen Jane able to travel, Philip reſolved to carry her into Caſtile, knowing it to be the only way to ſecure the government of that kingdom.

[1506] Though they intended to go by ſea, they choſe the winter, it ſeems to ſurpriſe Ferdinand, who probably would not expect them in that ſeaſon. They departed the 10th of January under a ſtrong convoy, prepared for that purpoſe. But before they got out of the channel, a terrible ſtorm [e] diſperſed their fleet, and the ſhip in which they were, with much difficulty ran into Weymouth [f] in England, having been in great danger. The king and queen were ſo fatigued and ſick, that contrary to the opinion of their council, they would land to refreſh their ſpirits. 1506

Mean while the people of the country ſeeing a numerous fleet was very much alarmed. They immediately ran to their arms, and ſir Thomas Trenchard at the head of ſome troops marched to Weymouth [g], to concert meaſurs with the inhabitants in caſe of an invaſion. When he heard, the king and queen of Caſtile were landed, he waited upon them, humbly inviting them to his houſe, till the king was informed of their arrival. Philip would have gladly re-imbarked, but perceived he ſhould not be ſuffered till the king's orders were received, to whom an expreſs was diſpatched. So, without much intreaty, he conſented to ſtay till that time.

As ſoon as Henry had notice of the king and queen of Caſtile's arrival, he ſent the earl of Arundel [h] with his compliments, and to tell them, he would make all poſſible haſte to come and embrace them. The earl withal aſſured them from the king, that they were as much maſter in his dominions as himſelf. Philip finding there was no avoiding the king's viſit, believed he ſhould gain time by going to him. To that end, he poſted to Windſor [i] whilſt his queen followed by eaſy journeys. Henry received them with all imaginable marks of friendſhip, but however ruminating all the while, how to reap ſome advantage from the accident which had thrown them into his dominions [k].

Some days after, he inſinuated to Philip, that as his condition was altered, it would be proper to renew their treaty of commerce, to which Philip agreed, though the reaſon alledged by Henry was of no force. For Philip, by being king of Caſtile, was not leſs ſovereign of the Low-Countries, the firſt dignity cauſing no alteration in the laſt. But Henry had his aim, and Philip plainly perceived, that being in his power, he ought carefully to avoid all occaſions of offending him, leſt he ſhould find ſome pretence to detain him in England. He was not ignorant of the ſtrict union between Henry aad Ferdinand, and was under ſome apprehenſions, that Henry would think of obſtructing his voyage, in order to oblige his father-in-law. However, the treaty was renewed, but with ſome alterations to the advantage of the Engliſh. Amongſt other things, an article of the old treaty was ſuppreſſed, which permitted Philip's ſubjects to fiſh on the coaſts of England. This made the inhabitants of the Low-Countries call it Intercurſus Malus, or the bad treaty.

This affair being finiſhed, Henry opened his mind to Philip concerning his deſign to marry Margaret his ſiſter, widow of the duke of Savoy [l]. Philip ſeemed very well pleaſed with the propoſal. And indeed, nothing could be more for his advantage than to make Henry his friend by this alliance, leſt he ſhould openly eſpouſe the king of Arragon's quarrel. So the marriage was concluded at Windſor the 20th of March [m]. By the articles ſigned by both, Philip promiſed to give the ducheſs his ſiſter, three hundred thouſand crowns of French gold [n], with a yearly penſion of three thouſand eight hundred and fifty. Mean while, Henry fearing Philip would go from his word, when he was out of his power, cauſed to be inſerted in the treaty, that the principal lords of the Low-Countries ſhould ſwear, they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to procure the accompliſhment of the marriage. The oaths of ſeveral of the lords, in purſuance of this article, are to be ſeen in the Collection of the Public Acts.

Henry had one thing more to obtain of Philip, without which he could not think of letting him go, though outwardly he continued to careſs him. And that was, to deliver to him the earl of Suffolk, who was then in Flanders. But at the firſt overture, Philip told him plainly, he could not comply with his requeſt, being bound in honour not to ſacrifice a lord whom he had taken under his protection; that beſides, it would be diſhonourable to himſelf, ſince the world would not fail to ſay, he was uſed as a priſoner. Henry, who little regarded what the world ſaid, provided he obtained his ends, replied, he would take all the diſhonour upon himſelf. This anſwer threw Philip into great perplexity. He was unwilling to betray the earl of Suffolk, after his promiſe to protect him. But on the other hand, he perceived Henry was bent upon having that lord at any rate, and had in his hands an infallible means to obtain him. Beſides, in the preſent poſture of his affairs, not being yet certain, whether he ſhould not be forced to go to war with his father-in-law, it was eaſy to foreſee, he might ſtand in need of the king of England, and conſequently it would be very wrong to diſoblige him. Wherefore, he ſuddenly came to a reſolution, and with an air of confidence ſpoke in this manner: "Sir, ſince you are pleaſed to give law to me, permit me to do the ſame by you. I will deliver the earl, but you ſhall give me your honour not to touch his life." Henry agreeing to the condition, Philip deſired the thing might be done in a manner honourable for both. "I will ſo order it, added he, that the earl ſhall come to England of his own accord, by which it will appear that I have ſolicited and obtained his pardon, and that you were very ready to grant it." Henry approving the expedient, the earl of Suffolk willingly accepted the offer made him [o]. Mean while, Henry being deſirous to have the earl in his power before Philip's departure, continued his entertainments and diverſions, on pretence of doing honour to the king and queen of Caſtile, but in reality, to gain time till the earl's arrival. He admitted Philip to the order of the gartar, and Philip made the prince of Wales, knight of the golden fleece. After that, Henry carried his gueſts to London, where they were magnificently entertained. Shortly after, the earl of Suffolk came from Flanders, and was conveyed to the Tower. Thus, Henry, under colour of doing him honour, kept Philip in England above three months, till he had obtained his deſires [p]. In all appearance, Philip ſaw plainly through all the careſſes he received, that it was not in his power to depart when he pleaſed. Elſe, it is not likely, as he intended to ſail into Spain in January, he would have willingly ſtaid in England till the end of April or the beginning of May.

When Philip and Jane were in Caſtile, the people ſhewed ſo great an affection for them, that Ferdinand could eaſily ſee, his endeavours to keep the government of the kingdom would be in vain. Accordingly, without inſiſting any more upon his adminiſtratorſhip, which could take place only in the queen his daughter's abſence, he withdrew into his own realm of Arragon. Afterwards, he made a voyage to Naples, where Gonzalvo, his general, began to make him uneaſy, and Philip and Jane remained, though not long, in poſſeſſion of Caſtile. Within a few months, Philip was ſeized with a diſtemper, of which he died the 25th of September. He left the guardianſhip of his ſon Charles to Lewis XII. who appointed the lord de Chievres for his governor. This choice, which was generally approved, and was a clear evidence of Lewis's ſincerity and diſintereſtedneſs, proved fatal to France, as the governor made his pupil more able than was neceſſary for the good of the kingdom.

The death of Philip ſo affected his queen, that ſhe loſt her reaſon, and became uncapable of governing the ſtate. Whereupon Ferdinand, her father, reſumed the adminiſtration of affairs, of which he had been deprived but five months. He is ſaid to take no great care of the queen's cure, leſt, recovering her ſenſes, ſhe ſhould ſend him back again to Arragon.

The diſintereſtedneſs ſhewn by Lewis XII. with reſpect to the young archduke prince of Spain, did not hold long. He had promiſed to give him Claude his eldeſt daughter in marriage, but thought it more proper to marry her to Francis duke of Angoulême his preſumptive ſucceſſor. Moreover being apprehenſive of a league againſt him, between the emperor, the archduke, and Ferdinand, and that the king of England might alſo come into it, he endeavoured to embroil young Charles's affairs, by exciting the duke of Gueldres to renew the war.

[1507] The archduke being too young to govern, the Flemings prayed the emperor his grandfather to take the adminiſtration in his grandſon's name. Maximilian granted their requeſt, and till he could come himſelf, ſent them Margaret his daughter, widow of the duke of Savoy.

Upon that princeſs's arrival at Bruſſels, ſhe concluded with Henry a proviſional treaty of commerce, till ſome differences cauſed by the late treaty between the merchants of both nations could be adjuſted. The treaty was ſigned at Bruges the 5th of June.

The ſame embaſſadors that were aſſembled at Calais ſpent there the reſt of the year, in treating of the marriage of Charles archduke of Auſtria, ſovereign of the Low-Countries, and prince of Caſtile, with Mary, Henry's ſecond daughter [q]. At length, on the 21ſt of December, they ſigned a treaty that Charles ſhould marry the princeſs Mary, as ſoon as he was fourteen years old, and that her portion ſhould be two hundred and fifty thouſand crowns of gold [r]. The young prince ran the hazard of loſing the kingdom of Arragon, Valencia, Granada, and the principality of Catalonia, his grandfather Ferdinand having married Germaine de Foix. But happily for him, they had no children.

Though Henry's coffers were full, he was not weary of heaping up money. We have ſeen, that in the year 1504, the parliament gave him a ſubſidy for the marriage of the queen of Scotland his daughter. But the year was not expired before he iſſued out a proclamation to levy a benevolence by his own authority, and without any apparent neceſſity, ſo that this conduct could be aſcribed only to his inſatiable deſire of hoarding up money [s]. He was grown ſo abſolute in his kingdom, that no man durſt oppoſe his will, or even ſhew the leaſt diſcontent. Mean while, Empſon and Dudley continued their extortions and oppreſſions with all imaginable rigour. This very year 1507, they ſharply proſecuted the mayor of London [t], for neglecting to bring to juſtice a coiner of falſe money, and becauſe he would not, or could not pay an exorbitant fine, ſent him to the Tower. The ſheriffs, aldermen, and all that had borne any office in the city, were queſtioned and proſecuted with the ſame rigour, and compelled to pay to the king fines, proportioned not to their abilities, but to the king's and his miniſters' rapaciouſneſs [u].

Whilſt the king was wholly intent upon heaping up riches, he found himſelf frequently ſeized with the gout. At firſt he diſregarded it, as not believing it dangerous. But by degrees the humour falling upon his lungs, it turned to a phthſic, which made him perceive he had not long to live. He ſuffered however his two miniſters to continue their exactions without any reſpect of perſons. He was ſo charmed to ſee his coffers full of gold and ſilver, that he could not reſolve to put a ſtop to the ſhameful proceedings which daily brought him in freſh ſums. He is ſaid to have amaſſed eighteen hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. This ſum will appear prodigious, if it is conſidered that money was then much ſcarcer in Europe than at preſent. He laid up his treaſures under his own key and keeping in ſecret places at Richmond [w].

[1508] As the marriage of the princeſs Mary with the archduke was then the only conſiderable affair Henry was employed in, he ſpent this whole year in taking meaſures to ſecure its accompliſhment. The acts of this year, in the Collection, ſcarce regard any other affair. At length, on the 17th of December, the marriage was accompliſhed "per verba de præſenti," the lord de Berghes, being the young prince's proxy. As ſuch, he eſpouſed the princeſs, gave her a ring and ſaluted her publicly in the name of the prince her ſpouſe [x].

About the ſame time the archduke pawned to the king a jewel, called the rich fleur de lis[y], for the ſum of fifty thouſand crowns. The emperor, as grandfather and guardian of Charles, approved of the marriage and loan. In all likelihood, the money was borrowed for him. He had occaſion for it to make a figure in the league of Cambray, which he had concluded this year with the pope and the king of France againſt the Venetians, who were become formidable to all Italy.

As to Henry's marriage with Margaret of Auſtria, though it was concluded in 1506, it was no more thought of, after that monarch, fallen into a phthiſic, perceived he was fitter to think of death than a wife.

The king finding he daily grew worſe, was pleaſed to prepare for death by granting a general pardon. He diſcharged likewiſe with his own money, all priſoners about London, that lay for fees or debts under forty ſhillings. Then he made his will, ordering that his heir ſhould make reſtitution of whatever his officers and miniſters had unjuſtly taken from his ſubjects. But this remorſe came too late. As he could not reſolve to make this reſtitution in his life-time, the prince his ſon thought proper not to part with the money amaſſed by the king his father. He died at Richmond the 22d of April 1509, having lived two and fifty years, and reigned three and twenty and eight months. His death is ſaid to happen very ſeaſonably, for had he lived much longer, the prince his ſon, now in his ſeventeenth year, might not have had patience to wait till his father's death put him in poſſeſſion of the throne. In that caſe, he might have ſupported himſelf with the queen his mother's title, heireſs of the houſe of York, and pretended that the king his father reigned only in right of his queen. This pretenſion would have been capable of reviving the old quarrel, and rekindling a civil war in the kingdom. But the king's death removed the fears of the Engliſh.

Henry VII. had three ſons[z] and four daughters. Arthur his eldeſt, as was obſerved, died in his ſeventeenth year. Henry his ſecond ſucceeded him, and Edmund his third died at the age of five years. Of his four daughters, two died in their childhood[a], and the other two, Margaret and Mary, are ſufficiently known by what has been ſaid.

If the hiſtory of this reign be read with ever ſo little attention, it will eaſily be perceived, that Henry's views were but two. The firſt was to keep the crown, acquired by extraordinary good fortune, and perhaps unthought of before he was invited into England by the duke of Buckingham. The other was, to accumulate riches. As he never ſuffered himſelf to be diverted by other thoughts, his whole application centered upon one ſingle object, namely, upon thoroughly examining every thing that could have any relation to the two ends he had propoſed. Ambition, honour, glory, love, pleaſures, and all the other paſſions which generally diſquiet the hearts of princes, made but little impreſſion upon his. Content with enjoying his crown, he thought neither of new acquiſitions, nor of rendering his name illuſtrious by great actions. All his thoughts were confined to prevent or defeat the deſigns of his domeſtic enemies, or to fill his coffers. He had a wonderful ſagacity to diſcover in the affairs that occurred, the ſide from whence ſome advantage could be drawn. This is what he plainly ſhewed in the affair of Bretagne, in his pretended wars with France and Scotland, and even in his domeſtic troubles, which by his addreſs turned all to his profit[b].

Though he was ſometimes forced to take up arms, never prince loved peace more than he[c]. As he had no ambition, he ſaw no advantage for him in war. On the contrary, he conſidered that all the events of a war, whether foreign or domeſtic, were againſt him. The former could at moſt but procure him ſome glory and acquiſitions abroad, of which he was not very fond, and by the latter he might be a great loſer. Beſides, a time of commotions afforded no opportunities to accumulate riches. So, laying down this fixed principle of his policy, not to engage in any war without an abſolute neceſſity, he never ſwerved from it. It is this that made him unconcernedly behold the loſs of Bretagne, and without reſentment ſuffer the inſults of the king of Scotland, becauſe it was not from war that he intended to reap any advantage, but only from the preparations to ſupport it. However, this policy would have been unſeaſonable when he was attacked by domeſtic enemies, whoſe aim was to rob him of his crown. As his all was then at a ſtake, he chearfully faced the danger, though with all the precautions poſſible not to run any hazard. He won two battles upon the rebels, one at Stoke, the other at Blackheath. But in both he was very ſuperior in number of troops, and fought againſt perſons ill-armed and unſkilled in the art of war. So, it cannot be ſaid what he would have done, had he been oppoſed with equal forces. It is no leſs difficult to know, whether it was owing to his courage that he headed his armies in perſon, or to his diſtruſt of thoſe that ſerved him. However this be, he was always fortunate in his domeſtic wars, and thereby gained ſo great a reputation, that all the princes of Europe earneſtly courted his alliance. On the other hand, the eſteem foreigners expreſſed for him, did not a little contribute to render him formidable to his ſubjects. I ſay, formidable, for it is certain he was never beloved. In a word, his method of governing, which approached to arbitrary power, eſpecially towards the end of his reign, his inſatiable avarice, his haughtineſs, his pride, and his dark and reſerved temper, were no proper qualities to win the affection of his people.

He never opened his mind to any man, except perhaps to one or two of his miniſters. As for the reſt, he ſet them to work without their knowing themſelves the motives of their own proceedings. The world was ſo perſuaded, he had always ſome hidden deſign even in his moſt indifferent actions, that what was only a pure effect of chance, was often aſcribed to his policy.

His ſpies in foreign courts gave him an extenſive knowledge of all that paſſed there. On the other hand, his embaſſadors were always charged to inform themſelves by all ſorts of ways of the ſecrets of the princes to whom they were ſent. Very often this was the principal article of their inſtructions. By that means he made ſuch diſcoveries as enabled him to convince the foreign miniſters reſiding at his court of his great inſight into their maſter's affairs. Hence he reaped many conſiderable advantages, chiefly in that the princes of Europe fearing his abilities, were very forward to live in a good underſtanding with him. His ſtrict friendſhip with Ferdinand king of Arragon, a prince of much the ſame character, was extremely uſeful to him. Probably it hindered the court of France from interpoſing more in the affairs of England, and was one of the principal cauſes of his conſtant peace with his neighbours.

Inſtead of increaſing the credit of the nobility, he took all poſſible care to leſſen it. His council was almoſt wholly compoſed of churchmen and lawyers, who being devoted to him, and aiming only to pleaſe him, never oppoſed his will. This unlimited compliance of his council, was the cauſe of his entirely addicting himſelf to his natural paſſion of heaping up money, there being no perſon about him that had boldneſs or conſcience enough to give him good advice upon that head. This conduct drew upon him the hatred of the Engliſh, which at firſt made him a little uneaſy, but when he had ſurmounted all his troubles, he regarded it not. On the contrary, he affected to rule with an abſolute power, making of his council a court of juſtice, where all the pleas of the crown were decided, which had never been ſeen before.

He has been extremely praiſed for the good laws made in his reign, as if he had been the ſole legiſlator, and his parliament no ways concerned. Hence perhaps was given him the glorious name of the Solomon of England, though he much more reſembled that prince in the heavy yoke he laid on his people. But if theſe laws are carefully examined, it will doubtleſs be found that the king's intereſt was the true motive, though in appearance they ſeemed for the good of the people. Thus did William the Conqueror formerly act, whom our Henry reſembled in ſo many things, that they may be very juſtly compared. In ſhort, Henry's moſt diſtinguiſhing character was, that he lived entirely for himſelf, conſidered things only with reſpect to his own private intereſt, and regarded not any affairs where that was not concerned. But he had this in particular, and whereas the intereſt of other princes is uſually divided into ſeveral branches, Henry's was in a manner contained in one ſingle branch, namely, to have always full coffers.

He was extremely ſuſpicious, as are generally thoſe who act by ſecret ways, becauſe they think all the world like themſelves. The houſe of York's title, and the people's opinion concerning it, filled his mind with fears and ſuſpicions, with which he was continually racked. It is true, he took great care to conceal his uneaſineſs: but his conduct and precautions plainly demonſtrated, his mind was not as he would have it thought to be, at reſt. This perpetual diſtruſt led him inſtantly to ſeek means to prevent the dangers, in which he was not always ſucceſsful. Witneſs the report he cauſed to be ſpread that the duke of York was alive, which had a quite contrary effect to what he expected. His genius was but narrow: he ſaw better near then at a diſtance, and his wiſdom conſiſted more in extricating himſelf out of difficulties, than in finding means to avoid them. The chief troubles of his reign, may be ſaid to have happened by his fault. However, he acquired, by a long experience, qualities which by nature he had not.

It is not ſurpriſing that a prince always intent upon preventing the rebellion of his ſubjects, and continually employed in heaping up money, ſhould have performed nothing glorious for himſelf or the kingdom. Conquerors do not always make the greateſt kings. On the contrary, peace would have been very advantageous to the Engliſh had it rendered them happy. But it was ſtill more fatal to them than war itſelf, ſince the king's inſatiable avarice inceſſantly carried him to deviſe means to acculate riches, which could not be done but at their expence. There are princes that heap up money ſolely to diſperſe it; but Henry kept it carefully in his coffers, without any communication. Liberality was a virtue he did not pretend to. If he made any preſent, it was only to ſpies or informers.

As for his religion and morals, nothing certain can be affirmed, by reaſon of the contrarieties which met in him. he was chaſte, temperate, an enemy to open and ſcandalous vices, conſtant in the exerciſes of devotion, and obſerving ſtrict juſtice where his intereſt was not concerned. But on the other hand, his extreme avarice made him commit many injuſtices, and the fear of loſing his crown, cauſed him to conſider as lawful all means which could free him from that danger, how unjuſt ſoever they might be in other reſpects. The earl of Warwick's death will be an everlaſting ſtain to his memory. His making a jeſt of religion, in cauſing a ſolemn proceſſion to be made on purpoſe to ſhew that prince to the people, and the excommunications he ordered to be pronounced againſt his own ſpies, are clear evidences that his religion was not proof againſt his intereſt.

In general, it cannot be denied, this prince had great abilities. But as theſe abilities centered only in himſelf, they would have been more valuable in a private perſon than a great monarch. Though all his projects were crowned with ſucceſs, his reign cannot be ſaid to be happy, either for himſelf or for England. He lived under continual fears and ſuſpicions, and his ſubjects were always expoſed either to domeſtic troubles or oppreſſion. One thing rendered this reign remarkable, namely, that by Henry's abilities, the civil wars, which had ſo long afflicted England, were at length happily ended. I ſay happily, ſince it was very indifferent, with reſpect to the welfare of the Engliſh, whether the kingdom was governed by a prince of the houſe of Lancaſter, or a prince of the houſe of York.

Henry VII. was of a ſerious temper, ever thoughtful and intent upon his affairs, without being diverted by his pleaſures, to which he was a little addicted. He had a book wherein he marked down with his own hand, the qualities and characters of the perſons he knew in order to employ them upon occaſion. A monkey [d] that he kept in his chamber, having one day tore his note-book all to pieces, he appeared grieved as at ſome very great loſs.

He was of ſtature taller than the common ſort. His face was long, thin, and lean, like the reſt of his body, but withal very grave, which made people ſpeak to him with fear.—He could however be affable when his affairs required it. He was rather ſtudious than learned. What he read in his leiſure hours was generaly in French, though he underſtood Latin too.

He founded a chapel at Windſor, for which he obtained of the pope privileges and indulgencies. He turned into an hoſpital the palace of the Savoy, built by Peter earl of Savoy, in the reign of Henry III. He founded likewiſe ſeveral convents of Dominicans and Franciſcans [e]. But of all theſe ſtructures, that which did and ſtill does him the greateſt honour, is his chapel in Weſtminſter-Abbey, which gives not place in any reſpect to the moſt ſtately chapels in Chriſtendom [f]. There he was buried [g], and there the bodies of his ſucceſſors lie with his [h].

VI. and Richard II. beſides dukes eleven, earls twenty-eight, lords forty-eight, he gave them the name of Merchant-Taylors. Hollingſhead, p. 790. In his thirteenth year, was the paſſage to the Eaſt-Indies round the Cape of Good-Hope diſcovered, by Vaſco de Gama, a Portugueſe. In his tenth year, the body of Alice Hackney is ſaid to be found in the church of St. Mary-Hill, London, whole of ſkin, and the joints of the arms pliable, after having been buried a hundred and ſeventy-five years. In this reign John Collet, dean of St. Paul's, founded Paul's ſchool in the church-yard. It appears by an indenture of the 9th of Henry VII. that a pound weight of gold, of the old ſtandard, was coined into as many, and the ſame pieces, as in the 5th of Edward IV. THE

THE STATE OF THE CHURCH, OF THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

THE Chriſtian church had never been in ſo deplorable a ſtate as in the XVth century. God's juſtice and mercy, and Chriſt's meritorious death, were ſcarce any more the object of a Chriſtian faith. Moſt people's religion conſiſted in pilgrimages, and in the worſhip of the bleſſed virgin, ſaints and reliques. As for the clergy, their whole attention was confined to ſuport that grandeur and power they had enjoyed for ſeveral centuries, and to take care that no man preſumed to diſpute their immunities. Diſcipline was never more remiſs. The clergy ſeemed to look upon their ſpiritual juriſdiction, only as a means to prevent the violation of their temporal privileges. Provided their rights were untouched, every one might do what ſeemed good in his own eyes. The authority of the church was become the capital point of religion.

The papal power had ſtrangely increaſed every century, each pope having made it his buſineſs to enlarge it as much as poſſible. They were come at length to diſpoſe of all the church-preferments in Chriſtendom, and to be the ſupreme judges in all cauſes eccleſiaſtical. National ſynods were no longer held: and indeed, of what uſe would they have been, ſince the court of Rome claimed the cognizance of all church-matters? In a word, the pope was become the center of religion, to which every thing was to tend. The privileges of churches, the prerogatives of ſovereigns, were all annulled by the Non-obſtante clauſe, uſually inſerted in every bull. But it was not only over ſpirituals that the popes had ſtretched their authority; they pretended alſo to extend it over temporals, under colour that religion was concerned in all affairs. Kings themſelves were not out of their reach. In all the marriages of princes, there was occaſion for the pope's diſpenſation: neither peace nor truce of any moment, was concluded without the pope's mediation or guaranty. Some popes were ſeen to carry their pretenſions ſo far, as to enjoin peace or truces without the conſent of the parties. In ſhort, it is extremely probable, they would have wholly engroſſed the temporal power as well as the ſpiritual, if the chiſms of the XVth century had not cauſed them to loſe ground. The revolutions of the following century, made them loſe ſtill more. However, the pope's were become real ſovereigns, not only with reſpect to the power they had aſſumed, but alſo with regard to the immenſe riches, which through numberleſs channels flowed into the vaſt ocean of the apoſtolic chamber. Tenths, firſt-fruits, taxes for the ſervice of the chamber, diſpenſation for all ſorts of caſes, as well contrary to the law of God as to the canons of the church, ſubſidies extracted from time to time from the clergy, for the occaſions of the holy ſee, cruſades, benefices which were ſeldom beſtowed without a previous bargain with the apoſtolic chamber; in a word, ſimony openly practiſed by many popes, ſome of whom were accuſed and convicted, were inexhauſtibly fountains which maintained the affluence and luxury of the court of Rome. It was almoſt impoſſible, that purity of life and true religious principles ſhould be preſerved undefiled, amidſt ſo much grandeur and riches. On the contrary, the popes were the more liable to make an ill uſe of their power, as moſt of them were not born for ſo high a ſtation. Accordingly we find in hiſtory, that Rome and Avignon were the center of pride, avarice, luxury, ſenſuality, and all the moſt ſcandalous vices. The popes were neither learned nor religious. Hardly was there one to be found that might paſs for an honeſt man, even according to the maxims of the world. And yet, all the preambles of their bulls were only expreſſions of their zeal, their charity, their humanity, their juſtice; whilſt for the moſt part, what they enjoyed was an authentic proof of their pride and tyranny. This is no aggravation; for the authors who wrote before the reformation, have ſaid a hundred times more: nay, it has even been publicly preached before the councils.

It may be eaſily imagined, that ſuch popes did not take much care to fill, what they called the ſacred college, with perſons truly pious and devout. It is true, during this century, there were cardinals of great repute, and eminent for their wit, their eloquence, their political virtues, and their capacity for temporal affairs. But theſe, for the moſt part, were men governed by the maxims of the world, and who conſidered religion but as a means to eſtabliſh their fortune. The legates, ſent to the ſeveral ſtates of Chriſtendom, were ſo many incendiaries, who ſought only to ſow diſcord and diviſion among princes, or excite them to ſhed the blood of their own ſubjects. In a word, they regarded only the intereſt of their maſter and the Roman ſee, making no conſcience to violate all the rules of religion and equity to accompliſh their ends.

The reſt of the clergy in general were no better. Moſt of the biſhops were promoted to the epiſcopacy, purely for having rendered themſelves commendable by their attachment to the intereſts of the court of Rome, or for their ſervices to princes in their temporal concerns. They were perſons educated at court, and inſtructed in the maxims of the world. Cruelty, injuſtice, diſhoneſty, were but too common among them. Nay, they were conſidered as ſo many virtues, when employed in the perſecution of ſuch as were termed Heretics, eſpecially of thoſe that dared to conteſt any of the pope's or the clergy's pretended rights.

As for real learning, it was ſcarce heard of in this century. Shool-divinity, and the knowledge of the canon-law, made the whole merit of the eccleſiaſtic. It was the only thing by which they could hope to arrive at church dignities. On the other hand, the monks who were crept into moſt of the profeſſorſhips in the univerſities, had overwhelmed divinity and philoſophy with ſuch a heap of jargon, as ſerved only to give their diſciples falſe notions of learning, and teach them to wrangle.

Such was in general the ſtate of the church in the century we are ſpeaking of. As for the civil affairs of Europe, they were in this and the following centuries, as in the foregoing. The ſovereigns divided among themſelves, by their different intereſts, thought only of ſupplanting one another, and making their neighbour's loſs turn to their own gain. This drew them into bloody wars, which rendered their people miſerable, and ſuffered neither princes nor ſubjects to attend to the breaches in the church, nor think of means to heal them. Corruption was ſo great in the world, and in the church, that God ſeemed to have abandoned men to a reprobate ſenſe, ſo blind and inſenſible were they grown. We may add, for the farther repreſentation of the ſad eſtate of the church, the great progreſs of the Turks in Europe, during this unfortunate century. The Greek empire entirely deſtroyed, and ſeveral other Chriſtian ſtates over-run by the infidels, were plain tokens of the divine wrath againſt Chriſtians, to move them to ſearch after the cauſe. But inſteed of ſeeking the Lord, they perſecuted with fire and ſword ſuch as ſought God alone, and refuſed to pay divine worſhip to creatures.

To accompliſh a reformation in the church, which was ſo much wanted, all or at leaſt the chief princes of Europe ſhould have joined their endeavours to promote ſuch a project. But how was it poſſible that ſo many ſovereigns who had religion ſo little at heart, ſhould ſacrifice their paſſions to ſo great a good? or how could ſo many different intereſts be reconciled? All Europe paſſionately wiſhed that the church were reformed: ſeveral biſhops appeared to have the ſame deſire: nothing was talked of in the councils but the neceſſity of executing ſo noble a deſign: nay, it ſeemed that the councils of Conſtance and Baſil intended to ſet about it effectually. But the well inclined had neither prudence nor reſolution enough to oppoſe to the artifices and violence of the contrary party. We ſhall ſee hereafter, that it was the popes, the cardinals and the principal clergy, who oppoſed to their utmoſt the projected reformation, becauſe they were ſenſible it would prove prejudicial to their temporal intereſts. On the other hand, when it is conſidered with what eagerneſs and animoſity they laboured to root out the pretended hereſies which combated the temporal grandeur of the clergy, no other inference can be be made than that they themſelves perceived the neceſſity of a reformation which they would not admit, and that the fountain of corruption was in the principle members of the clergy, from whence it had but too great an influence upon the reſt.

To repreſent to the life the ſtate of the church of the fifteenth century, and ſet it in its true light, it would be neceſſary to give a particular account of what paſſed at the councils of Conſtance and Baſil. But this detail would lead me too far: beſides the hiſtory of the firſt of theſe councils has lately been publiſhed, and wrote with that plainneſs, circumſpection, and impartiality, that there is no room to ſuſpect that the author[i] has ſuffered himſelf to be biaſſed by paſſion or prejudice; the hiſtory of the council of Baſil, by the ſame hand, is ſoon to appear[k]: ſo, referring the reader to theſe two hiſtories, I ſhall only relate in a few words the moſt remarkable paſſages of theſe councils. This knowledge will be of uſe to underſtand the ſtate of the church of England, which I ſhall preſently ſpeak of.

The ſchiſm begun in 1378, by Urban VI. and Clement VII. was continued to the beginning of the fifteenth century by Boniface IX. and Benedict XIII. their ſucceſſors. Boniface ſucceeding Urban VI. reſided at Rome, and Benedict, ſucceſſor of Clement VII. remained at Avignon, where he was kept by the king of France, for fear he ſhould eſcape before the ſchiſm was ended.

The univerſity of Paris had propoſed a method to end the ſchiſm, namely, that the two popes ſhould reſign the pontificate, which was called the method of ceſſion. Boniface IX. and Benedict XIII. pretended both to be willing to take this method for reſtoring peace to the church: but withal they uſed ſo many evaſions, that it was eaſy to ſee they had no ſuch deſire; and therefore the king of France had thought fit to ſecure the perſon of Benedict. That monarch's illneſs afterwards placing the duke of Orleans, his brother, at the head of affairs, the young prince was a great favourer of Benedict XIII. and in 1404, gave him an opportunity to make his eſcape. The ſame year Boniface IX. died, and the cardinals of his party choſe Innocent VII. who behaved like his predeceſſor with reſpect to the ceſſion. To Innocent, who ſat in the papal chair but two years, ſucceeded Angelo Corario, who aſſumed the name of Gregory XII. Thus the ſchiſm ſtill continued between Gregory and Benedict. Theſe two popes pretending to deſire to end it by the method of ceſſion, long amuſed the world with their diſſimulation and artifices. In ſhort, the ſchiſm having now laſted thirty years, without any appearance that the two popes would perform their promiſe, Gregory XII. ſaw himſelf deſerted on a ſudden by his cardinals, who retired to Piſa: there remained but four with him. On the other ſide, France, which was the principal ſupport of Benedict XIII. being tired with his evaſions, withdrew from his obedience, and the pope having loſt that protection, went and reſided in Spain: but his cardinals refuſing to join him, choſe to join Gregory's. Preſently after, the cardinals of both parties, with one conſent, called a general council at Piſa, to which moſt of the princes of Europe ſent their embaſſadors and prelates.

This council, held in 1409, depoſed the two popes, and gave the cardinals leave to chuſe a new one, who aſſumed the the name of Alexander V. But as Gregory and Benedict did not think themſelves lawfully depoſed, it happened that inſtead of the two popes before the council, there were now three.

Alexander V. dying in 1410, John XXIII. was elected in his room, who called a general council to meet at Conſtance in November, 1414[l]. This council found no better way to end the ſchiſm, than by removing the three popes, John XXIII. and Benedict XIII. were depoſed, and Gregory XII. voluntarily reſigned the pontificate. After that, the council elected cardinal Odo Colonna who took the name of Martin V. John XXIII. who was committed to the cuſtody of the emperor Sigiſmund, having made his eſcape, ſubmitted to Martin V. who honoured him with a cardinalſhip. As for Benedict XIII. he ſtill kept the title of pope; and retiring to the caſtle of Reniſcola, belonging to the kingdom of Valencia, was ſuffered by the king of Arragon to live there in quiet. After his death, which happened not till 1424, his cardinals choſe a canon of Barcelona, who took the name of Clement VIII. But in 1429, he quitted his dignity in favour of Martin V. Thus ended the ſchiſm at length, after one and fifty years continuance.

This abſtract, though ſhort, will enable us to judge of the character of the popes who governed the church during theſe fifty years: they were men who ſacrificed the peace and tranquillity of the church to their own private intereſts, and damned without mercy, as far as lay in their power, all that were not of their party. They would without ſcruple have engaged all Chriſtendom in a bloody war for their intereſts, if the ſovereign princes, had not been wiſer than they. Surely one cannot but form a very melancholy idea of the ſtate of the church in thoſe days, when it is conſidered that the Chriſtians of both ſides acknowledged for Chriſt's vicars, popes whom they abhorred, and who indeed were ſo little worthy of the ſtation they enjoyed, that ſeveral were depoſed for hereſy, ſimony, and perjury.

But I have ſtill one important reflection to make upon the conduct of the council of Conſtance, the motive whereof is at firſt hard to be conceived. If the council of Piſa was general and lawful, as that of Conſtance could not forbear owning, why were her deciſions not obſerved? Why was Gregory XIIth's reſignation accepted, a reſignation which ſuppoſed him ſtill to be pope notwithſtanding his being depoſed? Why were terms offered him to induce him to quit the pontificate? Why was Benedict XIII. once more depoſed when he had been already depoſed by a general council? In ſhort, why was John XXIII. deprived of his dignity for not keeping his promiſe to reſign the papacy, ſince it could not be queſtioned that he was really pope and his miſſion lawful? Was not the authority of the council of Piſa ſacrificed by theſe proceedings?

Let it not be objected that John XXIII. was not depoſed for any defect in his miſſion but for his crimes. It is certain, when his promiſe to reſign the pontificate was required, it was ſolely with a view to put an end to the ſchiſm. Had he reſigned with a good grace, he would never have been accuſed, much leſs condemned for the crime for which he was afterwards depoſed. It will be ſaid perhaps, that this inconvenience was not ſo great as that of perpetuating the ſchiſm. But ſhould the ſtriking at the authority of a general council be deemed a ſlight inconvenience? Did not the council of Conſtance give occaſion to have her own authority diſputed? For there is no reaſon why the depoſing of Benedict XIII. and of John XXIII. by the council of Conſtance ſhould be more valid than the depoſing of the ſame Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII. by the council of Piſa.

However, through all this intricacy, the motive of the council of Conſtance's proceedings is diſcoverable. The ſchiſm manifeſtly tended to the diſſolution of the papal dignity, which ſerved for baſis and foundation to moſt of the clergy's privileges, and to the hierarchy itſelf. Caſtile, Arragon, Navarre, Portugal, had been neutral ſome years, without owning any of the contending popes. France had withdrawn her obedience from Benedict XIII. without transferring it to Gregory XII. In a word, the whole world in general began to contemn their excommunications, which they ſo viſibly abuſed. There was danger therefore that by degrees a pope would be thought uſeleſs, and thereby the foundation of the hierarchy would have been undermined, and perhaps a new form of government introduced into the church. The cardinals and prelates, of whom the council of Conſtance was compoſed, were ſo highly concerned to avoid this inconvenience, that their ſacrificing all to that end is not ſurprizing. This is the true reaſon of their conduct. But they took care to proceed very different with regard to the pretended heretics, who openly proteſted the privileges of the clergy. To extirpate a hereſy ſo prejudicial to them, they made uſe of fire and ſword rather than ſacrifice the leaſt of their intereſts. This is what we are going to ſee in the manner they acted on that account.

All the world knows that John Huſs and Jerome of Prague were burnt alive at Conſtance. But every one has not been at the pains to examine for what errors they ſuffered that rigorous puniſhment. They were then and ſtill are to this day charged with maintaining impious, horrible, and damnable tenets. They were condemned as ſeditious, obſtinate, and incorrigible followers and defenders of Wickliff, hardened, crafty, malicious, and convictive heretics: had there been yet ſtronger terms to expreſs their abhorrence of theſe hereſies,

The deputies mentioned in Rymer's Fœd. are this, Nicholas, biſhop of Bath and Wells, Robert of Sarum, John of St. David's, William, abbot of Weſtminſter, John, prior of Worceſter, Thomas Spofford, abbot of St. Mary's at York, Richard earl of Warwick, Henry Fitz-Hugh, lord-chamberlain, ſir Walter Hungerford, ſir Ralph Rocheford, John Honyngham, doctor of laws. they would have been uſed without ſcruple. But, wherein conſiſted theſe hereſies? In their being diſciples of Wickliff? If the authors who ſpeak of their ſentence be conſulted, ſcarce one will be found that ſays more. John Huſs and Jerome of Prague (ſay they) were followers of Wickliff, and conſequently abominable wretches deſerving to be burnt. In the opinions of Wickliff therefore we are to ſearch for their errors. Now here is an ambiguity, which has been conſtantly uſed to juſtify the condemnation of theſe two doctors; it is hardly to be doubted, that the council of Conſtance had the ſame ambiguity in view, when ſhe cauſed the errors and memory of Wickliff to be firſt ſtigmatized, before John Huſs and Jerome of Prague were brought upon their trial.

Wickliff's opinions were of two kinds: ſome concerned the principal doctrines of faith; others related to the hierarchy, the clergy, their juriſdiction, power, and riches. Wickliff did not believe tranſubſtantiation; he rejected the invocation of ſaints, the adoration of the croſs and images, pilgrimages, and reliques. On the other hand, he thought the hierarchy, had no foundation in ſcripture; from whence he drew ſeveral concluſions againſt the exceſſive authority uſurped by the popes, the cardinals, and the biſhops. Moreover he taxed the clergy with leading very immoral and diſſolute lives, and maintained that the revenues of the church were greatly miſapplied. From theſe principles his enemies inferred numberleſs conſequences, ſome whereof had never perhaps entered into his thoughts. There were at leaſt found in his writings two hundred and ſixty capital errors: his followers added many more which he had never taught, and the whole was imputed to him as if he had maintained them all in expreſs terms.

However it be, John Huſs embraced Wickliff's opinions, but it was only in what concerned the hierarchy and clergy. It is certain he believed tranſubſtantiation, and died in that belief. As for images, his opinion was that a man might honour them, kneel to them, light up wax tapers before them, kiſs them, becauſe the intention referred that worſhip to the originals. So, it is a thing out of doubt, that he was not burnt for maintaining errors in the principal doctrines of faith, but for opinions which combated the exorbitant power and riches of the church, that is to ſay, of the clergy. All poſſible endeavours were uſed to make him confeſs he believed not tranſubſtantiation, but he could never be brought to ſuch a confeſſion. And yet, by the advice of the cardinal of Florence, the council condemned him upon the depoſition of the witneſſes, who accuſed him of rejecting that doctrine, without regarding his own expreſs declaration to the contrary. It is not very difficult to conceive the council's aim in cauſing that article to be inſerted in Huſs's ſentence. The council was ſenſible it muſt have appeared very ſtrange, that a perſon ſhould be burnt, whoſe principles tended to a reformation in the head and in the members of the church, which all Chriſtendom required, and which the council itſelf feigned to believe neceſſary. It was requiſite therefore to juſtify the ſentence by rendering the man odious, as rejecting a fundamental article of faith. For this reaſon, without diſtinguiſhing Wickliff's errors, John Huſs, and Jerome, of Prague, were condemned as followers of that arch-heretic. It was thereby inſinuated, that they embraced all the opinions of their maſter.

But to ſhew by an unexceptionable teſtimony that theſe two men were burnt for their opinions concerning the clergy, I need only quote what Æneas Sylvius, alias pope Pius II. ſays in his Hiſtory of Bohemia. The deputies of the council having admoniſhed the accuſed to forſake their errors, and conform to the church's ſentiments, they anſwered, "That they were indeed lovers of the holy Goſpel, and true diſciples of Chriſt: that the church of Rome, and all the other churches of the world, were far ſwerved from the apoſtolical traditions: that the clergy ran after pleaſures and riches: that they lorded it over the people, affected the higheſt ſeats at entertainments, and bred horſes and dogs: that the revenues of the church, which belonged to the poor members of Chriſt, were conſumed in vanity and wantonneſs: that the prieſts were ignorant of the commandments of God; or if they did know them, lightly regarded them.

"The fathers of the council (continues the hiſtorian) perceiving and knowing the invincible obſtinacy of theſe people, judged that the corrupted members of the church that were incurable, ought to be cut off, leſt they ſhould infect the reſt of the body. Accordingly ſentence was paſſed upon them, all the fathers unanimouſly agreeing, that perſons who rejected found doctrine approved by the church, deſerved to be burnt."

This account moſt evidently ſhews wherein conſiſted the hereſy of John Huſs and Jerome of Prague, namely, in their accuſing the clergy of corruption. It was therefore to deſtroy theſe enemies of the clergy, that the council made no ſcruple to violate the ſafe-conduct given by the emperor Sigiſmund to John Huſs, or at leaſt to allow him to violate it himſelf. Moreover, the council had no regard to the promiſe they had publicly given to Jerome of Prague, in order to draw him to Conſtance: it is true, the council had inſerted theſe words in their engagement, "Without prejudice to juſtice, and as far as the catholic faith requires it:" a captious clauſe, if ever there was one. For was not the catholic faith the very point in queſtion; and of what uſe could the council's promiſe be to Jerome of Prague, unleſs againſt juſtice? Did he run any hazard, or ſtand in need of ſuch a promiſe, if he had not the tenets he was charged with?

Let us now proceed to the decree of the council againſt communion in both kinds. We ſhall ſee in this, as well as in the foregoing articles, that the authority of the church or the clergy, was the ſole point in queſtion. The fathers of Conſtance condemned not communion in both ſides as ſinful in itſelf; on the contrary, they owned it was practiſed in the primitive church, and that the church had power to grant it to the laity, if ſhe thought proper. But they anathematized ſuch as maintained the church had not a right to aboliſh that practice. What did they mean then by the church? Did they not mean the councils compoſed of the ſeveral members of the clergy? It is ſo true, that in this decree the council's ſole view was to ſupport the authority of the church repreſentative, that ſome years after another general council made no ſcruple to allow the Huſſites the liberty of communicating in both kinds, without any apprehenſion that the faith was therein concerned, when they were willing to receive that liberty as a favour from the church.

As to other opinions which appeared at the ſame time, but which attacked not the clergy, the council of Conſtance behaved with an aſtoniſhing coolneſs. John Petit, advocate of the duke of Burgundy, maintained it was lawful for any private perſon to kill a tyrant even by ſurpriſe. This tenet being brought before the council, how did they proceed? After much ſolicitation, they declared it erroneous, without naming the author, or attacking his perſon, though they had ordered Wickliff's bones to be dug up thirty years after his burial. The ſect of the ſcourgers [m] broached ſeveral capital errors: but the council was content with the bare propoſal of finding ſome gentle means to reſtore them to the unity of the church.

What reformation could be expected from a council which ſo rigorouſly proſecuted ſuch as conteſted the privileges of the pope, the cardinals, and the clergy? The reformation muſt have begun with the ſuppreſſion of moſt of theſe prerogatives. Indeed, before Martin Vth's election, the reforming of the court of Rome was talked of in the council, and a liſt of the abuſes to be redreſſed was drawn up: but by the artifices of ſome, and particularly of the cardinals, that deſign came to nothing. A pope was elected, and a pope elect found means to have that article deferred to a more convenient ſeaſon.

This is the ſum of the moſt remarkable tranſactions in the council of Conſtance. A very full account of theſe things will be found in the fore-mentioned new hiſtory, to which the reader is referred. Let us ſee now what the council of Baſil acted with reſpect to the Huſſites, and the quarrel of pope Eugenius IV. with the ſame council. Nothing is more proper to ſhew the ſtate of the church in thoſe days.

The Bohemians, who for the moſt part had embraced the opinions of John Huſs, highly reſented the uſage he had met with. This ſeverity ſerving only to confirm them in their tenets, they reſolved to maintain them in ſpite of the council's decrees. Communion in both kinds was the principal doctrine. This occaſioned terrible commotions in Bohemia, which Martin V. greatly inflamed by his haughty treatment of the Huſſites. In the midſt of theſe troubles, Wenceſlaus, king of Bohemia, dying, Sigiſmund, his brother, who was emperor, pretended to the ſucceſſion. But the Bohemians rejected him, becauſe they would not conſent they ſhould live in the faith they profeſſed. Martin V. ſupporting Sigiſmund, publiſhed a cruſade againſt the Huſſites, and thereby oblige them to arm in defence of their lives. It is needleſs to enquire here, whether Sigiſmund had any right to mount the throne of Bohemia without the conſent of the ſtates; this is a quere which would lead me too far. However that be, Ziſka, a Bohemian, heading the Huſſites, defeated Sigiſmund ſeveral times, and made him as well as the pope, deſpair of extirpating theſe pretended heretics by arms. The war laſted till the council of Baſil, without Sigiſmund's being able to take peaceable poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Bohemia.

The council of Baſil, which met in 1431, finding that the arms of Sigiſmund and the Croiſees had not the ſucceſs that was expected, reſolved to make peace with the Huſſites. Probably, their aim was to ſet Sigiſmund at any rate on the throne of Bohemia, in order to enable him the better to take proper meaſures to extirpate theſe people. For that purpoſe, they ſent deputies into Bohemia, to invite the Huſſites to come and produce their reaſons before the council. They agreed to it, and their deputies being arrived at Baſil, required theſe four things, for which they offered to be reconciled to the church.

Firſt, That communion in both kinds ſhould be adminiſtered to the Bohemian laity.

Secondly, That offenders ſhould be puniſhed according to the law of God, and by thoſe whoſe proper buſineſs it was.

Thirdly, That the word of God ſhould be preached by able prieſts.

Fourthly, That the clergy ſhould have no temporal juriſdiction.

Theſe were the ſentiments of the Huſſites, for which ſo bloody a war had been made upon them, even to the exciting all Europe againſt them. But it was not ſo much for their doctrines that they were thus cruelly perſecuted, but for their obſtinate refuſal to ſubmit to the deciſions of the church, and for their contempt of the clergy. The council uſed all poſſible endeavours to perſuade the Bohemian deputies to an unconditional ſubmiſſion to the church. But at laſt, perceiving they inſiſted upon the four articles, the council thought fit to grant them upon this condition, that they ſhould be firſt explained, becauſe being couched in general terms, they might give occaſion to freſh diſputes. The Huſſites conſenting, the council explained the four articles as they judged convenient. After that, an agreement was drawn conformable to the four articles and their explication.

The affair being thus ſettled, Sigiſmund demanded to be received for king of Bohemia, and was ſo accordingly, after ſigning certain conditions; namely, the approbation of the agreement, and ſome others relating thereto. It ſeemed that the perſecution againſt the Huſſites was thereby to ceaſe. But Sigiſmund was no ſooner on the throne of Bohemia, but he diſappointed them. On the other hand the pope pretending, they obſerved not the conditions on which the four articles were granted, poſitively refuſed to confirm the agreement. This occaſioned in Bohemia freſh troubles, which were always fomented by the court of Rome, and which properly ended not till the middle of the laſt century, in the utter ruin of the Huſſites.

Before we leave this ſubject, let us make one reflection. Let the Huſſites be inveighed againſt as much as you pleaſe: let them be accuſed of holding impious and deteſtable errors, yet theſe errors muſt be reduced to the four articles exhibited by themſelves to the council of Baſil. For this, cruſades were publiſhed againſt them, and John Huſs and Jerome of Prague, were burnt. Yet a general council, owned for ſuch by all the world, when the agreement was granted them, judged that theſe articles might be ſuffered without prejudice to the Catholic faith. It follows therefore, that war was made upon them ſolely for the ſupport of the church's authority. That was the main point of religion. But why were they perſecuted afterwards? It was becauſe the popes would never ſtand to the agreemeet, though the Huſſites frequently offered to ſubmit to the church upon that condition. It is therefore evident, that the war from the beginning to the end, was wholly founded upon this principle, that the church had a deſpotic power, and that it is unlawful to bind her to any conditions. But what church is this, inveſted with ſo high a prerogative? It cannot be a general council, ſince ſuch a council has not judged that article unqueſtionable. It is therefore the pope alone which can be meant by the church. It will be ſaid perhaps, that the authority of the council of Baſil is not acknowledged by a great part of the church: but this will be groundleſs. For the agreement with the Huſſites, was made before the council was removed to Ferrara, and the council of Baſil is acknowledged by all the world for lawful before that removal.

We are now going to ſee a quarrel of another nature, not of the church with her heretical enemies, but of the church with herſelf, of the members with the head. Till the council of Baſil, the popes and the councils were very well agreed to improve the church's authority and cauſed it to be abſolutely obeyed. By the help of the equivocal word Church, an entire ſubmiſſion was required of Chriſtians, ſometimes to the pope as the head, ſometimes to the councils as repreſentatives of the body, according as occaſion offered to improve that term for the benefit of either. As for the Chriſtian laity, they had been long excluded out of the meaning of the word Church. However, though in confining the ſignification of the word Church to the clergy alone, there ſtill remained ſome ambiguity, it had not yet been removed, by deciding whether the authority of the church was lodged in the body of the clergy, or in the pope as head. The councils of Piſa and Conſtance had taken ſome ſteps towards aſſuming this authority, in depoſing the popes themſelves. But Martin V. after his election, had artfully evaded the deciſion of this important point, either by breaking up the council, or by confirming whatever was done with regard to the doctrines, without meddling with any of the other articles. He knew, it would be very prejudicial for him if the queſtion was decided by the council, as it would be for the council the moment they broke up. At length, the council of Baſil had occaſion to take this queſtion into conſideration.

The council had been called by Martin V. who had now appointed cardinal Julian Cæſarini to preſide as legate. Martin dying in 1431, before the council was aſſembled, Eugenius IV. was choſen in his room. The new pope oppoſed not the opening of the council, but intended it ſhould not continue long. For ſome time the neceſſity of reformng the church, both in the head and members, had been every where talked of. Now as ſuch a reformation muſt have been made by a general council, ſuch a council could not but terrify a pope, who had not yet had time to taſte the ſweets of the pontificate. The council of Baſil was no ſooner aſſembled, but Eugenius ſought means to diſſolve it. He found a pretence in the council's invitation of the Huſſites to Baſil, during the firſt ſeſſion. He affirmed, theſe heretics having been condemned in the council of Conſtance, ought not to be allowed a re-hearing. Upon this frivolous pretence, he publiſhed a bull for diſſolving the council.

Inſtead of ſubmitting to the pope's pleaſure, the council reſolved to continue their ſeſſions. Hence ſprung a quarrel, which produced a real ſchiſm, ſome maintaining the authority of the council, and others remaining attached to the pope. The council made ſeveral decrees, which placed the authority of a general council above that of the pope, and the pope annulled theſe decrees, affirming, the body could not act but by the direction of the head. The emperor, the king of France, and moſt of the other princes, declairing for the council, Eugenius ſaw himſelf under a neceſſity to confirm the council, and conſent that the ſeſſions ſhould be continued. But having ſent other legates to preſide in his name, the council refuſed to receive them as preſidents. This was a freſh occaſion of diſſenſion. The pope threatened to diſſolve the council, and the council threatened to ſuſpend the pope. Accordingly, they made ſome advances towards it: whereupon Ugenius finding himſelf the weakeſt, was obliged once more to approve and confirm the council.

The forced compliance of the pope, appeaſed the quarrel for ſome time. But in 1435, the council having ſhewn, they would ſeriouſly endeavour a reformation of the church in the head and members, and having made for that purpoſe decrees to aboliſh the firſt-fruits [n], and ſettle the rights of the apoſtolic chamber, the pope ſaw himſelf ruined, unleſs he found ſome way to ſtop their proceedings. On the other hand, the cardinals eaſily perceived, that ſince the pope was begun with, their turn would ſoon come. There were biſhops too, who were ſorry to ſee a reformation going forward, which would be to their prejudice in many things, though they might hope to be gainers by it in ſome reſpects. This occaſioned the forming of two oppoſite parties in the council; but however, the reformers had the majority. Mean while, the pope continued to gain ground, ſince the cardinals and ſeveral biſhops thought it for their intereſt to ſupport him.

Another thing helped likewiſe to ſet the pope's affairs upon a good footing. Some time ſince, John Emanuel Palæologus, emperor of Conſtantinople, had been vigorouſly attacked by the Turks. As he wanted aſſiſtance, he imagined, if he could unite the Greek church with the Latin, the pope and princes of Europe would aſſiſt him with all their forces in defence of his empire. This affair had been already propoſed to Martin V. and it was chiefly with deſign to accompliſh the union, that [n] The annates or Firſt-fruits were deviſed by Boniface IX. on pretence of carrying on a war againſt the Infidels pope Martin had called the council of Basil, where the Greek emperor was to come in person, with the bishops of his church. Eugenius IV. failed not to improve the opportunity to strengthen his party. He sent nuntios to the emperor, to acquaint him, that the time was come to perform his promise; but as it might be inconvenient for him and his attendants to repair to Basil, he promised to remove the council to some good town in Italy, provided he would engage to be present. On the other hand, the council sent likewise embassadors to Constantinople, to dissuade the emperor from coming to any other place than Basil. But the emperor had already resolved to repair wherever the pope should appoint. The fathers of Basil plainly perceiving, the pope intended to move the council elsewhere, made haste and passed several decrees, which very much lessened the papal authority, and at length cited the pope before them.

Eugenius little regarded the proceedings against him at Basil. When he heard the Greeks were arrived at Venice, he published a bull for translating the council of Basil to Ferrara. The council refused to comply with the bull, and by a majority of votes, suspended the pope till he should come in person and make his defence. Mean while, cardinal Julian, president of the council, and the rest of the cardinals, except one, left Basil, carrying with them a good number of bishops, and repaired to Ferrara, where the pope opened his council the 10th of February, 1438. Thus arose a new sort of schism between the councils, both which stiled themselves general, and condemned each other. But the pope's had soon a considerable advantage of the other, by the arrival of the Greek emperor at Ferrara, with a great many prelates of his nation. The next year Eugenius translated the council of Florence, where a sort of union was made between the Greeks and Latins, which lasted not long[o].

Mean time, the council of Basil still continuing their proceedings against Eugenius IV. came at last to depose him, and elect another pope in his room, namely, Amadeus, duke of Savoy, who having resigned the government of his dominions, was retired to the solitudes of Ripaille. The new pope assumed the name of Felix V. Hence was formed in the church a double schism between two general councils and two popes, who thundered their Anathemas against one another, to the great scandal of Christendom. It was no small embarrassment to most people to see thus two popes, and two councils condemning one another, and each excommunicating the adherents of the other party, without sparing even those who thought to escape by standing neuter.

Charles VII. who then reigned in France, caused a synod to be held on the occasion, in which it was resolved, that France should own the council of Basil for lawful, but should remain however in the obedience of pope Eugenius: another embarrassment to the French. Indeed it is hard to conceive, how two such opposite things could be reconciled.

In 1441, was held in Germany another such assembly, where no better expedient was found, than the calling a new council somewhere else than at Basil and Florence; and that Germany should remain neuter, till the new council was assembled A diet held at Franckfort in 1442, approved of this expedient, and the council of Basil consented to it, though with reluctance. But obstacles occurred, that prevented the execution of that design.

Mean while Felix V. not being pleased with the council of Basil for taking so much upon them, resolved to withdraw to Lausanne, on pretence that Basil air did not agree with him. On the other hand, Eugenius translated the council of Florence to Rome, in the church of St. John of Lateran, where they began their session in 1444.

At length, in 1446, the princes of Germany assembled at Francfort, unanimously resolved, that if Eugenius would not redress the grievances complained of, they would all recognize pope Felix. Eugenius demurred at first. But the emperor telling him, he must comply, or resolve to lose all Germany, he granted whatever the Germans desired, whereupon an agreement was made.

This was a terrible blow to the council of Basil, who had now lost Italy, Arragon, and several other states. As for France they would not much rely upon her, since she still continued in obedience to pope Eugenius. England had likewise so far declared for that pope, as that we find in the Collection of the Public Acts, Henry VI. sent an embassy to make a league with him.

Eugenius IV. died whilst these things were transacting, and had for successor Nicholas V.

The council of Basil losing great part of their authority, and Felix V. having but very few friends, the king of France held a synod at Lyons, to seek means to put an end to the schism. Felix V. sending legates thither, it was resolved, with his consent, that if Nicholas V. would grant him certain conditions, he would resign the pontificate. This was the subject of a negotiation, which lasted the whole year 1448. Mean while, the council of Basil, finding themselves forsaken by almost all the world, and despairing of farther protection at Basil, since the emperor and Germany had declared for Eugenius, resolved to remove to Lausanne.

At last Felix having obtained most of his desires, resigned the papal dignity in 1449. But it was with the consent of his council, who found means to preserve still some remains of authority. By their last decree, they approved of Felix's resignation, created him cardinal and legate a latere[p] in Savoy and the Tarentaise, and allowed him to wear the papal habit all his life. Nicholas V. confirmed the decree according to agreement. Thus ended at length the schism, in which there was a complication of three schisms: first, between Eugenius IV. and the council of Basil; then between two general councils; and lastly, between two popes. The first may be said not to be yet ended, since the dispute which occasioned it still subsists. The court of Rome's adherents perpetually inveigh against the council of Basil, for decreeing, that a general council is above the pope. On the other hand, their opposers rest upon the decrees of that council to support their opinion: very probably this question will remain long undecided.

I have a little enlarged upon what passed in the two famous councils of Constance and Basil, because nothing in my opinion is more proper to discover the wretched state of the church in those days. From the close of the last schism, to the end of the XVth century, the papal chair was filled with popes cruelly bent upon the destruction of the Hussites, contrary to the faith of the agreement, or wholy employed in maintaining exorbitant power usurped by their predecessors, and generally in satisfying their avarice.

[1455] Calixtus III. successor to Nicholas V. so opposed the Germans, that they were forced at length to break the Concordat[q] made with Eugenius IV. plainly perceiving it was entirely useless.

[1448] Pius II. lately canonized, was so far from consenting to a reformation in the head of the church, that he excommunicated by a bull, all persons that should dare to appeal from the pope to a general council.

[1464] Paul II. was no sooner chosen than he broke the oath taken before his election, concerning the redress of certain abuses, which himself, with the rest of the cardinals, had deemed necessary. Never were the Gratiæ expectativæ (or bulls for church preferments before they become void) more frequent than whilst he sat in the papal chair. He spent the whole time of his pontificate in striving to abolish the Pragmatic sanction[r] in France, which debarred him of the liberty of doing there whatever he pleased.

[1471] Sixtus IV. raised by one of his bulls the hierarchy to the highest degree it could be carried, at a time when the excessive power usurped by the clergy was generally complained of.

[1484] Innocent VIII. quarrelled with Ferdinand of Arragon, king of Naples; and by his solicitations inclined Charles VIII. to carry his arms into Italy.

[1492] Alexander VI. was one of the most corrupt men of his age. It is of him a famous Roman catholic writer gives this fine character, that he would have been the wickedest man in the world, if his bastard-son[s] had not been more wicked than himself.

I pass over in silence the cruel eagerness of all these popes to persecute the Bohemians, contrary to the faith of their Concordat. The crusades against the Turks, in which they would have engaged all the princes of Europe, appeared very specious: but sovereigns were so well satisfied that in publishing crusades the popes had only their own private interest in view, that they could never confide in them.

[o] The emperor, in order to compass his ends, compelled the Greek fathers to assent to the four articles: 1. "That there is a purgatory. 2. That the pope is head of the church. 3. That the holy ghost proceeds from the father and the son. 4. That unleavened bread may be used in the Eucharist." But when they came home, they declaimed against the council, and recanted their subscriptions.

[p] Legates a latere are properly the pope's extraordinary embassadors to emperors and kings.

[q] Or agreement. Whereby the pope reserved to himself the collation of all benefices in Rome, and two days journey from it: the confirmation of metropolitans, bishops, &c. The disposal of certain benefices; and the annates.

[r] This is an edict passed in the council of Bourges, in the reign of Charles VII. It was levelled against papal provisions, the payment of first-fruits, and other encroachments of the court of Rome. In a word, it contains the privileges of the Gallican church, and was taken out of the acts of the councils of Constance and Basil.

Such

Such in general was the ſtate of the Chriſtian Church in the fifteenth century, upon which I ſhall make but one ſingle remark, leaving my readers at liberty to add as many as they pleaſe. What I would obſerve is, that the abſtract I have given evidently ſhews how trifling their opinion is, who ſay it is not the buſineſs of private perſons to endeavour a reformation of the church, but it muſt be left to the care of the church herſelf. What then is this church, from which we are to expect this happy reformation? Is it all Chriſtians in general agreeing together, as by a ſudden inſpiration, to reform abuſes? Doubtleſs this is not what is meant by the word Church. Is it the pope with his cardinals? But theſe are the very men who have all along hindered it, and very probably will to the utmoſt of their power, hinder it for ever. Shall a general council undertake this reformation? But what has hitherto paſſed in theſe aſſemblies affords no room to expect ſo great a benefit: beſides, who ſhall call this general council? of whom ſhall it be compoſed? who ſhall preſide? Can the pope be perſuaded to convene a general council to reform the church? will he give the precedency to another, that himſelf and court may be with more freedom reformed? In a word, will it not be the pope, the cardinals, the prelates, that will have the deliberative vote in this council? but theſe are ſo many perſons concerned to leave things as they are.

Will it be ſaid with ſome, that the church had no need of reformation? that ſhe is innocent and pure, without ſpot or wrinkle, or any thing like it? that all the prerogatives enjoyed by the popes, the cardinals, the biſhops, belong to them by divine right? that the pope exerciſes only the power committed to him by Chriſt? that his deciſions are infallible, as well in point of fact as of right, and the ſame obedience muſt be paid to his decrees as to thoſe of God himſelf? but if, purſuant to this principle, the popes ſhould unhappily enlarge their phylacteries, and every day form new pretenſions, as it has but too frequently happened, how ſhall they be ſtopped, if it is confeſſed the church has no need of reformation, or muſt be left to reform herſelf?

After viewing the ſtate of the Church in general, it is time to proceed to that of the church of England in particular. England, with regard to religion, was in the ſame condition with the reſt of Europe. The peopie paſſionately wiſhed for a reformation of ſundry abuſes crept into the church: the clergy ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, as every change would be to their prejudice. As for the kings, they made religion ſubſervient to their intereſt. When they imagined they wanted the clergy they found ways enough to evade the people's deſires. But when the parliament's favour was requiſite, they aſſented to the ſtatutes by which the incroachments of the pope and clergy were reſtrained.

In the beginning of the century, Heney IV. whoſe chief aim was to fix himſelf on the throne, and who thought he could not effect it without the clergy, he ſeemed throughout his whole reign to have a great deference for them: hence proceeded all the ſtatutes paſſed in thoſe days againſt the Lollards. Henry V. ſhewed at firſt great inclination to ſtrip the clergy of their riches, according to the parliament's deſire; but afterwards, turning his thoughts to the conqueſt of France, he carefully avoided that religion ſhould cauſe any troubles in his kingdom. It was highly neceſſary, in order to execute his grand projects, that his ſubjects ſhould be ready to aſſiſt him with their purſes. But on the other hand, he was no leſs concerned to live in a good underſtanding with the court of Rome, leſt ſhe ſhould hinder his enterprize. He knew what ſhe was capable of, when ſhe thought herſelf injured; ſo, artfully managing both the pope and his ſubjects, he prevented the firſt from abuſing his power too much, without depriving him however of what he poſſeſſed. By this prudent conduct he made his reign peaceable with reſpect to religion. We muſt expect however what he did in the beginning againſt the Lollards. He had ſuffered himſelf to be prepoſſeſſed that they had conſpired againſt his life, and that belief made him at firſt a little ſevere. But as he was endued with an excellent judgment, he ſoon diſcerned the intereſts of the clergy from thoſe of religion, and put a ſtop to the perſecution of the unhappy Lollards. Henry VI. was a weak man, ever ready to receive the impreſſions that were given him. Had he held the reins of the government himſelf, very probably the clergy would have gained much ground in his reign. But the directors of his affairs, as well during his minority as after, were men of a very different character: beſides the French war, the diſturbances at court after the king's marriage, and the civil war which quickly followed, gave thoſe at the helm no time to think much of religious affairs. For the ſame reaſon the reign of Edward IV. was not diſturbed either by the Lollards or their adverſaries. It is true, Edward ſhewed a great condeſcenſion for the clergy in granting them a favour conſtantly denied by the former kings: but his complaiſance did not go ſo far as to indulge perſecution. The reigns of Edward V. and Richard III. were wholly ſpent in domeſtic troubles, which had no influence upon the affairs of the church. As for Henry VII. he made it a rule to keep the church upon the ſame footing he found it when he mounted the throne. He ever avoided as a rock all innovations which might obſtruct the execution of his two ſole deſigns, namely, to ſecure the crown to himſelf and his heirs, and to heap up money. Such was, with regard to religion, the diſpoſition of the kings that reigned in England during the fifteenth century.

As for the Engliſh nation, it is certain, it was generally Wickliffite in ſome reſpects. Wickliff's opinions manifeſtly tended to theſe two principal ends: firſt to reform the government of the church, and to ſet bounds to the power of the pope and clergy: ſecondly, to alter the church's creed concerning ſome doctrines long ſince received, and which he thought contrary to ſcripture. Now as he found it almoſt impoſſible that Chriſtians ſhould return to what he believed the ancient faith of the church, becauſe the clergy were concerned to maintain the eſtabliſhed errors, he ſtrongly inſiſted upon the firſt point, as being abſolutely neceſſary to the attainment of the ſecond. It is certain, that with reſpect to his general aim in the firſt of theſe two articles, not only his profeſſed followers, but all the reſt of the people did as it were join with him. For many ages the Engliſh had felt the oppreſſion wherein the pope and clergy had kept them. In all Chriſtendom no nation had more experienced the rigour of this dominion. The hiſtory of England ſhews it ſo manifeſtly, that a man muſt be blind not to ſee it. But though the hiſtory were ſuſpected, the ſtatutes of Proviſors and Preminure ſo frequently revived, leave no room to queſtion that the Engliſh thought themſelves oppreſſed. So it may be ſaid, that in general the Engliſh nation was Wickliffite as to the firſt point, though many believe Wickliff would have carried the reformation a little too far, and to correct the abuſes of the hierarchy was fallen into the contrary extreme. But the nation was not generally Wickliffite with reſpect to the ſecond article, namely, the alteration of belief, concerning the doctrines. Indeed Wickliff had in this reſpect many followers, but they were not the majority. Thus the name of Wickliffite, or Lollard, was an equivocal term, capable of being underſtood in two different ſenſes: ſometimes it ſignified a man, who ſeparating from the church, embraced all Wickliff's opinions: it might likewiſe be underſtood of one, who remaining in the church as it was then, and adhering to the received doctrines, was however of Wickliff's opinion concerning the temporal and ſpiritual juriſdiction of the clergy. In this laſt ſenſe there were more Lollards in England than can be imagined. This diſtinction may ſerve to account for divers proceedings of the parliaments in the beginning of the fifteenth century, which ſeem to be contrary one to another. Sometimes they were ſeen to ſpeak and act like Lollards, earneſtly demanding that the clergy ſhould be ſtripped of their riches; and ſometimes to condemn theſe ſame Lollards to the flames, when they conſidered them in the firſt ſenſe before-mentioned. The clergy knew how to take advantage of the ambiguity of that term: when a man was ſo hardy as to ſhew that it were to be wiſhed ſome alteration were made in the government of the church, he was infallibly accuſed of being a Lollard, and charged with all Wickliff's opinions. Hence he became odious, becauſe the true Lollards maintained doctrines repugnant to the faith of thoſe days. The firſt parliament which petitioned Henry IV. to ſeize the church lands, could not eſcape that imputation, which made a deep impreſſion in the king's mind. Thus it often happened, that people did not dare openly to approve Wickliff's firſt opinions, for fear of being taxed alſo with holding the others, and expoſed to ſuffer for tenets they received not, as it happened to John Huſs and Jerome of Prague. It was not without cauſe that the clergy proſecuted the Lollards with ſuch animoſity, ſince their principles tended to no leſs than to deprive them of all their prerogatives. At this very day, the church of England, though embracing Wickliff's opinions concerning the doctrines, cannot forbear expreſſing very little eſteem for that doctor, becauſe he has combated the hierarchy, which ſhe has thought proper to retain.

The Lollards were periecuted ſometimes more, ſometimes leſs, according to the character of the kings, archbiſhops, and the reſt of the prelates, but chiefly according to the circumſtances of affairs. In general, the beginning of the fifteenth century was much more ſevere for them than the middle or the end. The reaſon is evident: for as their numbers continually increaſed, their enemies found much leſs ſupport, and themſelves more protection. In the beginning of the fifteenth century, which was the moſt troubleſome time for them, there were however but very few burnt, of which three principal reaſons may be given: firſt, as the ſtatutes did not enact that all in general ſhould be burnt who held the tenets of Wickliff, but only ſuch as preached or taught them publicly, the number of the guilty was not very great. Theſe ſtatutes were not obſerved after the manner of the inquiſition, but agreeably to the liberties and privileges of the Engliſh nation. In the next place, the idea which the clergy were pleaſed to give of the Lollards, was that they entirely ſubverted religion: but often in the examination of the parties accuſed as ſuch, it appeared that they only believed the pope and clergy abuſed their power too much, which was the general opinion of the kingdom. It was well known the parliament had not that in view in their ſtatute againſt the Lollards. Laſtly, the judges themſelves ſometimes happened to be of the ſect, and this was the occaſion of the ſtatute in the reign of Henry V. obliging all magiſtrates at their entrance into office, to ſwear to the execution of the laws againſt the Lollards: but I do not know whether the ſtatute was ever punctually obſerved. If we believe Walſingham the monk, the judges and ſeveral biſhops themſelves were very remiſs in the proſecution of the Lollards. This he aſcribes to the general corruption which reigned in England: but this corruption was nothing elſe but the inclination of the Engliſh for Wickliff's opinions, or at leaſt their ſcruple to put people to death on account of religion. The moſt remarkable thing in England concerning the Lollards, was the trial and puniſhment of ſir John Oldcaſtle, otherwiſe called lord Cobham, of whom I have ſpoken in the reign of Henry V. We muſt now proceed to another ſubject, namely, the conteſt which England had with the court of Rome during the fifteenth century.

Notwithſtanding all the complaints frequently carried to the court of Rome concerning her continual encroachments, and the precautions taken by ſeveral parliaments to ſcreen themſelves from the ſame, the popes did not abate their pretenſions. The acts of parliament were to them but like thunder without execution, which reached not their rights. Upon every occaſion they made no ſcruple to act contrary to the ſtatutes as if they had not been made, and aſſert their apoſtolic power, without troubling themſelves whether they prejudiced the king or his ſubjects. The parliaments, willing to remedy the abuſes flowing from the continual diſpenſations granted by the pope without hearing the cauſe, paſſed in 1400, an act, "That all perſons who purchaſed or executed any bulls to be diſcharged from the payment of tythes, ſhould incur the penalties contained in the ſtatute of Proviſors." It was enacted by another ſtatute paſſed at the ſame time, "That if any perſon ſhould procure a proviſion to be exempt from the juriſdiction of the biſhops, he ſhould incur the ſame penalties." Theſe acts being made chiefly with a view to the monks, were not capable of producing the intended effect, becauſe the pope, by the fulneſs, of his apoſtolic authority, exempted the monks from the obſervance of theſe parliamentary ſtatutes. The biſhops, whom this affair chiefly concerned, not daring to diſpute the power aſſumed by the pope, it was the parliament's buſineſs to defend their cauſe as well as their own. To that purpoſe the ſtatutes upon this ſubject were revived, with an additional clauſe prohibiting the monks in particular to purchaſe or execute any ſuch exemptions, upon the penalty compriſed in the ſtatute of Premunire.

This ſtatute, which I have mentioned upon ſeveral occaſions, was a terrible fence againſt the court of Rome's uſurpations. Indeed it did not directly attack the pope, ſince the parliament had no juriſdiction over him: but as it hindered the Engliſh from applying to the court of Rome for things contrary to the prerogatives of the crown and the laws of the realm, it abridged the pope of good part of the advantages which he pretended to reap from his apoſtolic power. It will perhaps be thought ſtrange that the popes ſhould be ſilent when and long after this ſtatute was paſſed. But it is eaſy to diſcover the reaſon. The ſchiſm, which began in 1378, and laſted till 1409, hindered them from ſtirring. The popes owned by England, took care to give no offence in ſuch a juncture. It is true, there was an interval of ſome years, during which, Alexander V. and John XXIII. might have made ſome attempt againſt that law: but Alexander's pontificate was very ſhort, and John was employed in affairs, as he thought, of more importance. Martin V. conſidered not this affair with the ſame indifference: in 1426, he wrote a thundering letter to Chicheley, archbiſhop of Canterbury, upbraiding him for his remiſſneſs, and enjoining him to exert his utmoſt that this ſtatute might be repealed. Henry VI. who then reigned, not being above five years old, the pope thought it a favourable juncture to compaſs his ends. It will not be perhaps unacceptable to inſert part of this letter, which ſhews the pope's ſentiments concerning the pretended privileges of his ſee.

MARTIN, ſervant of the ſervants of God, to his reverend brother, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, greeting, and apoſtolical benediction.

"HAD you conſidered what a ſtrict account you muſt give to almighty God for the flock committed to your care: had you called to mind the obligations of your office, and how much you are bound to maintain the rights and honour of the Roman church, of whom you hold your dignity: had you, I ſay, duly recollected theſe things, you would never have ſuffered yourſelf to be ſeized with ſuch a lethargy and negligence. No, you would have done your duty long ſince: you would have endeavoured to ſet right the miſled, and oppoſed with all your power thoſe who had ſacrilegiouſly invaded the privileges granted by our Saviour to the church. Was the authority of your character beſtowed upon you only to enrich yourſelf, and give you opportunity of ſeeking your own, and not the things which are Jeſus Chriſt's? If this be your opinion, you greatly miſtake the inſtructions of our bleſſed Saviour, who, when he committed his ſheep to St. Peter's care only commanded him to feed them; neither received he this command till he had given his maſter repeated aſſurances of his love. Is this then your manner of ſhewing your love to Chriſt? Is this feeding and taking care of the flock? Will ſuch conduct as this diſcharge your duty to the holy ſee? Alas, your flock are running down a precipice before your eyes, and you are regardleſs of their danger, and make no attempt to ſave them: you ſuffer them to feed in dangerous paſtures without warning them; and which is horrible, you ſeem to put poiſon in their mouths with your own hands; you ſee the wolves ſcatter and tear them in pieces, and like a dumb dog vouchſafe not ſo much as to bark. You can behold the authority of our bleſſed Saviour and the holy ſee deſpiſed and trampled on, without dropping one word of remonſtrance. One would have thought you might at leaſt have whiſpered your diſlike, though you had been ſo very prudent as not to have declared it publicly. Are you not ſenſible you muſt one day account to the utmoſt farthing for all omiſſions and prevarications of this kind? Do not you think, if any of your flock are loſt by your neglect (and, alas! there are a great many) their blood will be required at your hands? Conſider and tremble what vengeances God denounces by his prophet Ezekiel: Son of man, I have ſet thee a watchman unto the houſe of Iſrael: if thou ſeeſt the ſword come, and doſt not blow the trumpet, and any perſon is taken away, his blood will I require at thy hands."

To ſee this beginning, would not one think the point in queſtion was ſome new hereſy, tending to ſubvert the foundations of religion? At leaſt, one ſhould believe, the pope had the Wickliffites in view. But it was not ſo: we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of the letter what the affair was; namely, the ſtatute of Premunire, which the archbiſhop had not cauſed to be repealed, the pope groundleſsly ſuppoſing, it was in that prelate's power to annul the laws of the realm. He continued in this manner:

"I leave it to yourſelf to conſider, what abominable violence has been committed upon your province. Pray read that royal law, if there's any thing in it that is either law or royal. For how can that be called a ſtatute, which repeals the laws of God and the church? Or how can it deſerve the name of royal, when it deſtroys the ancient cuſtom of the realm; and it is ſo contrary to theſe words of ſcripture, "The king loveth judgment!" Tell me then, reverend brother, whether you, who are a catholic biſhop, can think it reaſonable ſuch an act as this ſhould be in force in a Chriſtian country?

"In the firſt place, under colour of this execrable ſtatute, the king of England graſps at the ſpiritual juriſdicton, and governs ſo abſolutely in eccleſiaſtical matters, as if our Saviour had appointed him his vicar. He makes laws for the church and clergy. In ſhort, he makes ſo many proviſions about clerks, benefices, and the concerns of the hierarchy, that one would think "the keys of the kingdom of heaven" were put into his hands, and the ſuperintendency of theſe affairs had been entruſted with him, and not with St. Peter.

"Beſides theſe hideous uſurpations, he has enacted ſeveral penalties againſt the clergy. Such a rigour is the more unjuſtifiable, as the Engliſh government does not treat Turks and Jews with ſo great ſeverity. People of all countries and perſuaſions have the liberty of coming into England. Only thoſe who have cures beſtowed upon them by Chriſt's vicar are excluded: only thoſe, I ſay, are baniſhed, ſeized, impriſoned, ſtripped of their fortunes. If any eccleſiaſtical perſon, charged with the execution of the mandates and cenſures of the holy ſee, happens to ſet foot on Engliſh ground, and proceed in the buſineſs of his commiſſion, he is treated like an enemy, thrown out of the king's protection, and expoſed moreover to ſtill greater hardſhips. Was ever ſuch iniquity as this paſſed into a law? Pray conſider whether ſuch ſtatutes as theſe are for the honour of the kingdom; and whether it becomes you to be ſilent under all this outrage. Is this an inſtance of filial obedience? Is this the Engliſh people's way of ſhewing their regard to their mother church and holy ſee? Can that be called a catholic kingdom, where ſuch profane laws are practiſed, where application to Chriſt's vicar is prohibited, where St. Peter's ſucceſſor is not allowed to execute our Saviour's commiſſion? Chriſt ſaid to St. Peter, and in him to his ſucceſſors, "feed my ſheep" But this ſtatute will not ſuffer him to feed them, but transfers that office upon the king, and pretends in ſeveral caſes to give him apoſtolical authority. Chriſt built his church upon St. Peter; but this act of parliament hinders the effect of this diſpoſition, not permitting St. Peter's ſee to proceed in the functions of government, or to make proviſions ſuitable to the neceſſities of the church. Our Lord has ordered, that whatever his high-prieſt "ſhall bind or looſe on earth, ſhall be bound or looſed in heaven:" But this ſtatute over-rules the divine command: for if the immediate repreſentative of our Saviour thinks fit to delegate any prieſt to execute the power of the keys, contrary to the intent of the ſtatute, he is refuſed admittance, forced out of the kingdom, ſtript of his effects, and made liable to farther penalties. If any diſcipline, if any apoſtolic cenſure, appear againſt this uſage, it is puniſhed as a capital offence.

"And what does your prudence think of all this? Is this a catholic ſtatute? Can it be ſuffered without diſhonour to our Saviour, without a breach upon the laws of the goſpel, and the ruin of people's ſouls? Why therefore did you not "cry aloud?" Why "did you not lift up your voice like a trumpet? ſhew your people their tranſgreſſion, and the houſe of Jacob their ſins, that their blood may not be required at your hands?" If all perſons who have the cure of ſouls, are bound to this duty, how much more are you, who have both the prieſts and people committed to your care by the holy ſee, by whoſe favour you enjoy the privilege of primate and legate for the church of England, and have the honour of being ſucceſſor to that glorious martyr St. Thomas, who, to remove the oppreſſion of ſuch ſtatutes, ſcrupled not to ſacrifice himſelf for the intereſt of the church.

"Theſe things conſidered, you, who ought to have ſet up the church's ſtandard, been moſt forward in the defence of religion, and animated your fellow biſhops to a noble conteſt, are the firſt that turn your back, and decline the ſervice. Thus, either by your great cowardice, or, as it is generally believed, by your downright prevarication, you diſcourage thoſe who offer to make a ſtand. If therefore the church complain of your conduct; if the whole be laid to your charge, be not ſurprized, but troubled at the imputation. Let this reproach ſerve to put you upon reforming your conduct, and make you boldly perform the duties of your office; which, were you but inclined to make the moſt of your power, would not be very difficult. Exert therefore your character among the laity; inform their underſtandings in this point, and endeavour to reclaim them. Shew them what a ſnare this ſtatute will prove, and how much guilt it will draw upon their conſciences. Let your admonitions be preſſing and ſharp, and then, "The crooked will be made ſtrait, and the rough places ſmooth."

After ſo ſevere a reprimand, the pope continues to tell the archbiſhop, that he thought himſelf bound in conſcience to deal thus plainly with him. Then he charges him upon pain of excommunication, to go immediately to the privy-council and make what intereſt he could, for repealing the ſtatute of Premunire, to apply to both houſes of parliament for the ſame purpoſe, and let them know, that all thoſe who obey that ſtatute were under excommunication. Moreover, he orders him to enjoin all the clergy to preach publicly, and every where the ſame doctrine; to take with him two grave perſons to atteſt his diligence, and to certify him of the reſult of the affair.

If it be required what made Martin V. ſo very angry with Chicheley, who was not concerned in the ſtatute of Premunire, paſſed long before he was archbiſhop, and who had not the power to procure a repeal, the reaſon is this. Chicheley had oppoſed to his utmoſt, the papal exemption. He had diſſuaded Henry V. from conſenting, that Henry Beaufort his uncle ſhould be made cardinal, Legate a latere for life, and hold the biſhopric of Wincheſter in Commendam. Moreover he had ſaid publicly, that all the pope's proceedings tended only to drain England continually.

The archbiſhop willing to juſtify himſelf, did not do it to the pope's ſatisfaction. On the contrary, he drew upon himſelf a ſtill more thundering letter, and after that a third, directed to the two archbiſhops, wherein, to mortify Canterbury, York is named firſt. Chicheley fearing the pope's threats, got ſome biſhops to write in his behalf, but nothing was capable of pacifying him. At length, he ſent him a letter himſelf, telling him, he heard by common report, that his holineſs had proceeded to a ſentence againſt him, which had never happened to any archbiſhop of Canterbury ſince the days of St. Auguſtine. That however, he was not certain of the thing, becauſe he was commanded by the king to bring all the inſtruments received from Rome, with the ſeals whole, and lodged them in the paper-office till the parliament ſat.

Mean while, Martin V. reſolving to puſh this affair, wrote to the king and parliament in a more haughty ſtrain than had ever been uſed by any pope. He admoniſhes, or rather commands them to repeal the ſtatute of Premunire, otherwiſe he aſſures them they cannot be ſaved.

At laſt, the archbiſhop, ſeeing the pope thus obſtinate, and not daring any longer to diſobey him, went with ſeveral other biſhops to the houſe of commons, where he made a long ſpeech, tending to perſuade the houſe to repeal the ſtatute, and put them in mind of the danger of an interdict upon the whole kingdom. But neither his arguments nor threats were capable of inducing the commons to repeal, or even explain the act. On the contrary, they addreſſed the king to take the archbiſhop into his protection, and to write to the pope in his behalf.

Pope Martin's letter, and his extraordinary endeavours for repealing the ſtatute of Premunire, afford matter for three remarks. The firſt is, this letter is a demonſtration, that the main of religion was then made to conſiſt in the pope's prerogatives, and the clergy's immunities. Hence it alſo appears, how averſe Martin was to conſent to the leaſt dimimution of his pretended rights, and conſequently to a reformation in the head and members of the church, demanded with ſo much earneſtneſs at the council of Conſtance where he was preſent himſelf.

The ſecond remark is, that at all times the popes, in their conteſts with the ſeveral ſtates of Chriſtendom, have always had great advantages. Theſe advantages conſiſted, in that, by the threats of excommunication and interdict, they puſhed matters ſo far, that there was need of great reſolution not to be over-awed, and loſe ground either by agreement or otherwiſe. But if this reſolution was proof againſt all attempts, and the circumſtances of affairs were not favourable to the court of Rome, ſhe had the power to ſtop when ſhe pleaſed, in expectation of a better opportunity. They who had the misfortune to contend with her, always reckoned it a great victory not to be vanquiſhed, being ſatisfied if ſhe would but ſuffer them to live in peace.

The third remark, is a conjecture which I ſhall leave to the reader's judgment. Though Henry VI. was then but five years old, and his minority ſeemed to countenance the pope's deſign, it is certain, however, England had never been in a more proſperous condition. The Engliſh were quiet, and pleaſed with the government, and the victories of Crevant and Verneuil had put their affairs in France upon a very good foot. On the other hand, the affairs of Charles VII. were in ſuch diſorder, that there was no appearance of their being ever reſtored; and therefore Martin V. could not but deem it a proper time for him. Beſides, the king's two uncles were not diſpoſed to ſuffer the prerogatives royal, and the people's rights to be trampled upon, when the affairs were in ſo flouriſhing a condition. It is therefore probable, that Martin V. who was much more inclined to France than to England, England, made then all that ſtir, only to excite troubles in England, which would be of ſervice to king Charles, and give him time to breathe. If the archbiſhop had punctually obeyed him, and the clergy every where preached againſt the ſtatute of Preminure, purſuant to the pope's expreſs orders, the parliament would have been forced to ſupport their act, and puniſh the clergy's preſumption. Then the pope would have had a pretence to put the kingdom under an interdict, which would have greatly embroiled the affairs of the Engliſh in France. But Chicheley's prudence prevented the miſchief which might have ſprung from Martin's haughty proceedings. In ſhort, Martin perceiving, he was ſupported neither by the king's council, nor the clergy, nor the people, dropped the affair, not thinking proper to expoſe his authority any farther. This conjecture is built upon Martin's continual partiality to France, whether out of inclination, or becauſe, indeed, it was not for the intereſt of the court of Rome, that France ſhould be ſubject to England.

Before I leave the Preminure, it will not be improper to obſerve, that this ſtatute had two principal clauſes. The firſt containing the ſtatute of Proviſors in the reign of Edward I. prohibits the procuring of benefices from the court of Rome by way of proviſion, contrary to the rights of the crown or the patrons. The ſecond forbids to carry to the court of Rome, or elſewhere, cauſes belonging to the king's courts. The clergy complained that by theſe words, or elſewhere, the king's judges pretended to deprive the eccleſiaſtical courts of numberleſs cauſes, which before they had the cognizance of. They maintained, that theſe words, or elſewhere, inſerted in the act, had no relation to the eccleſiaſtical courts, but only to the ſeveral places where the pope might reſide. That nevertheleſs the judges underſtood them in the firſt ſenſe, and if there was in a proceſs the leaſt point belonging to the royal juriſdiction, took occaſion, from theſe two words, to remove it from the eccleſiaſtical court, as well as from the court of Rome. In 1439, the convocation complained to the king of the explanation of theſe terms by the lay judges, pretending it was contrary to the intent of the law, for ſeveral reaſons alledged in their addreſs. For that time, the clergy had no anſwer, or, if they had, it was not to their mind. But in the reign of Edward IV. they obtained the king's charter, prohibiting his judges to meddle with criminal matters where the clergy were concerned. I do not know whether Edward granted this charter out of policy, to gain the clergy's protection, or was convinced that the words, or elſewhere, were explained contrary to the parliament's intention.

Beſides the conteſts occaſioned by the ſtatute of Premunire between England and the court of Rome, there were alſo others which I ſhall but juſt mention. In 1400, in the reign of Henry IV. the parliament paſſed an act, forbidding all perſons that ſhould have proviſion of any benefice, to pay into the apoſtolic chamber more than was paid in old time. The penalty for offenders was, that they ſhould forfeit to the king the ſame ſum they paid the pope. The occaſion of this ſtatute was a grievance introduced ſome time before by the court of Rome, which was, that no perſon ſhould have proviſion of any benefice that was void, till he had compounded with the apoſtolic chamber, as well for the firſt-fruits, as for other leſſer ſervices in that court, and paid beforehand the ſum agreed upon.

But the greateſt diſpute between England and the popes, was concerning the collation of the biſhoprics. Though the popes, when the Anglo-Saxons were converted, had ſent Italian or other foreign biſhops into England, it is certain that towards the latter end of the Saxon monarchy, the biſhops were choſen by the chapters. The ſame privilege was continued to them after the Norman conqueſt, and confirmed by king John's charter. Mean while, the popes having gradually extended their authority, aſſumed the power of beſtowing archbiſhoprics and biſhoprics, by way of proviſion, ſometimes on one, ſometimes on another pretence. This is what I have had frequent occaſion to remark. They would have at once eſtabliſhed this rule, that the diſpoſal of all the biſhoprics belonged to them by divine right; but meeting with obſtacles, bethought themſelves of another expedient, and that was, to get poſſeſſion by degrees, in order afterwards to plead preſcription. Thus being content at firſt with maintaining, that on certain occaſions they had a power to fill the vacant ſees, they afterwards framed theſe occaſions whenever they pleaſed. In ſhort, they multiplied them ſo very faſt, that hardly was there a vacant biſhopric but whot they filled by way of proviſion. Time and favourable junctures confirming them in this prerogative, there was no poſſibility to wreſt it from them. Thus the privilege of the chapter was entirely deſtroyed.

Arundel, archbiſhop of Canterbury, dying in 1413, the monks of St. Auguſtine choſe Henry Chicheley, biſhop of St. David's. But pope John XXIII. annulled the election, declaring, that for this turn, he had reſolved to diſpoſe of the archbiſhopric by way of proviſion. However to avoid diſputes, he made choice of the ſame Chicheley; preſerving thereby his pretended right, without detriment to the perſon elected.

But Martin V. dealt not ſo gently with England. He was no ſooner ſeated in the papal chair, than he boldly diſpoſed of all the vacant ſees, without any regard to the privilege of the chapters. In two years only he filled, by way of proviſion, thirteen biſhoprics in the province of Canterbury. It was not only with reſpect to the ſees, that England had cauſe to complain of the pope; he diſpoſed likewiſe of all the other benefices of the kingdom, without troubling himſelf about the right of the patrons, or the inſtructions of the people. The beſt preferments were generally conferred upon foreigners, who underſtood not a word of Engliſh, or reſided not in England, and ſometimes even upon children. For inſtance he made Proſper Colona, his nephew, who was but fourteen years old, archdeacon of Canterbury. Henry V. a high-ſpirited prince ſent embaſſadors to Rome, to complain both of theſe, and other grievances. But Martin V. delayed his anſwer ſo long, that the embaſſadors told him, the king their maſter, purely out of reſpect to the holy ſee, had proceeded by way of reſpect to which he was not obliged; but for the future he would uſe his prerogative: that accordingly they had inſtructions to make a ſolemn proteſtation before himſelf and the conclave, if his holineſs would not give them immediate ſatisfaction. I know not what anſwer the pope returned; but not long after, Martin having tranſlated the biſhop of Lincoln to the ſee of York, by way of proviſion, the chapter refuſed to admit him, and the pope was forced to revoke his bull.

In 1438, the univerſity of Oxford complained, that church-preferments were beſtowed without any regard to learning or merit: that the colleges were thereby become empty, becauſe there was no need of ſtudy or learning, to be qualified for a benefice. Whereupon the convocation, to whom this complaint was addreſſed, paſſed a canon. That none but graduates in the univerſities ſhould be capable of benefices. But this was a weak fence againſt the papal power.

Mean while, though the court of Rome made the apoſtolic authority ſound very high, the popes now and then met with mortifications. For example, in the reign of Henry IV. the parliament ordered, that the peter-pence ſhould be depoſited in the king's hand till the ſchiſm was cloſed.

In the reign of Henry V. the alien priories were ſuppreſſed without aſking the pope's conſent.

Under Henry VI. pope Nicholas V. demanding an extraordinary ſubſidy of the clergy of England, for the occaſion of the holy ſee, the king forbad the clergy to grant it.

The like demand, made ſome years after by Vicentini, a nuntio, was ſharply denied by the clergy. The papal power, formerly ſo dreadful to the whole church, and particularly to England, began to be leſs feared. The ſchiſms did the pope irreparable damages.

During the whole XVth century, it does not appear that any national councils were held in England, but only convocations of the clergy, in the two eccleſiaſtical provinces of Canterbury and York. The condemnation of the Lollards was almoſt the ſole buſineſs of theſe convocations. As for national ſynods, they were become uſeleſs, ſince the popes had engroſſed the cognizance of all eccleſiaſtical affairs. Beſides, the leaſt appeal to the pope was ſufficient to annul all the canons of a council. On the other hand, the popes had ſo managed, that no national ſynods could be held without their licence. Now, as in theſe ſynods there was but too frequent occaſion to enquire into the extent of the papal authority, they were grown ſo odious to the court of Rome, that the uſe of them was inſenſibly laid aſide. At this day, in the ſtates which have not yet received the reformation, national councils are no more talked of, or at leaſt, ſo very rarely, that it is plain the popes allow them with reluctance and very great difficulties. Of this we have in France a late remarkable inſtance in the tranſactions concerning the famous conſtitution Unigenitus of Clement XI. King Lewis XIV. though powerful and formidable, could never obtain the pope's leave to call a national council, except on ſuch terms as rendered things impracticable, though that monarch's ſole aim was to cauſe the conſtitution to be approved.

The article of the eminent men, who flouriſhed in the church of England during this century, will not long detain us.

us. Indeed, there were cardinals, archbiſhops, biſhops, and other clergymen, very famous, but it was neither for their piety nor learning. Their poſts at court, their embaſſies, intrigues, of the cabinet, and ſhare in the revolutions in the court and kingdom, were the only things by which they were diſtinguiſhed. Henry Chicheley, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was one of the beſt. For which reaſon he obtained not the honour of the cardinalate, laviſhly beſtowed upon Henry Beaufort, biſhop of Wincheſter, upon Kemp, Bourchier, Morton, who were leſs worthy of it than he, if true merit had been regarded. But Chicheley wanted one indiſpenſable quality of a cardinal, namely, to be entirely devoted to the holy ſee [a].

If there were any learned men beſides, they were ſo with reſpect to the time they lived in, when true learning was not much in vogue. And therefore it would be very needleſs to ſpeak of each in particular, ſince their fame hardly out-lived them. Some were noted for their great animoſity againſt the Lollards, and amongſt the reſt, Arundel, archbiſhop of Canterbury. That prelate in his funeral ſermon for Ann of Luxemburgh, Richard the Second's queen, highly commends her for ſpending her time in reading the holy ſcriptures in the vulgar tongue: And yet, ſome years after, in the reign of Henry IV. he condemned in convocation the tranſlations of the bible, as very pernicious [b].

[a] In 1439, he ordained, That vicarages ſhould not be endowed with a leſs ſum than twelve marks a year. Spelman Conc. tom. II. p. 686.

[b] As there was a ſcarcity of perſons eminent in other parts of learning in this rude and illiterate century, ſo was there likewiſe of hiſtorians. The moſt noted were:

Sir John Froiſſart, who wrote a general hiſtory of the affairs of France, Spain, &c. but chiefly of England. He was a Frenchman born, but was brought up in his youth in the court of Edward III. and familiarly converſant in that of Richard II. He wrote in his own tongue, which was then the court language of England. In the Engliſh edition, publiſhed by ſir John Bourchier, at the command of Henry VIII. the miſtakes that had crept into the French copies are corrected. His account of matters ſeems to be plain and honeſt; and perhaps no one gives a better of the affairs of Edward III. and Richard II. Rapin has made good uſe of him.

Enguerrand de Monſtrelet, and Philip de Commines, may not improperly be called Froiſſart's continuators. They gave a faithful and complete account of the affairs of England, as far as they are intermixed with, or have any relation to, thoſe of France, Burgundy, &c.

Thomas Walſingham, a Benedictine Monk of St. Alban's. His Hiſtoria Brevis, [or ſhort hiſtory] begins at the concluſion of Henry IIId's reign, where Matthew Paris ended his. The account he gives is well enough; and we are indebted to him for many things not taken notice of by any other writer of thoſe times. His Ypodigma Neuſtriæ (as he calls it) gives an account of Normandy, from the time it came firſt into the hands of Rollo and his Danes, down to the ſixth year of Henry V. wherein the readers will find many occurrences not elſewhere to be met with. Both theſe works were publiſhed by archbiſhop Parker, in 1574, and reprinted at Francfort in 1603.

John Harding comes next, a northern Engliſhman, and an inveterate enemy to the Scots. He collected whatever might tend to the proof of the ancient vaſſalage of Scotland to the crown of England; and hearing of an old record in that kingdom which put the matter paſt diſpute, he went in diſguiſe, with much ado brought it away, and ſhewed it to Henry V. Henry VI. and Edward IV. To the laſt of theſe he dedicated his two books of Chronicles in Engliſh rhime. Printed at London, 1543.

William Caxton was a menial ſervant for thirty years together to Margaret ducheſs of Burgundy (ſiſter to Henry IV.) in Flanders. Finding, as he ſays, after his return to England, an imperfect hiſtory, he continued it in Engliſh, under the Lattin title of Fructus Temporum. It begins with the firſt inhabitant of this iſland, and ends (the laſt year of Edward IV.) 1483. Folio, printed 1515.

John Roſe, or Rous, travelled over the greateſt part of England, and having made large collections out of the libraries where he came, he wrote the hiſtory of our kings, which was publiſhed in 1716, by T. Hearne, from a MS. in the Cottonian Library. He died 1491.

BOOK XV.

The Reign of HENRY VIII. containing the Space of Thirty-ſeven Years and nine Months.

20. HENRY VIII.

[1509] HENRY VIII. ſon and ſucceſſor of Henry VII. came to the crown at the age of eighteen years, wanting a few months [a]. The lord Herbert, his hiſtorian ſays, the king his father deſigned him at firſt for the archbiſhopric of Canterbury, becauſe having an elder ſon, there was no likelihood that Henry would aſcend the throne. And therefore, continues he, care was taken to inſtruct him in all the parts of learning neceſſary for a prince that was one day to be a churchman. He would have ſpoken more juſtly, if he had only ſaid, that Henry VII. had ſuch a deſign when he firſt put him upon his ſtudies. But as the young prince was become his heir apparent at the age of eleven years, it could not be with the ſame view, that he cauſed him to purſue the ſtudy of ſuch parts of learning as were proper for a clergyman. It is more likely therefore, that the king his father kept him to his ſtudies, for fear his active and fiery ſpirit ſhould carry him to more dangerous employments [b]. He was only ſon of queen Elizabeth, heireſs of the houſe of York. Conſequently, he might have given the king his father ſome trouble, had he thought of aſſerting his right as heir to his mother. However Henry having taken a reliſh for learning in his younger years, preſerved it ever after. He always delighted in peruſing good books, and converſing with the learned, even when the multitude of his affairs ſeemed to divert him from ſuch kinds of employment. By that means he made great advances in the ſciences very uncommon to great princes. Francis I. his cotemporary, ſtiled by the French hiſtorians, the father of the muſes, was in learning much his inferior. He ſpoke French and Latin very well and readily. He was perfectly ſkilled in muſic, as two entire maſſes compoſed by himſelf, and often ſung in his chapel, do abundantly witneſs. He was exerciſed in the moſt abſtruſe points of the Ariſtotelian philoſophy, which alone was in vogue in thoſe days. But he applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of divinity, as it was then taught in the univerſities, all ſtuffed with uſeleſs queſtions. Thomas Aquinas's ſummary was his favourite book.

This knowledge, which was conſidered as a great accompliſhment, even in ordinary perſons, had upon the young prince an effect which is not unuſual. It gave him a good opinion of himſelf, which had but too much influence upon all the actions of his life. The exceſſive commendations beſtowed upon him by all, helped to confirm him in this conceit. When he was yet unexperienced in the affairs of the ſtate, he fancied himſelf very able; and this preſumption was the cauſe of his being often the dupe of thoſe princes with whom he was concerned, as will more amply appear in the courſe of his reign.

But in remarking that this prince had a great deal of ſelf-conceit. I don't pretend to rob him of, or any ways leſſen, the noble qualities he had from nature or education. In his youth he was very handſome, and expert in all bodily exerciſes, as much as, or more than, any prince of his time. Accordingly, he was paſſionately fond of all thoſe diverſions, which gave him an opportunity to ſhew his activity. He was courageous without oſtentation, of a free and open temper, an enemy to fraud and inſincerity, ſcorning to uſe indirect means to compaſs his ends. His liberality

[a] He was born June 28, 1491, and came to the crown April 22, 1509.

[b] Burnet ſays, his father had given orders, that both his elder brother and he ſhould be well inſtructed in matters of knowledge, not with deſign to make him archbiſhop of Canterbury, for he had made ſmall progreſs when his brother died.

perhaps was as much too great as the king his father's avarice. Henry VII. ſeemed to have been ſolicitous to accumulate riches, only to afford his ſon the pleaſure to ſquander them away without any diſcretion.

As Henry VIII. when he mounted the throne, was little experienced in the affairs of the government, he made uſe at firſt of the king his father's miniſters and councellors. The principal were, William Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and lord chancellor of England (of whom honourable mention is made by Eraſmus [c] ſomewhere in his writings), Richard Fox biſhop of Wincheſter, ſecretary and lord privy ſeal, who had been employed in the late reign, in the niceſt affairs: Thomas Howard, earl of Surrey, lord treaſurer of England, ſon of the duke of Norfolk, ſlain at Boſworth-field, fighting for Richard III. George Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, lord ſteward of the king's houſhold; Thomas Ruthal, doctor of law; ſir Edward Poynings, knight of the garter, comptroller, whoſe name is ſtill famous for a ſtatute enacted in Ireland in the former reign, whilſt he had the government of that iſland: ſir Charles Somerſet, lord Herbert of Gower, Chepſtow, and Ragland, lord chamberlain [d].

Henry VIIth's funeral was celebrated with great magnificence a few days after his death. His body was interred at Weſtminſter, in the chapel built by himſelf, and for the adorning whereof he had ſpared no coſt. This chapel paſſed then for one of the ſtatelieſt in Chriſtendom. Henry VII. covetous, as he was, laid out fourteen thouſand, ſome ſay, twenty thouſand pounds ſterling, a very conſiderable ſum in thoſe days, when money was much ſcarcer in Europe than at preſent [e].

While the obſequies were preparing, the new king privately retired from his palace of Richmond to the Tower of London, under colour of withdrawing on account of the king his father's death. But it was rather to ſettle with his miniſters ſome affairs which would not admit of delay. Whilſt he was thought in his retirement to be employed in devotion, he ordered Henry lord Stafford, brother of the duke of Buckingham, to be apprehended, probably upon ſome groundleſs ſuſpicion, which ſoon vaniſhed, ſince, ſhortly after, he was created earl of Wiltſhire.

The ſee of Durham, vacant by the tranſlation of Chriſtopher Bambridge, to the archbiſhopric of York, was conferred on Thomas Ruthal, doctor of law, and one of the privy council [f].

A few days after, the king confirmed his father's general pardon granted before his death [g]. But all offenders had not the benefit thereof. A proclamation quickly appeared, wherein the king ſaid, that being informed his good ſubjects had been oppreſſed under the ſpecious pretence of preſerving the prerogatives of the crown, he gave them leave to bring their complaints, and promiſed them ſatisfaction. The deſign of the proclamation was not to reſtore to his ſubjects the ſums unjuſtly extorted by the late king, but only to encourage them to exhibit their complaints againſt Empſon and Dudley, the inſtruments made uſe of by Henry VII. and to give them ſome ſort of ſatisfaction, by puniſhing theſe two miniſters.

When the proclamation was publiſhed, numberleſs petitions were preſented againſt them. This was what the court wanted, not only becauſe theſe men were odious to the whole nation, but moreover to ſhew the people the new king intended to rule in a very different manner from the king his father. Upon all theſe petitions, Empſon and Dudley, were called before the council, where they were briefly told the principal articles alledged againſt them. Empſon anſwered for both, "That the accuſation was of a very new and ſtrange nature: that uſually men were proſecuted for acting againſt the laws, or diſobeying their ſovereign; but for their part, they were accuſed by the people of executing the laws, of which they themſelves were the authors: that on the other hand, the king called them to an account for obeying his father's expreſs orders, a crime unheard-of, the puniſhment whereof would be apt to throw all his ſubjects into rebellion: that if they muſt be puniſhed for ſuch offences, he deſired it might not be divulged to foreign nations, leſt they ſhould infer, that the final diſſolution of the Engliſh government was approaching." To this it was briefly replied, "That he had ſpoke with great freedom; but his eloquence was fruitleſs and unſeaſonable: that they were not accuſed of executing the laws, or of obeying the king, but of ſtretching the laws beyond their due bounds, and exceeding the ſovereign's commiſſion, which accuſations they had reaſon to fear were too well proved." Then they were both committed to the Tower [h]. The king was reſolved to make them an example, in order to content the people, who were extremely incenſed againſt them. Thus their condemnation was reſolved on before their appearance, though it was not yet known on what to ground their proceſs. In any other country, an act of ſovereignty to ſend theſe two men to the gallows, would have been ſeen with joy. But it is not the ſame in England, where the greateſt criminals have privileges, of which they cannot be debarred, without giving the people occaſion to think, the court is forming deſigns againſt liberty. It was neceſſary therefore to ſearch for ſome expreſs law to condemn them. But upon examining the accuſation, already brought againſt them, great difficulties occurred. It appeared that though they were accuſed of numberleſs offences, nothing could be proved but their mercileſs execution of the laws. But notwithſtanding they had ſtretched theſe ſame laws as far as the words would bear, it could not be charged to them as a crime, ſince they had the king's warrant, in whom the execution of the laws is lodged. It is true, Henry VII. contrary to the cuſtom of his predeceſſors, had acted according to the utmoſt rigour of the ſtatutes. But he might do it, and if the former kings had done otherwiſe, it was more out of condeſcenſion than juſtice. Theſe two miniſters, therefore, could not be tried for obeying him. Beſides, to condemn them for executing their maſter's orders, was publicly to diſhonour that prince's memory, and renew the remembrance of his ſeverities upon his ſubjects. It was reſolved therefore to put them to death upon a falſe accuſation, of intending to withdraw their allegiance from the king ſince his acceſſion to the throne. It is evident, the accuſation was entirely groundleſs. For how could two perſons, ſo odious to the whole nation, and deprived of all credit by the death of Henry VII. think of ſuch a deſign, and ſtill leſs put it in execution [i]! Mean while, it was not ſcrupled to take away their lives for a forged crime, becauſe they were believed worthy of death, though not condemned by the letter of the law. Upon this frivolous accuſation, they were brought before their proper judges, and found guilty, whether falſe witneſſes were ſuborned againſt them, or by a mental reſervation, hitherto unknown in England in judgments of this nature. Dudley was tried at London the 16th of July, but Empſon was not condemned till the 14th of October at Northampton. Henry, either out of ſcruple, or ſome other motive, ſuſpended their execution till the next year [k].

Whilſt means were contriving to diſpatch theſe two miniſters, the king and the council had a much more important affair to take into conſideration. We have ſeen, in the former reign, prince Arthur's marriage with Catherine of Arragon: that prince's death without iſſue; the reaſons inducing king Henry VII. to deſire, that prince Henry, become his heir apparent, ſhould marry his brother's widow; the conſent of Ferdinand and Iſabella, father and [d] He bore that title upon marrying a daughter of William Herbet, earl of Huntingdon. He was natural ſon to Henry Beaufort, duke of Somerſet, killed at Henham. To theſe councellors the lord Herbert adds, ſir Thomas Lovel, maſter of the wards, and conſtable of the Tower, ſir Henry Wyat, ſir Henry Marney, afterwards (1532) lord Marney, ſir Thomas Darcy, afterwards (1511) lord Darcy. mother of the princeſs; and pope Julius's diſpenſation for the marriage. The true reaſon why Henry VII. propoſed this match was his unwillingneſs to reſtore the hundred thouſand crowns received in part of Catherine's dower. He was alſo afraid of loſing the other half, which remained to be paid. In ſhort, he foreſaw, that after the receipt of the whole, the princeſs his daughter in-law would indiſpenſably enjoy her ſettlements of the third part of the revenues of the principality of Wales, and the county of Cornwall. However, as it was not decent to urge ſuch a motive to the pope, to obtain a diſpenſation for ſo ſtrange a marriage, which could not but be deemed ſcandalous, it was pretended to be neceſſary to preſerve the peace between Henry VII. and the king and queen of Spain. That was the motive alledged to the pope, which he readily conſidered as ſufficient, though there was but too much reaſon to queſtion whether it was the true one.

In conſequence of the pope's diſpenſation, Henry and Catherine were ſolemnly affianced. Nevertheleſs, whether Henry VII. intended only to deceive Ferdinand, and get the remaining hundred thouſand crowns, or was moved by the remonſtrances of Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, concerning the marriage, he ſo ordered it, that the prince, his ſon, on the very day he was fourteen years of age, made in the preſence of certain witneſſes, a proteſtation in form againſt the conſent he had given. But the proteſtation was kept ſo ſecret, that it came not to the knowledge of the public till it was neceſſary, many years after, to divulge it. Upon the news of Henry VIIth's death, Ferdinand ſent to the earl of Fuenſalida, his embaſſador in England, a very ample power to renew the treaty of alliance made with the deceaſed king, ordering him withal, to demand the confirmation and execution of that which was concluded for Catherine's ſecond marriage with prince Henry, now become king of England.

The Spaniſh embaſſador having preſented a memorial upon this occaſion, it was deliberated in council whether the king ſhould conſummate the marriage with Catherine. The affair was debated with great attention. Againſt the marriage it was alledged, that for a man to marry his brother's widow was a thing unheard of among chriſtians: that ſuch a marriage was contrary to the law of God, and therefore it was a queſtion, whether the pope had power to diſpenſe with it. This was the archbiſhop of Canterbury's opinion, who could not forbear conſidering the marriage as really inceſtuous. But Richard Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, was of another mind. He ſtrenuouſly inſiſted upon the pope's diſpenſation, and the unlimited power of Chriſt's vicar. He affirmed, "That the pope's granting a diſpenſation, was a certain proof that he had the power, and was ſufficient to ſatisfy the king's conſcience: that no perſon upon earth could limit, or ſo much as inquire into the papal authority; and though ſuch a power ſhould be aſcribed to a general council, at leaſt the council of England could not pretend to it." To theſe arguments concerning conſcience, the biſhop added others drawn from reaſons of ſtate, and the king's particular intereſt. He ſaid, "That probably, the king would have, during the courſe of his reign, many diſputes with France, England's old enemy, and whether he would attack or only defend, the alliance with Spain was abſolutely neceſſary: that in ſending back the princeſs Catherine after having affianced her, he would affront king Ferdinand, which he would certainly revenge by leaguing with France, and ſuch a league could not but endanger England, or at leaſt be extremely expenſive to the nation: that moreover, if the king refuſed to conſummate his marriage with Catherine, he muſt reſolve either to reſtore her dower, or ſuffer her to enjoy her ſettlement: but by marrying her, he would ſave the hundred thouſand crowns received by the king his father, gain another hundred thouſand, which the king of Arragon was to pay, and avoid the great charge of marrying another princeſs, and conducting her into England. In fine, he enlarged upon the ſweet and virtuous temper of the princeſs of Wales, capable of making a huſband perfectly happy." Adding, "there was no room to doubt, that the princeſs was ſtill a virgin, ſince ſhe herſelf affirmed it, offering even to be tried by matrons, to ſhew ſhe ſpoke the truth."

All theſe arguments, except the firſt, concerning the diſpenſation, were very ſtrong. As to that, it was ſo dangerous for a churchman to diſpute the pope's authority, eſpecially ſuch a pope as Julius II. who was ſtill in his vigour, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury durſt not perſiſt openly in his opinion. So, the king cloſing with the biſhop of Wincheſter's and almoſt the whole council's ſentiments, it was reſolved he ſhould conſummate his marriage. But firſt he required of the princeſs that ſhe ſhould renounce by a ſolemn act her dower of two hundred thouſand crowns, and conſent that the ſum ſhould belong to the king her ſpouſe, to be claimed again neither by herſelf nor heirs, nor by king Ferdinand, her father, nor queen Joan, her ſiſter, nor any perſon living, on any pretence whatſoever. Two days after, the earl of Fuenſalida made the like renunciation in the name of king Ferdinand and queen Joan. Catherine's letters patent, wherein ſhe ſtyles herſelf only princeſs of Wales, bearing date June the 7th, it is evident, the king married her not on the third of that month, as hiſtorians affirm, nor ſooner than the day theſe letters were ſigned. The coronation was ſolemnized on the 24th of the ſame month, and five days after died Margaret counteſs of Richmond and Derby, the king's grandmother [l].

In the beginning of his reign, Henry willingly left to his council and miniſters the care and management of his affairs. As he was in peace with all his neighbours, what paſſed in the kingdom could not keep him much employed. He thought only of ſuch pleaſures and diverſions, as were more ſuitable to his years, than application to buſineſs. But as he was naturally liberal, his entertainments at court were very expenſive. The antient biſhop of Wincheſter, Henry VIIth's old miniſter, could not help murmuring to ſee the money laviſhed away without any neceſſity, which his deceaſed maſter had amaſſed with ſo much care, pains, and injuſtice, in which he had himſelf been employed. He threw all the blame upon the earl of Surrey, lord treaſurer, who was his rival in favour under the late king, and continued to be ſo ſtill under the preſent, by gaining the affection of his new maſter by a blind compliance to his will. During Henry VIIth's life he was more cloſe, and harder to part with money than the king himſelf. How expreſs ſoever the orders were for payments, he always found difficulties, and by that means made his court admirable to his maſter. Being continued in his poſt in the preſent reign, he became quite another man. He not only paid, without examination, whatever was ordered, but alſo put the king upon ſpending extravagantly. This gained him the favour of the young prince, who was naturally addicted to prodigality. The biſhop of Wincheſter openly blamed this conduct, as highly prejudicial to the king's intereſt. But he was little regarded in a court where every one was ſtriving to make an advantage of the ſovereign's liberal temper. Mean while, his diſcourſes exaſperated more and more the earl of Surrey and the young courtiers againſt him, who never ceaſed to do him ill offices with the king. Thus the biſhop, who was in ſo great credit in the late reign, gradually loſt it in this. His diſgrace, which ſat heavy upon his mind, threw him upon deviſing means to ſupplant his rival, by introducing at court Thomas Wolſey, whoſe qualifications he was no ſtranger to. Wolſey was a clergyman, already eminent for his merit, though he was but a butcher's ſon of Ipſwich. The biſhop of Wincheſter eaſily foreſaw, the king would ſoon be in want of perſons about him, fit and able to eaſe him; and as he knew Wolſey's genius, did not queſtion that when he was at court, he would render himſelf neceſſary to the king. To that end, he procured him the place of almoner. We ſhall ſee preſently that the biſhop was not miſtaken in his judgment, or rather that his foreſight was far ſhort of Wolſey's fortune [m].

About the middle of the year, the treaties concluded be-

[m] Thomas Wolſey was born at Ipſwich, in March 1471. He was ſent ſo early to Oxford, that he was batchelor of arts at fourteen years of age, and from thence called the boy bachelor. Soon after he was elected fellow of Magdalen college, and when maſter of arts, had the care of the ſchool adjoining to that college committed to him. Being charged with the education of the marquis of Dorſet's three ſons, his lordſhip preſented him to the rectory of Lymington, in Hampſhire, October the 10th, 1500. He had not long reſided at his living, before ſir Amias Pawlet, a juſtice of peace, put him in the ſtocks for being drunk (as is ſaid,) and raiſing diſturbances at a fair in the neighbourhood. By the recommendation of ſir John Nafant, he was made one of the king's chaplains. In 1506, he was inſtituted to the rectory of Bedgrave, in the dioceſe of Norwich; having then, beſides the Rectory of Lymington, the vicarage of Lyde, in Kent. Rymer's Fœd. tom. xiii. p. 217. Whilſt he was king's chaplain, he inſinuated himſelf into the favour of Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, and of ſir Thomas Lovel, who recommended him to the king as a fit perſon to be employed in negotiating the marriage between Henry VII. and Margaret ducheſs of Savoy. He was diſpatched to the emperor her father, and returned with ſuch ſpeed that the king ſeeing him, ſuppoſed he had not been gone. Having reported his embaſſy, he was made dean of Lincoln, February 8, 1508, and on the 20th of the ſame month, prebendary of Walton Brinbold, in that church. In theſe circumſtances he was when he was introduced at court by biſhop Fox, after Henry VIIth's death, where he ſoon found means to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of his ſon and ſucceſſor. tween Henry VII. and the king of Scotland, were confirmed or renewed by the biſhop of Murray, who was ſent into England to congratulate Henry upon his acceſſion to the crown.

The emperor Maximilian ſent alſo an embaſſy to Henry to congratulate him, and confirm the treaties made with Henry VII. in the year 1502.

Chriſtopher Bambridge, archbiſhop of York, being at Rome, where he was gone to have his election confirmed, received a commiſſion from the new king to act as his embaſſador. We ſhall ſee preſently the reaſon, why the pope wanted to have an Engliſh embaſſador reſide at his court, and why the king was deſirous to be particularly informed of what paſſed at Rome, and in all Italy.

Theſe were the moſt remarkable occurrences in England, during the firſt eight months of the reign of Henry VIII. They were for the moſt part domeſtic affairs of little importance, except the king's marriage, which was attended with very great conſequences. But there paſſed abroad matters of great moment, which became as it were the ſource of the troubles wherewith almoſt all Chriſtendom was agitated for above fifty years, and wherein England was but too much engaged. For ſome time, the affairs of Europe had began to have a new face, and what happened this year in Italy put them upon ſuch a footing, as obliged almoſt every ſovereign to be concerned therein. Henry VIII. unhappily entangled himſelf in the troubles of that country, which ſeem to have had no relation to him. This makes the knowledge of the affairs of Italy ſo abſolutely neceſſary, that without it neither the events of this reign can be underſtood, nor the king's character fully known. It will therefore be proper to enlarge upon this ſubject, which concerns not only the hiſtory of England, but alſo thoſe of France, Spain, Germany, Switzerland; the principal events whereof, for a long ſpace of time, flowed properly from the affairs of Italy. It is true, moſt of the authors who have wrote the hiſtories of the ſtates, ſuppoſed their readers to be acquainted with what paſſed in Italy at the ſame time. They have thereby much ſhortened their works, but withal rendered them very obſcure to thoſe who were not ſo fully inſtructed as they have ſuppoſed. For my part, I intend another courſe. Since the affairs of Italy are the foundation of moſt of the occurrences in Europe, and particularly in England, during almoſt one-half of the ſixteenth century, I think they ought to be ſpoken of ſomething largely, which alone can clear the particular hiſtories proceeding from thence. But to avoid tedious digreſſions, it is neceſſary to give firſt a diſtinct idea of the ſtate of Italy, as well as of the character and intereſts of the ſeveral princes.

I have already related, in the foregoing reign, how Lewis XII. aſſiſted by the Venetians, conquered the duchy of Milan upon Ludovico Sforza, pretending a right to it as grandſon to Valentini Viſconti, daughter of John Galeazzo I. duke of Milan. I have likewiſe had occaſion to ſpeak of the conqueſt of Naples by the united arms of Lewis XII. and Ferdinand, and of the means uſed by Ferdinand to remain ſole maſter of that kingdom. It will ſuffice therefore to add here, that though Lewis XII. loſt his portion of that conqueſt, he deſiſted not from his pretenſions, but was waiting for a favourable opportunity to aſſert them. I muſt now briefly ſpeak of the other ſtates of Italy, and firſt of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate.

Before the kings of France and Spain had ſet foot in Italy, the popes were as ſovereign arbiters of that country. But it was not ſo much by their temporal arms as their ſpiritual, of which they make frequent uſe. For ſome centuries paſt they had loſt great part of the demeſns formerly belonging to the church. About the end of the reign of Otho I. the eccleſiaſtical ſtate conſiſted of the city of Rome and its territory, with Tuſcany, the marquiſate of Ancona, the duchy of Spoleto, Ravenna, all La Romagna, and the whole country in general compriſed formerly under the exarchate [n]. But afterwards, during the wars of the Guelphs and Gibelins, the emperors wreſted from the popes all Tuſcany and ſeveral towns in other parts. Some of theſe towns had thought fit to withdraw their obedience from the church, and the popes themſelves had been forced to grant others in fee to lords who ſerved them, or from whom they expected aſſiſtance. At length, the emperor Rodolphus I. having ſold liberty to as many cities of Italy as would purchaſe it, there were ſeveral formerly belonging to the church that embraced the opportunity to ſhake off at the ſame time both the emperor's and the pope's yoke [o]. Hence there were quickly in Italy almoſt as many ſovereignties as cities. The ſtrongeſt ſubdued the weakeſt, and fell at laſt themſelves under the dominion, or rather the tyranny of ſome of their own citizens, who found means to ſeize the whole power. In this manner were formed in Italy ſeveral petty ſtates, out of the ruins of what the ancient kings of Italy, the emperors, and the popes had formerly poſſeſſed.

In the pontificate of Alexander VI. the eccleſiaſtical ſtate was reduced within narrower bounds than before, though the popes had preſerved the ſovereignty of ſeveral cities, of which they were no longer proprietors. Of this number, were Ravenna, Bologna, Ferrara, Urbino, Faenzo, Rimini, Pezzaro, Imola, Ceſenna, Peruſa. Notwithſtanding all theſe loſſes, they were ſtill very powerful, becauſe their ſpiritual arms gave them great advantages over their neighbours. Moreover, beſides the revenues of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, they had very conſiderable incomes from all Chriſtendom.

But when Lewis XII. took poſſeſſion of the duchy of Milan, and Ferdinand of the kingdom of Naples, the affairs of Italy had quite another face. Then the temporal power of the popes was nothing in compariſon to that of theſe two monarchs, who, beſides their dominions in Italy, had moreover at their command the forces of two large kingdoms. On the other hand, the Roman pontiffs met with much more oppoſition, when they had a mind to brandiſh their ſpiritual weapons, whoſe force was in proportion to the weakneſs of thoſe againſt whom they were darted. For that reaſon they ſought all ſorts of means to drive the foreigners out of Italy. But as they could not by their own ſtrength execute ſuch a deſign, they were forced to make uſe of one of theſe kings to deſtroy the other, in which their policy was often deceived. For they could not humble one without giving the other a ſuperiority more deſtructive of their intereſts than the equality which was between them before. This for many years was the occaſion of all the popes' intrigues, and withal an incumbrance they could never get clear of. Sometimes they joined with one to pull down the other; ſometimes ſetting them at variance, they remained ſpectators of the war; and ſometimes they called in foreigners to make the balance incline to the ſide they intended to favour. But whatever was the ſucceſs of theſe wars, the conqueror always became very formidable to the pope and all Italy. It is certain therefore that the conqueſt of Naples and Milan gave a mortal wound to the temporal power of the popes, and were alſo very prejudicial to their ſpiritual authority. As the popes from thence forward had frequent occaſions of quarrel with the kings of France, now become their neighbours, they ſometimes uſed their ſpiritual arms, but not with the ſame ſucceſs as formerly againſt the ſovereigns of Italy. As they had to deal with princes who did not eaſily bend, they only gave them occaſion to examine the grounds of the papal authority; and this inquiry was not to the advantage of the popes.

Beſides the intereſt of their ſee, the Roman pontiffs had alſo that of their family, of which they were no leſs mindful. Each of them ſeeking to raiſe his nephews or other relations, all the cities formerly belonging to the church were ſo many objects that inflamed their deſires. Alexander VI. who of all the popes his predeceſſors was the leaſt ſcrupulous, had formed the deſign of making Cæſar Borgia his baſtard a great prince, by erecting him a ſtate out of ſeveral cities of la Romagna, which ſtill owned the pope's ſovereignty, and were under his protection. To execute this deſign it was that Cæſar Borgia, either by fraud or force, became maſter of Peruſa, Urbino, Imola, Faenza, Rimini, Pezzaro, Ceſenna, under colour that the poſſeſſors had not been punctual in paying the tribute or annual relief to the holy ſee. But Alexander VI. dying before his ſon was well ſettled in his conqueſts, it happened, during the ſhort pontificate of Pius III. and the interval between his death and the election of Julius II. that the former owners of theſe cities found means to recover them. This was chiefly by the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, who for their pains kept Faenza and Rimini.

Julius II. who ſucceeded Pius III. formed for the houſe of la Rovere, of which he was, the ſame projects as Alexander VI. had formed for that of Borgia. He was no ſooner in the papal chair, but he began the execution of his deſigns with imperiouſly acquainting the Venetians, that his intention was to re-annex to the church whatever had been alienated, and therefore they muſt reſtore Faenza and Rimini. Upon their refuſal he demanded aid of the emperor Maximilian. This was properly the firſt riſe of the league of Cambray, mentioned in the foregoing reign, and of which I ſhall be obliged to ſpeak more fully hereafter.

The firſt exarch was under Juſtin the Young, in 567, after Beliſarius and Narſes had driven the barbarians out of Italy: the laſt was Eutychius, defeated by Aſtolphus, king of the Lombards, in 751. Pepin, king of France, turned him out of the exarchate, and made a preſent of it to the pope.

The ſenate of Venice had long paſſed for the wiſeſt and moſt politic aſſembly in the world. By their prudence and abilities they had by degrees formed in terra firma [p] a ſtate, which being ſupported by a very ſtrong naval force, was inferior to none in Italy. This ſtate conſiſted of Friuli, Treviſo, Verona, Vicenza, Padua, Bergamo, Breſcia, Crema, Cremona, Rovigo, and the whole Zoleſin, Ravenna, Faenza, Rimini. Moſt of theſe cities with their territories were formerly part of the kingdom of Italy. After that, they fell under the dominion of the German emperors, who governed them by their vicars. At length, either theſe vicars were become ſovereigns, or being expelled, the cities had recovered their liberty, to fall again afterwards under the tyranny of ſome private perſons, who had uſurped an abſolute power. Of theſe it was that the Venetians had acquired them either by money or arms. But however it be, when they had made theſe acquiſitions, it is certain, the authority of the emperors was ſeldom acknowledged. Mean while the emperors ſtill preſerved their pretenſions to all theſe cities, as having been formerly parts of the empire, or rather of the kingdom of Italy, enjoyed by ſome of their predeceſſors. Friuli was conquered upon the church of Aquileia, to whom it was preſented by Otho I. Ravenna, Faenza, Rimini, formerly belonged to the ſee of Rome. Rovigo and Poleſin were conquered upon the duke of Ferraro. Cremona and Gierradadda appertained to the duchy of Milan, having been reſigned by Lewis XII. Breſcia was taken from the dukes of Milan, and Crema freely given up by duke Francis Sforza. They had ſtill in the kingdom of Naples five maritime places, mortgaged to them by one of the kings.

Bologna [q] was a rich and powerful city, but not ſo conſiderable as formerly. Civil diſcords had at length compelled her upon certain terms to ſubmit to the church. After that, the city was governed by the pope's legates, ſent thither from time to time. But their dominion ſuffered frequent interruptions. The legates oppreſſing the people forced them often to ſhake off their yoke, and expel them the city. But it was only to fall again under the tyranny of the heads of faction, who, by their oppreſſions, forced them to have recourſe to the pope, and receive the legates again. This is what happened ſeveral times. In the year 1440, Hannibal Bentivoglio became ſo powerful, that he was little leſs than a ſovereign. From that time to 1506, ſome one of the family of Bentivoglio held the government, though the pope's legates were ſtill admitted and honoured, but without having any real power. At laſt Julius II. not content with this ſhadow of authority, demanded in 1506, aid of Lewis II. to make himſelf maſter of Bologna. Though France had hitherto protected the Bentivoglios, Lewis however ordered the governor of Milan to ſend the pope troops. Whereupon John Bentivoglio, head of that houſe, ſeeing himſelf forſaken by the king of France, quitted Bologna with all his family, and retired to Milan, leaving the city to the pope.

The duchy of Ferrara [r] was a fief of the church, long poſſeſſed by the family of Eſte, who were inveſted by the pope, and paid a yearly relief in money. This petty ſtate bordering upon the pope and the Venetians, and being very convenient for both, preſerved itſelf by their mutual jealouſy, but however, the Venetians had taken from them Rovigo and the Poleſin. But Julius II. had greater views, and thought ſeriouſly of annexing the whole duchy to the church.

Modena and Reggio were likewiſe under the dominion of the family of Eſte, not as belonging to the duchy of Ferrara, but as a diſtinct ſtate acquired by that family after being poſſeſſed of Ferrara. Julius II. had alſo pretenſions to theſe two cities, as having been formerly given to the church by Charles the Great, and perhaps on the ſole pretence that they belonged to the duke of Ferrara, his vaſſal.

Urbino [s] had formerly been of the church's demeſn. But the popes had not for many years challenged more than the right of ſovereignty. Cæſar Borgia had ſeized this city, and expelled duke Guidobaldi Ubaldini, who recovered it after the death of Alexander VI. As Guidobaldi had no children, Julius II. perſuaded him to adopt Francis Maria de la Rovere, nephew to both, ſon of the pope's brother and the duke's ſiſter. Shortly after, la Rovere became duke of Urbino, by the death of Guidobaldi, his adoptive father.

Parma and Placentia had been under the dominion of ſeveral lords or tyrants, till at laſt they became ſubject to the dukes of Milan. Lewis XII. took poſſeſſion of them after his conqueſt of the Milaneſe.

Florence, a very potent city, and the chief of Tuſcany, was fallen at length under the dominion of the family of Medicis. But afterwards an oppoſite faction prevailing, they were driven from thence, and were now in exile, attempting however from time to time to be reſtored to their country.

Piſa had been formerly a very conſiderable city by reaſon of her naval forces, but at lengeth becoming ſubject to the dukes of Milan, a baſtard of that family, to whom it was given, ſold it to the Florentines. The Piſani were againſt the ſale, and would have recovered their liberty, but were overcome. After that, Charles VIII. in his way to Naples, reſtored Piſa to her liberty; but as ſoon as the Florentines had nothing more to fear from him, they beſieged Piſa, though aſſiſted by the Venetians, and the ſiege was ſtill carrying on at the time of the league of Cambray.

The city of Genoa, after ſundry revolutions cauſed by the factions of the Fregoſſas and the Adornas, was at length fallen into the hands of the French, in the reign of Charles VIII. After that, Lewis XI. reſigned it to the duke of Milan, and Lewis XII. ſeized it after his conqueſt of the Milaneſe.

This ſurvey of the ſtates of Italy ſhews that it was then divided between ſix powers, namely, pope Julius II. Lewis XII. king of France and duke of Milan, Ferdinand king of Arragon and Naples, the republics of Venice and Florence, and the duke of Ferrara. To theſe ſix may be added, the emperor Maximilian, who without poſſeſſing a foot of land in Italy, had however pretenſions to whatever was formerly enjoyed by the emperors, and particularly to the firm land ſtate of the Venetians, whoſe ruin the other ſix were equally concerned to procure. The emperor pretended that all the Venetian dominions belonged to the empire; he paſſionately deſired to wreſt ſome place from them that would give him entrance into Italy, and an opportunity to re-eſtabliſh the imperial power in that country. Julius II. as I ſaid, had formed a project to annex to the church whatever had been alienated, and eſpecially the duchy of Ferrara and the towns of La Romagna. This deſign could be effected only by the deſtruction of the Venetians, ever attentive to oppoſe the growth of their neighbours. Beſides, the pope had a mind to begin with them, and wreſt from them Ravenna, Faenza, and Rimini. Lewis XII. repented of yielding to them Cremona and Gierradadda. He wanted to diſpoſſeſs them, and under that pretence to get poſſeſſion alſo of Crema, Bergamo, and Breſcia, and in general of whatever had belonged to the dukes of Milan. Ferdinand was deſirous to recover without money the five maritime towns of the kingdom of Naples, which had been mortgaged to them.

Moreover, his intereſt required that there ſhould be always troubles in Italy, to hinder Lewis XII. from thinking of the conqueſt of Naples. The duke of Ferrara wiſhed to recover Rovigo and the Poleſin. Laſtly, the Florentines, obſtinately bent upon the ſiege of Piſa, protected and defended by the Venitians, could deſire nothing more advantageous than to ſee that republick unable to aſſiſt the Piſani.

Such were the motives of the league formed againſt Venice, of which the pope, the emperor, and the king of France were the chief promoters. For the greater ſecrecy, they ſpread a report that the emperor, as guardian to Charles of Auſtria, his grandſon, had agreed that his differences with the duke of Gueldres ſhould be amicably adjuſted. To that purpoſe, the city of Cambray was appointed for the place of congreſs, whereby to intimate, that the affairs only of Flanders would be conſidered. Here the famous league againſt the republick of Venice was concluded; and the better to deceive the ſpies, was ſigned at firſt a treaty of perpetual peace between the pope, the emperor, Lewis XII. and Ferdinand, which was indeed made publick. But a ſecond treaty, which care was taken not to divulge, contained a league offenſive and defenſive againſt the Venetians, the principal articles whereof were theſe:

In the firſt place it was ſet forth in the preamble, that the Turks having began to make great progreſs in Europe, it was abſolutely neceſſary for the Chriſtian princes to join their forces againſt them, but that the Venetians by their continual incroachments greatly obſtructed this union. From thence it was concluded, that they were to be diſpoſſeſſed of what they had uſurped. This was the pious motive of the league. And therefore it was agreed, that of their ſpoils, the pope ſhould have Ravenna, Faenza, and Rimini; the emperor, Verona, Vicenza, and Padua, and as duke of Auſtria, Treviſo, and Friuli: Lewis XII. as duke of Milan, Cremona, Gierradadda, Breſcia, Crema, and Bergamo: the king of Arragon, Manfredonia, Trani, Monopoli, Brindiſi, and Otranto, in the kingdom of Naples: that the dukes of Ferrara and Savoy, and the marquis of Mantua, ſhould be admitted into the league if they deſired it; the firſt to recover Rovigo, and the Poleſin; the ſecond to get the kingdom of Cyprus out of the hands of the Venetians; and the third, to obtain ſatisfaction concerning certain pretenſions he had upon Venice. Laſtly, that all who had any claim upon the Venetians, ſhould be received into the league as principals, if they declared themſelves within three months. Thus, in order to wage war againſt the Turks, no other means were found than to ſtrip the Venetians of all their firm land ſtate, and leave them only the ſingle city of Venice.

To accompliſh this deſign, it was agreed, that the king of France in perſon ſhould enter the territories of the Venetians, the firſt of April, in the year 1509, with an army of forty thouſand men: that the pope ſhould ſend an army into la Romagna, and Ferdinand have another in Lombardy, with a fleet in the gulf, and the emperor attack the Venetians from the ſide of Germany. But as he had lately made a three years truce with them, an admirable expedient was deviſed to furniſh him with a pretence to break it, which was, that the pope ſhould ſummon him as the church's advocate, to come and defend the patrimony. In fine, Julius II. engaged to thunder out all the eccleſiaſtical cenſures againſt Venice. This league was ſigned at Cambray, December 10th, 1508.

The time of executing the projects of the league being come, Lewis XII. departed from Milan the beginning of April 1509, at the head of forty thouſand men, whilſt the pope's army entered la Romagna, under the conduct of Francis Maria de la Rovere, duke of Urbino, and Raymond of Cardona, threw himſelf into Lombardy, with the king of Arragon's troops. At the ſame time, the duke of Ferrara, took the field in the Poleſin. But the emperor contented himſelf with ſtaying at Trent, and ſeeing the reſt of the allies act, in order to be ready to reap the fruits of their labours. Mean while the Venetians, having firſt provided their towns with ammunition, raiſed an army, under the command of count Pitigliano their general, whoſe lieutenant was Barthelein d'Alviano.

The van of the French army commanded by Chaumont, paſſed the Adda, the 15th of April, and at the ſame time the pope excommunicated the Venetians, and put the city of Venice under an interdict. On the 14th of May, was fought the battle of Gierradadda or Agnadel [t], between the French and Venetians, contrary to the opinion of Pitigliano, though general in chief of the Venetians, and to all reaſon. For the Venetians having no refuge but their army, it was by no means proper to hazard a battle. But the heat of Alviano, prevailed over his general's prudence. The Venetian army was entirely routed, and Alviano taken priſoner. Whereupon the Venetians being no longer able to reſiſt their enemies, Lewis, in leſs than a fortnight, became maſter of Cremona, Peſchiera, Crema, Breſcia, Bergamo, and of all the places in general, formerly belonging to the Milaneſe. Moreover, Vicenza, Verona, and Padua, ſent him their keys. But as by the treaty of Cambray, theſe places were in the emperor's diviſion, he ſent their deputies to him. Maximilian was then at Trent, expecting the ſucceſs of the confederate arms. Upon the arrival of the deputies, he ordered his troops to advance towards the ſtate of Venice, and as theſe cities freely opened their gates, he had nothing to do but to garriſon them. Treviſo alone refuſed him admittance, and remained firm to the Venetians, though reduced to the laſt extremity. Friuli and the towns of Iſtria followed the ſtream, and ſubmitted to the emperor. On the other hand, the duke of Urbino, with the pope's army, took Ravenna, Cervia, Faenza, Rimini, whilſt the duke of Ferrara became maſter of Rovigo, and the marquis of Mantua of ſome caſtles which were convenient for him. Thus, in a moment, the Venetians ſaw all their dominions reduced to the ſingle city of Venice, with five places in the kingdom of Naples, which could not be of much ſervice to them. Mean while, they were not entirely diſcouraged amidſt ſo many calamities, though the ſenate and people were under the greateſt conſternation. Their chief care was to re-aſſemble their ſcattered troops, and uſe their endeavours to break ſo deſtructive a league.

The misfortune befallen the Venetians occaſioned the loſs of Piſa. This city deſpairing of being relieved by Venice, or the king of France, who had deſerted her at laſt, ſurrendered to the Florentines, after having endured a long ſiege.

Lewis XII. having compaſſed his ends, returned into France, after he had detached a body of his troops, under the command of la Paliſſe, to join the emperor, who probably had not men enough to ſupply his garriſons, and to keep an army in the field againſt the Venetians, who were drawing together again. Upon the king of France's departure, affairs began to have a new face. The Venetians took Padua by ſurpriſe, and kept it ever after. Moreover they found means to ſend into Friuli, an army which employed the greateſt part of the emperor's troops. In ſhort, they appeaſed the pope by their humble ſubmiſſion, and obtained his poſitive promiſe to give them abſolution, and take off the interdict upon certain conditions, which they could not refuſe him. On the other hand, Ferdinand, who had not yet reaped any benefit by the league, was eaſily gained by the offer of the five cities held by the Venetians, in the kingdom of Naples.

Whilſt the ſenate was labouring to draw off the pope and the king of Arragon from the league, Maximilian with his own and la Paliſſe's forces, laid ſiege to Padua, but after an unſucceſsful aſſault, raiſed it and retired into Germany. At the ſame time the French general alſo returned to Milan. By which means the Venetians had time to breathe a little, and continue with the pope negotiations, which made them hope the event of the war would not be ſo fatal as they had hitherto apprehended.

The union of the king of France with the emperor, made Julius II. extremely uneaſy. He beheld the French king ſo firmly ſettled in the duchy of Milan, that it ſeemed impoſſible to diſlodge him. On the other hand, the emperor could not but be formidable to him, ſince he had an entrance into Italy, by means of Verona and Vicenza. He did not know what to think of the powerful aid lent that prince by Lewis XII. to complete the ruin of the Venetians, and he was not without fear, that theſe two monarchs had made a private treaty together to ſhare all Italy. Mean while, he hardly ſaw how theſe two formidable potentates could well be oppoſed. Venice was reduced to nothing. The Florentines were drained by the long Piſan war. As for the king of Arragon, it was almoſt impoſſible to treat with him, without being liable to be deceived. He knew how to improve all the treaties, and ſcrupled not to forſake his allies, when it was for his intereſt. Notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties, the pope formed the project of putting the affairs of Italy upon another footing, in order to execute his firſt deſigns. He reſolved therefore to agree and league with the Venetians, to take off Ferdinand from the league of Cambray, by inveſting him with Naples, to uſe his endeavours to ſet the emperor and the king of France at variance; to bring a Swiſs army into the Milaneſe: in fine, to perſuade the new king of England to make a diverſion in France. Theſe were the pope's projects, the ſucceſs whereof we ſhall ſee hereafter. He began with making a peace with the Venetians upon three conditions. Firſt, that they ſhould deſiſt from all their pretenſions to the cities of La Romagna, lately taken from them. Secondly, that they ſhould renounce the right of placing in Ferrara, a certain magiſtrate, called Biſdomina. Thirdly, that they ſhould leave the navigation of the gulf free to all the ſubjects of the church. In the preſent circumſtances of Venice, there were no other conditions to be inpoſed upon her.

After ſo long a digreſſion concerning the affairs of Italy, which however is not uſeleſs, as will appear in the ſequel, we muſt return to the affairs of England.

[1510] The parliament being aſſembled the 21ſt of January, the commons repreſented to the king, that certain ſtatutes made in the former parliaments, had given occaſion to the king his father's miniſters, to oppreſs the people, by putting forced interpretations upon them, contrary to the natural meaning of the words: that therefore it was neceſſary to ſoften, or ſo explain them, as to prevent ſuch abuſes for the future [u]. Henry readily agreed to what was propoſed by the commons, not only becauſe the thing was juſt in itſelf, but chiefly because it naturally led to his design of having Empson and Dudley attained by the parliament. Though these men had been already condemned by their proper judges, the king had deferred the execution of the sentence. He could not help having some scruple, for causing them to be accused of a crime of which he knew them not to be guilty. Nevertheless he wanted to sacrifice them to the people, without incurring the imputation of a false accusation, and withal to vindicate his father's memory, by intimating, that they had exceeded his orders. To reconcile these two things, he so managed it, that the parliament, passed an act of attainder against them; that is, they were condemned to die by the authority of the king and parliament, without any particular mention of the crimes they had incurred, or of the proofs upon which their sentence was founded. This method, which till then had been seldom practised, was but too frequently used in the sequel of this reign, so dangerous is it to establish such precedents. Mean while, Henry having still some difficulty to overcome his scruples, delayed their execution till the following August [w].

Whilst the parliament was thus employed, Lewis XII. sent embassadors to England, to renew with the king the treaties made with Henry VII. As by the peace of Estaples, after the death of one of the two kings of France or England, his successor was to signify to the survivor, whether he would continue the alliance, it was Henry's business to inform Lewis XII. of his intention. However, he had done nothing towards it. But as he was a lively young prince, and abounding in riches, Lewis thought doubtless it would be proper to prevent him, for fear he might engage in designs destructive of the welfare of France. His embassadors therefore concluded with Henry a new treaty of alliance, wherein the former treaties were not mentioned. By this it was agreed, that the peace between the two kings should last till the death of the shortest liver: that it should be confirmed by the states-general of France, and the parliament of England: that each of the two kings should take care to obtain the pope's approbation, with a previous sentence of excommunication against the first violator.

There was nothing said in the new treaty of the 745,000 crowns that Charles VIII. had promised to pay to Henry VII. or his successors, and for which Lewis XII. himself was engaged by a subsequent treaty, because the business was only to renew the peace between the two present kings. However Henry forgot not to secure the debt, by requiring of Lewis letters patent, wherein he promised to pay the arrears by twenty-five thousand livres every six months, till the whole was discharged. After which the peace was ratified and sworn by both the kings.

Julius II. was meditating great designs against Lewis XII. The success of the league of Cambray, though he had turned it to his advantage, made him very uneasy. He saw the French more firmly settled in Italy than ever, and Lewis XII. better able to protect the duke of Ferrara. To accomplish his projects against France, he doubtless wanted assistance; and to that end, tried to excite all the states of Europe against that kingdom, as will be seen presently. So, to insinuate himself into the king of England's favour, he sent him this year the golden rose, which the popes, after solemnly consecrating it, were wont to present to some prince [x]. Probably also, the king of Arragon, in concert with the pope, began now to take measures to engage Henry, his son-in-law, in a league against France.

The success of the last campaign made the king of Arragon no less uneasy than the pope. He was sensible, Lewis never loved him, nor had any reason to love him, and saw this enemy, since the ruin of the Venetians, in a condition to disturb him in the possession of Naples. On the other hand, the league of Cambray could not procure him any further advantages, whereas the offers made him to leave it were very considerable. The Venetians agreed to restore him the cities they possessed in the kingdom of Naples and the pope was willing to depart from his claim of forty thousand crowns, and give him the investiture of that kingdom for a Spanish genet only. This was sufficient to induce him to break his engagements at Cambray. In all appearance, ever since the end of the last year, he had taken measures with the pope to form a new league against France. But as he never acted openly, he desired these measures to be kept private, in order to attack Lewis the more irresistibly. To that purpose, on the 6th of January this year 1510, he commissioned Lewis de Caroz, of Villaragud, his embassador at London, to treat with Henry VIII. about a stricter alliance than had been concluded between the crowns of England and Spain.

Whether Henry could not so soon resolve to conclude this new alliance with Ferdinand, or was willing first to finish his affairs with Lewis XII. it was not till the 24th of May, that the new treaty was signed. It was only a defensive alliance between the two kings, with a promise of mutual aid upon occasion. But Ferdinand, who had his views, caused these words to be inserted: that in case one of the two kings was attacked by any prince whatsoever, the other should be obliged to proclaim and wage war against the aggressor, though he should be his ally: that if one was attacked by the king of France, the other should be obliged to go against him in person with a powerful army. This treaty secured to Ferdinand the kingdom of Naples, because if Lewis XII. had intended to undertake the conquest, the diversion he would have been threatened with from England would have infallibly kept him from his purpose. But it is hard to conceive what advantage Henry could reap from such a treaty, since it was not likely, Lewis designed to attack him; so that all the advantage was on Ferdinand's side. It must be either that Henry's ministers were not very clear-sighted, or he, from a motive of generosity for a father-in-law, whom he did not yet sufficiently know, was imprudently persuaded to this proceeding, the more strange, as he had lately renewed the peace with France.

But it must not be thought that Henry was then a complete politician. He was still young, and minded his diversions more than the public affairs. There was nothing every day but tournaments, balls, entertainments, concerts of music, which consumed by degrees the eighteen hundred thousand pounds sterling, found in the king his father's coffers [y]. He used likewise to play at tennis and dice with certain strangers, who cheated him of this money, which he discovered at last, and though a little too late, shamefully chased them from court. He was so passionately fond of music, that it devoured great part of his time; which, added to the hours he spent in his studies and other diversions, left him but little leisure to apply himself to the affairs of the government, the management whereof he willingly left to his ministers. And therefore it may be affirmed, that in matters of policy, never prince committed grosser faults, or was more imposed upon than himself, especially in the first years of his reign.

Whilst Henry was wholly addicted to his pleasures, there was a person gradually rising at court, who was one day to have an absolute power over him, and to manage all his affairs, as well foreign as domestic. I mean Thomas Wolsey, who was made the king's almoner last year, and in the beginning of this dean of Lincoln [z]. It appears in the collection of the publick acts, that on the 30th of January, the king gave him a house in London [a], formerly Empson's, no inconsiderable present, since the patent mentions thirteen gardens belonging thereto. We must now return to the

It was therefore now enacted, that upon a request made to a coroner, to come and enquire upon the view of any person slain, drowned or otherwise dead by misadventure, the said coroner diligently shall do his office upon the view of the body of every such person or persons, without taking any thing for it, upon pain, to every coroner that will not endeavour himself to do his office, or that taketh any thing for the doing of it, for every time, to forfeit forty shillings. [z] Burnet says, he not only served the king in all his secret pleasures, but was lewd and vicious himself; so that his having the French-pox (which in those days was a matter of great infamy) was so public, that it was brought against him in parliament when he fell into disgrace. He had also the art of attaching so effectually those in his interests, in whose company the king did most delight, that they were always ready to forward his views. Being of a gay, facetious, and open temper, he would divert himself with them in such exercises (says Polydore Virgil) as were most agreeable to the levity and passions of youth, and which did not perfectly suit with the character of a dean in the church. He would descend to sing, laugh, rally, and even dance with them, as if for the time he had quite laid aside that severity of behaviour which became his station. Hist. Ref. vol. I. p. 8.

Or

affairs of Italy which will afford us matter for ſeveral years.

Julius II. had two grand deſigns in his head. The firſt was to ſeize the duchy of Ferrara: the ſecond, to expel the French and Germans out of Italy. His forces alone not being capable to execute theſe projects, it was neceſſary to uſe the aſſiſtance of ſome other princes, and try to engage them in his deſigns. His ſcheme was to league with the Venetians; to take off Ferdinand and Maximilian from the intereſts of France; to break the league of Cambray, to perſuade the king of England to make a diverſion in France; to excite the Switzers to invade the duchy of Milan. He executed all theſe projects, but not without encountering ſuch difficulties as would have diſcouraged any man leſs reſolute than himſelf. Firſt, he made a private league with the Venetians, after which, he ſolemnly gave them abſolution the 24th of January. Then, he ſecretely agreed with Ferdinand, by promiſing him the inveſtiture of Naples. That done, he quarrelled with Lewis XII. by filling a biſhoprick in Provence, without aſking his conſent, contrary to his own promiſe. Lewis complained of it, the pope denied he had promiſed any ſuch thing; and in ſhort, they came at laſt to give one another the lie in form. This was preciſely what the pope wanted, in order to have cauſe to break with him.

His league with the Venetians being publickly known, he imperiouſly commanded the duke of Ferrara to renounce the league of Cambray, and join his arms with thoſe of the church. The duke not believing his being vaſſal to the holy ſee, obliged him to be thus blindly devoted to all the pope's humours, refuſed to break his alliance with France and ſo gave his holineſs the pretence he had long been ſeeking. When the duke offered to pay him the tribute due to the church for the fief of Ferrara, the pope refuſed it, plainly intimating by that refuſal, he intended to confiſcate the duchy.

Mean while, Ferdinand was privately acting with Henry VIII. his ſon-in-law, to draw him into the pope's intereſt, which was become his own, in conſequence of the projects they had formed in common. But his practices were ſo ſecret, that Lewis XII. never miſtruſted him. On the contrary, he entirely confided in the aſſurances given by his embaſſador, that his deſign was to continue firmly attached to the league of Cambray.

On the other hand Julius II. gained the biſhop of Sion [b], who, having credit among the Switzers, found means to ſet them at variance with France, by purſuading them to demand an augmentation of their penſions. Their alliance with that crown being about to expire, they required to renew it, that their penſions ſhould be increaſed. Lewis refuſing it, the biſhop of Sion effectually uſed that refuſal to ſtir them up againſt France, to which the king himſelf alſo contributed, by making an alliance with the Griſons. He thereby ſo provoked the Switzers, that in a diet at Lucerne, they declared for the pope, and reſolved to ſend an army into the duchy of Milan.

In fine, the pope forgot nothing that he thought capable of perſuading the Venetians to agree with the emperor at any rate, even to the adviſing them to deliver him Treviſo and Padua. He intimated to them, that the moſt effectual means to drive the French out of the Milaneſe, was to diſengage the emperor from their intereſts, and when once they were out of Italy, it would be eaſy to wreſt from the emperor not only Treviſo and Padua, but all his other conqueſts too. But the Venetians durſt not run ſuch a hazard.

Such were the vaſt projects of the pope. He was ſo private in his negotiations, that Lewis XII. imagining he had no other deſign than to ſeize Ferrara, contented himſelf with ordering Chaumont, governor of Milan, to aid the duke in caſe he was attacked. But ſhortly after, a Venetian fleet and papal army commanded by Fabricius Colonna, attempting, though unſucceſsfully, to ſurprize Genoa, Lewis had but too much reaſon to ſuſpect there was ſome grand deſign formed againſt him, and therefore, ſent Chaumont orders to have an eye to the pope's proceeding.

Theſe orders came to Milan very ſeaſonably. Julius II. really intended to beſiege Ferrara, and for that purpoſe was come to Bologna, till an army, prepared on ſome pretence by Raymond, of Cardona, at Naples, was ready to join his and the Venetian troops. But Chaumont did not allow him time to execute his projects. Hearing the pope was arrived at Bologna, he departed from Milan at the head of an army, and made ſuch ſpeed that he would have ſurpriſed the pope there, had he not ſuffered himſelf to be amuſed with parleys. Whilſt he was treating with the pope's envoys, ſome Venetian troops in the neighbourhood entering the city, ſecured it from the danger of being inſulted. Whereupon Chaumont, being wholly unprepared for ſo important a ſiege, was obliged to retire.

Julius II. made great noiſe at this inſult of the French, and filled all Europe, and particularly the court of England, with his clamours. He excommunicated all the generals of the French army, and preſently after, his and the Venetians gallies made a ſecond attempt upon Genoa, but with no better ſucceſs than before.

At the ſame time, twelve thouſand Switzers began their march in order to enter the Milaneſe, under the conduct of the biſhop of Sion. But he found the paſſages ſo well guarded, that they deſpaired of ſucceeding in their deſign. So, not receiving beſides from the pope the money promiſed them, they returned into their own country.

War being thus proclaimed between Lewis XII. and the pope, Lewis thought himſelf under no farther reſtraint. He had done his utmoſt to be reconciled with him, even to the offering to abandon the duke of Ferrara. But the pope, depending upon Ferdinand, and expecting great matters from England, had evaded all his propoſals. Wherefore, to ſtop the fury of this impetuous old man, Lewis made a new league with the emperor, promiſing to put him in poſſeſſion of all Italy, except Genoa and Florence. Maximilian had the good fortune, that in all his leagues he had always great advantages, though he contributed the leaſt. On this occaſion, Lewis XII. could hardly proceed without him, becauſe it was abſolutely neceſſary to continue the war in the ſtate of Venice, otherwiſe the Venetians would have been able to give the pope too great an aſſiſtance. The league being concluded at Blois in Auguſt, Lewis called a ſynod at Tours, to conſult how he ought to behave to the pope. The ſynod were of opinion, that the king ſhould once more offer the pope a reaſonable agreement, and in caſe of refuſal, might with ſafe conſcience wage even an offenſive war with him. Lewis wanted no more to juſtify his intended proceedings. Preſently after, he concluded with Maximilian a new treaty, whereby they agreed to cauſe a general council to be ſummoned to Piſa, to depoſe Julius II. To that end, they gained nine cardinals, who readily undertook to call the council in their own name. Some of theſe cardinals were now with the pope, but found means to leave him under divers pretences, and when he would have recalled them, refuſed to obey.

Such was the ſituation of the affairs of Italy during the year 1510. I have ſaid nothing of the events of the war which continued all the while between the emperor, aſſiſted by the French king, and the Venetians, becauſe theſe particulars are of little ſervice to this hiſtory. It will ſuffice to obſerve, that Chaumont ſeeing Genoa and Milan in danger, had withdrawn the French troops from the emperor's army to keep them at Milan. The departure of theſe troops gave the Venetians ſome reſpite, who thereby were enabled to repair ſome loſſes ſuſtained in the beginning of the campaign, and to aſſiſt the pope who ſtill deſigned to beſiege Ferrara.

Chaumont's attempt to ſurpriſe the pope in Bologna, afforded Raymond of Cardona, viceroy of Naples, a pretence to march to the relief of his holineſs. The pope's troops and the Venetians were in December joined by the Spaniſh army near Midena, which Fabricius Colonna had taken in his return from his Genoa expedition. Though the ſeaſon was not very proper to enter upon action, the pope was abſolutely bent to beſiege Mirandola. That town belonged to the heirs of Joannes Picus of Miranda, with whom he had no quarrel. But as it lay convenient to favour the ſiege of Ferrara, he would not leave it in his rear, but ordered it to be vigorouſly attacked. In ſpite of his age, and the rigour of the ſeaſon, he came himſelf to the ſiege to animate the troops by his preſence, and the town ſurrendering at laſt on the 20th of January, was pleaſed to enter through the breach.

Lewis XII. complained to Ferdinand of his aſſiſting the pope. But Ferdinand calling that a trifle, replied, that as vaſſal of the holy ſee he could not help defending his holineſs's perſon and ſtate: that beſides he was not concerned in the quarrels of the pope and the king of France, but his intention was to keep to the articles of the league of Cambray.

Hitherto Henry does not ſeem to be concerned with the affairs of Italy, though the pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians had formed a deſign to engage him therein. He peaceably led a life of pleaſure, without much regarding what paſſed abroad. On the firſt of January 1511, he had the ſatisfaction to ſee his queen delivered of a prince, at whoſe birth there was great rejoicing over all the kingdom. But the joy laſted not long, ſince the young prince died before the end of February [c].

[b] Or Valais, lying between Switzerland, the Milaneſe, the valley of Aoſt, and Savoy.

He

Mean while, Ferdinand was ſeeking means to engage Henry in the league he intended to make with the pope againſt France. Henry was rich and powerful, and conſequently his acceſſion to the league would be of great weight, and extremely incommode France. On the other hand, his youth and ſmall experience made his father-in-law hope, it would not be impracticable to engage him by degrees, into projects which a king of England ought not to concern himſelf with. It is certain, Ferdinand was now in agreement with the pope. All his proceedings render it ſo evident that it cannot be doubted. However, he uſed a profound diſſimulation in this reſpect. He feigned to intend only the peace of Europe, that all the princes of Chriſtendom might join together in a war againſt the infidels. But as he wanted an army and fleet to execute his deſigns, he pretended to have very much at heart the continuance of the war he had undertaken againſt the Moors. He had ſent laſt year upon the coaſts of Africa a fleet commanded by Peter of Navarre. Shortly after, he re-enforced it with ſome troops under the conduct of a ſon of the duke of Alva, who attempting to land at Gelves, was ſlain, and all his men cut in pieces. Ferdinand made uſe of this ill ſucceſs to recover his preparations againſt France. Under colour of being revenged on the Moors, he aſſembled an army and equipped a fleet, which he pretended to ſend into Africa, but was however deſigned for Italy. As it was not yet time to diſcover his intentions, he carried his diſſimulation ſo far, as to demand of the king his ſon-in-law a thouſand Engliſh archers to ſerve in the preſent expedition. Weak aid! to be ſent for ſo far, and at ſo great an expence, if he had really intended to uſe them. Henry not perceiving his deſigns readily complied with his requeſt, and appointed ſir Thomas Darcy, on whom, at the ſame time, he conferred the title of baron [d], to command that ſmall body [e]. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, Ferdinand's letter of thanks to Henry [f] for this aid, and for his advice not to hazard his perſon in the undertaking: advice, continued he, that he could not follow, becauſe religion was concerned. And yet it ſoon appeared he had never intended any ſuch thing, ſince he employed againſt France the very forces which ſeemed to be deſigned againſt the Moors [g].

Nothing more was wanting to conclude the projected league againſt Lewis XII. but to gain the king of England. This was ſtrenuouſly endeavoured during the beginning of the year 1511. The Venetians ſent him an embaſſador under colour of thanking him for his care to reconcile them to the pope, deſiring him withal, in their credentials dated the 2d of March, to give credit to what their embaſſador ſhould impart to him, which could relate only to the intended league. About the ſame time it was that the pope conferred the dignity of cardinal upon Chriſtopher Bambridge archbiſhop of York, and embaſſador at Rome, in a promotion the 11th of March at Ravenna. All the hiſtorians unanimouſly affirm Bambridge was made cardinal purely for labouring to ſet Henry at variance with France. Matthew Skinner biſhop of Sion was promoted to the ſame honour for his paſt and future ſervices of the like nature. In thoſe days, it was neither learning nor virtue that raiſed clergymen to the cardinalate, but ſolely their abilities in temporal affairs, joined to an entire ſubmiſſion to the pope.

The endeavours that were uſed to engage Henry in the Italian league, had at length the expected ſucceſs. In all appearance, it was repreſented to him that he was highly concerned to oppoſe the progreſs of the king of France, who was already become too powerful by the conqueſt of the duchy of Milan, and the ruin of the Venetians. However this be, it appears that about the middle of the year Henry was now determined to follow the ſuggeſtions of the pope and Ferdinand. For in June he appointed commiſſioners to take care that the militia of the kingdom were provided with good arms, and ready to ſerve upon the firſt notice, which it was not cuſtomary to order, but when a war was foreſeen. The reaſon alledged by the king for theſe orders, plainly ſhew what was his deſign. He ſaid, though the kingdom was in perfect tranquillity, nevertheleſs as the arms were commonly ſuffered to ruſt in time of peace, he wiſhed that his ſubjects would be in a readineſs to ſerve him as well againſt invaſions, if any were intended, as in defence of his allies. Theſe laſt words could reſpect only the pope, the king of Arragon, and the Venetians, from whence it may be inferred, that the king had now given his word. But the ſequel will ſhew it ſtill more clearly.

The ancient and ſtrict union between France and Scotland gave Henry juſt cauſe to fear, that at ſoon as the war with France was begun, the king of Scotland as ally of Lewis XII. would interpoſe in the quarrel. And therefore, to remove all pretence of rupture, he took care to appoint commiſſioners [h] with power to repair all the outrages committed ſince the late peace. But his precautions proved ineffectual. An accident this year afforded the king of Scotland that pretence of breach which Henry would have prevented.

Andrew Breton a Scotch merchant, complaining to the king of Scotland that the Portugueſe had killed his father and ſeized his ſhip, the king gave him letters of marque, after having in vain ſought redreſs from the court of Portugal. Whereupon, Breton equipped two ſtout ſhips, and found means to make himſelf ample amends for his loſſes, by falling upon the Portugal ſhips trading to Flanders and England. The Portugal embaſſador reſiding at London, complained to the council, and repreſented that ſince the king of England pretended to the ſovereignty of the narrow ſeas, it was but reaſonable he ſhould protect the foreign ſhips that came into the channel. Upon this complaint, the king equipped two large men of war, and appointed the two ſons of the earl of Surrey [i] to command them, with orders to take the Scotch pirate. Theſe two lords watched him ſo narrowly that they met with him at laſt, as he was returning from Flanders to Scotland. Breton fought deſperately, but was killed in the fight, and his two ſhips taken and brought into England [k]. The king of Scotland hearing of this, ſent and demanded the two ſhips, with ſpeedy reparation for the outrage committed againſt the peace. The embaſſadors were told that pirates were not included in the peace, and that to puniſh ſuch people according to their deſerts was no breach of treaty. Probably, Breton had made himſelf more than amends for the damage he had ſuſtained, as it too frequently happens on ſuch occaſions. But however, king James not being able to obtain any thing from the court of England, proteſted againſt the injuſtice, being determined to reſent it the firſt opportunity.

I left Julius II. after the taking of Mirandola, bent upon the ſiege of Ferrara, and only waiting the return of good weather. Though Lewis XII. was in part ignorant of what paſſed in Spain and England, he knew however enough not to doubt that the pope was endeavouring to raiſe him enemies on all ſides. He was even ſatisfied, that though he ſeemed to have no other deſign than to become maſter of Ferrara, yet that was only the firſt ſtep to ſome greater project. Mean-while, he was very much embarraſſed. He had properly nothing to gain upon the pope, unleſs he would ſeize the church's patrimony. But he had a great deal to loſe, beſides the troubles which the obſtinate and haughty temper of the pope might create him. Wherefore he reſolved to try all poſſible ways to be reconciled with him. To that end, whilſt the pope was employed in the ſiege of Mirandola, he made him ſome overtures by Chaumont, but it was to no purpoſe. The pope would hearken to nothing, and continued the ſiege till he forced the town to capitulate. at laſt, Lewis ſeeing there was no hopes of a reconciliation, ordered Chaumont to regard him no longer, and at any rate to ſupport the duke of Ferrara. In theſe orders, takes the field in the midſt of winter. His army, joined by the duke of Ferrara, was not ſo numerous as the forces of the pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians, but compoſed of ſo good troops, that the allies durſt never hazard a battle, though it was offered them more than once. Mean while, the pope was greatly perplexed. Inſtead of quietly preparing for the ſiege of Ferrara, he was forced to keep the field during the winter, without knowing even how to ſave Modena, which was in danger of a ſiege. Ferdinand, who foreſaw what trouble that place would give the pope, had adviſed him to reſign it to the emperor. Nay, that affair had been negotiated, but without ſucceſs, becauſe Maximilian would receive it only as a place held of the empire, to which the pope would not conſent. At laſt, upon Chaumont's approach to beſiege it, the pope was willing to deliver it as the emperor deſired, becauſe it was not to be ſaved without venturing a battle. The terms of the bargain are not preciſely known. But from thenceforward all the emperor's proceedings gave occaſion to ſuſpect, Modena was acquired upon conditions very prejudicial to the king of France, his ally.

The king of Arragon pretended to be in alliance with France. He would not declare againſt her till he had ſecured the king of England, with whom he was privately negotiating a treaty which required a long diſcuſſion. Indeed, his troops which were to ſerve the pope but three months, according to the terms of the inveſtiture of Naples, were ſtill joined with thoſe of the allies. But he pretended, the viceroy of Naples acted contrary to his orders, in remaining in the pope's army longer than he was commanded. Mean while, the army was preſſed by Chaumont and the duke of Ferrara, who followed them cloſe, and endeavoured to provoke them to a battle. So, to gain time, Ferdinand, who would ſtill paſs for a neutral prince, and well affected to the repoſe of Italy, propoſed a congreſs at Mantua for a peace. The pope immediately accepted the overture. The emperor agreed to it likewiſe, and Lewis XII. durſt not reject it, leſt he ſhould be charged with being the ſole author of the troubles of Italy. It is certain, if, in this juncture, inſtead of ſuffering himſelf to be amuſed by a negotiation, the ſole aim whereof was to rob him of the opportunity of puſhing his enemies, he had ordered his troops to advance, he would have over-run the whole eccleſiaſtical ſtate; with ſo great a terror had his arms inſpired the allies. But he had to manage his ſubjects as well as his queen, who conſidered a war with the head of the church as a crime, though there was but too much provocation. He had himſelf likewiſe ſcruples upon that account, which he could not eaſily ſurmount. But however, he was willing to try once more, whether the propoſed congreſs of Mantua would produce ſome good effect. He hoped at leaſt, that the breaking off the negotiation, in caſe it was not ſucceſsful, would fully juſtify him. The congreſs produced the effect expected by the allies, that is, it cauſed the French to loſe a great deal of time to no purpoſe.

A few days before the congreſs of Mantua, the biſhop of Gurck, who was to be there from the emperor, had a conference at Bologna with the pope, after which they pretended to part in great diſcontent. But what followed plainly ſhewed the contrary, ſince the emperor never after did any thing agreeable to his alliance with Lewis XII. He conſented, however, that the council of Piſa ſhould be called in his name, and the ſummons ſet up at Modena, and ſeveral other places belonging to him, becauſe it was not yet time to declare himſelf. The ſummons ran, that Julius II. having refuſed to call a council, purſuant to the decree of Conſtance, the cardinals were empowered by the ſame decree to ſummon a council in their own name. And therefore, with the conſent of the emperor and the king of France, they ordered the council to meet on the firſt of September, in the city of Piſa, to endeavour the reformation of the church, in the head and members.

The biſhop of Gurck's conference with the pope, and the breaking up of the congreſs of Mantua, made the king of France greatly ſuſpect the emperor. On the other hand, he could not help fearing the king of Arragon, knowing by experience what was to be expected from him. He ſaw him making great preparations under colour of the African war, and knew withal, that notwithſtanding his daily aſſurances that he would not concern himſelf with the troubles of Italy, he was uſing his utmoſt endeavours to procure a peace between the emperor and the Venetians: that is, properly ſpeaking, he was labouring to diſengage Maximilian from the intereſt of France. In ſhort, Ferdinand ſent him brotherly admonitions to make his peace with the pope, and not draw on himſelf the juſt reproach of waging an unnatural war with the common father of Chriſtians. Lewis could not but conſider theſe remonſtrances as a ſort of proteſtation to aſſiſt the pope in caſe of need. At the ſame time, he could not believe he would engage in ſuch an undertaking without being ſecure of the emperor. Theſe things made him uneaſy, and apprehenſive that he ſhould at laſt be the dupe of the pope, the emperor, and Ferdinand. So, for fear of being prevented, he gave expreſs orders to Triulzi, who commanded his army in the room of Chaumont, lately deceaſed, to take all the advantages of the allies that lay in his power.

Triulzi upon this order, aſſaulted and took Concordia in the beginning of May, at the time the calling of the council of Piſa was every where poſted up. Then he endeavoured by ſeveral marches to oblige the allies to a battle, without being able to ſucceed. At laſt, he reſolved to approach Bologna; not that he believed himſelf in condition to beſiege the city, but to draw the allies from their advantageous poſts, and give the Bolonnois opportunity to riſe in favour of the Bentivoglios, whom he brought with him. The pope had now done his utmoſt to perſuade the generals of the allies to hazard a battle without being able to prevail, ſo much did they dread engaging with the French. Wherefore, knowing how the army ſtood diſpoſed, and diſtruſting the Bolonnois, who loved him not, he retired to Ravenna, leaving in Bologna the cardinal of Pavia, his prime miniſter. He was no ſooner gone, but a tumult aroſe in the city, during which the inhabitants called in their old maſters, the Bentivoglios, and put them in poſſeſſion of the government. The cardinal of Pavia had taken to flight the moment he perceived their reſolution. On the other hand, the army of the allies advancing to one of the gates of Bologna, and hearing the Bentivoglios were admitted, and the legate withdrawn, ran away in confuſion, leaving in the camp their artillery, baggage, and ammunition. Whereupon the inhabitants ſallying out, and joining with the peaſants, completely ſtripped the ſcattered army, and rendered it entirely unſerviceable for ſeveral months. The duke of Ferrara improving the opportunity, very eaſily recovered the places lately taken from him by the allies.

Amidſt all theſe mortifications, the pope ſtill met with another, which ſenſibly touched him. The cardinal of Pavia was ſtabbed by the duke of Urbino, who taxed him with being the cauſe of the loſs of Bologna. The pope's concern was the greater, as he durſt not puniſh, in the perſon of his nephew, a crime he would have thought worthy of the ſevereſt treatment, had it been committed by any other hand. His army being diſperſed, and his deſigns upon Ferrara vaniſhed, he quitted Ravenna, and retired to Rome. In his way, he had the frequent mortification to ſee the papers poſted up for the calling of the council of Piſa, wherein he was himſelf ſummoned to appear in perſon.

It was univerſally expected that Lewis XII. would purſue his ſucceſſes, and certainly in the then ſituation of Italy, it was his own fault that he was not maſter of Rome. The pope had no remedy ſpeedy enough to free himſelf from his ſad condition. The king of Arragon was too remote. The Venetians were unable to lend him a ſufficient aid, and the emperor was not powerful enough to ſave him, had he been willing to attempt it. Genoa, Bologna, Florence, Milan, were in the hands of his enemies. But Lewis, either through ſcruple, or ſome other motive, inſtead of purſuing his point, ordered Triulzi to retire to Milan with the army, and diſband part of the troops. Probably, he was willing to deprive the pope of the pretence of exciting all Chriſtendom againſt him, and publiſhing, that he intended to ſeize Rome and all Italy. He was juſtly apprehenſive of this from the pope, ſince it was in effect the foundation or rather the pretence of the league formed ſome months after againſt France. Triulzi was no ſooner at Milan, but Ferdinand's fleet arrived at Naples, with about three thouſand men, who were ſoon to be followed by a more conſiderable body.

It was not difficult to perceive, that the king of Arragon had ſent his fleet to Naples to ſupport the pope's intereſts, and give jealouſy to the king of France. Julius II. who was better informed than any man, revived at the news, and the rather, as he rightly judged that Ferdinand would not have been altogether aſſured of the king of England. Since the loſs of Bologna, and the rout of his army, he had ſeemed willing to conſent to an agreement with France, and though he had made overtures more like a conqueror than one conquered, Lewis had accepted them on condition they were approved by the emperor. But when the pope found, the Spaniſh fleet was at Naples, and Ferdinand began to declare himſelf, he added new terms to thoſe he had already propoſed, and plainly ſhewed he was no longer for peace. This conduct put Lewis XII. beyond all patience. So, deſpairing to agree with ſo obſtinate an enemy, he ordered Trivulzi to ſend ſupplies to Bentivoglio to guard Bologna, and ſome time after, took Bologna and the Bentivoglios under his protection. On the other hand, though he was not obliged to aſſiſt the emperor, unleſs he came into Italy in perſon, he added however to the German troops in the ſtate of Venice a ſtrong reinforcement commanded by la Paliſſe. Mean while the pope having certain advice of the good inclination of the kings of Arragon and England in his favour, reſolved to ſummon a general council in oppoſition to that of Piſa. To that end he publiſhed a bull, wherein, having firſt excuſed the neglect the ſchiſmatic cardinals laid to his charge, and inveighed againſt their inſolence, he called a council to be held at the Lateran in Rome, the 19th of April 1512.

Since the biſhop of Gurck's conference with the pope, Maximilian's conduct was ſo doubtful that it was difficult to judge certainly of it. He had agreed to the calling of the council of Piſa, which was done with his expreſs conſent. But he had not yet appointed embaſſadors, neither was it known that the German biſhop was preparing to go thither. Moreover, he had promiſed to command in perſon in Italy, and led thither a ſtrong reinforcement. But he remained inactive at Inſpruck, without ſhewing any thoughts either of the council of Piſa, or the war in Italy. Mean while the conqueſts that were expected to be made upon the Venetians were to be all his. Thus, in the preſent poſture of the affairs of Italy, Lewis XII. ſaw the burden of the war laid upon him alone, without his daring almoſt to complain to the emperor, for fear he ſhould join with his enemies. And indeed, Maximilian was ſtrongly ſolicited by the pope, the king of Arragon, and the Venetians themſelves, who offered him a good ſum to induce him to deſiſt from his pretenſions, to their dominions. Very probably, he was yet unreſolved, and knowing the league that was forming againſt France, was willing, according to cuſtom, to let the two parties proceed in order to take afterwards that ſide which beſt ſuited with his intereſt. This doubtleſs was the reaſon of his preſerving a good underſtanding with Lewis XII. in conſenting to the calling of the council of Piſa, and withal, of reſerving a means to be reconciled to the pope, in ſending neither biſhops nor embaſſadors to the council. Thus remaining almoſt equally ſuſpected by both parties, he waited till the ſucceſs of the war, or the offers from both ſides, ſhould engage him to declare for one or other.

Mean while, affairs continued ſtill in the ſame ſituation. The pope and the Venetians were alone in open war with France. The emperor ſeemed to float between both ſides. The king of Arragon had hitherto done nothing more than afforded hopes that he would join the league when concluded. But it was not ſo yet, every one fearing to engage in it unſeaſonably. Julius II. and Ferdinand knew one another too well to confide in each other. Each ſtrove to make the other ſubſervient to his deſigns, and was afraid at the ſame time of being deceived. Ferdinand had ſtill in France an embaſſador, who endeavoured to perſuade the king, that the preparations in Spain concerned only the Moors. On the other hand, the pope had not ſo quarrelled with Lewis XII. but that he had ſtill left him ſome hopes, and continued a ſort of negotiation with him, by means of the biſhop of Murray, the Scotch embaſſador, who did the office of mediator. Ferdinand was afraid, in caſe the pope made a ſeparate peace with France, the kingdom of Naples would be in danger. The pope had no leſs reaſon to fear, that to ſecure the quiet poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Naples, Ferdinand would forſake the intereſts of the church, and leave him expoſed to the mercy of the king of France. In that caſe the pope would have nothing to expect from England. Thus, affairs were come to that paſs, that it was neceſſary, either that each ſhould quickly make a ſeparate treaty, or both jointly declare themſelves, not to remain in this ſtate of uncertainty. And therefore, Ferdinand began at laſt to pull off the maſk a little more, by ſending to Naples, the troops he pretended to deſign for Africa, in order to hinder the pope from thinking of a ſeparate agreement with France.

Whilſt the pope and the king of Arragon were thus ſounding each other, the cardinals who had ſummoned the council of Piſa, and were come to Milan, thought fit to open it by commiſſioners. But this was only for form's ſake, to keep to the day appointed. Never was general council ſo thin. The biſhops of France were not yet arrived, and there was no likelihood of any from Germany. The pope was enraged when he heard the council was opened at Piſa. In his paſſion with the Florentines, for ſuffering the council to meet in one of their towns, he excommunicated them as well as the Piſans, and put both the cities under an interdict. But the Florentines forced the prieſts to celebrate divine ſervice, leaving to private perſons the liberty to obſerve or reject the interdict.

It was difficult for Julius II. and Ferdinand, to continue long in their preſent ſituation, without cauſing mutual ſuſpicions, capable of changing the face of affairs. The reaſon which had hitherto with-held Ferdinand, namely, his uncertainty with reſpect to the king of England, was now vaniſhed. Henry, after long ſuſpence, had at laſt poſitively promiſed to enter into the league againſt France. Whereupon the negotiation of the league advanced more in one month than in a whole year before. It was a conſtant rule with Ferdinand, to cover all his deſigns with a cloak of religion, little caring, that after the execution, his artifices were diſcovered. The fleet and army he had prepared in Spain, had for pretence a war with the infidels. When he was going to declare openly againſt France, he failed not to uſe the pretence of protecting the church againſt the outrages of Lewis. As ſoon as he had gained the king of England, they jointly ſent embaſſadors to Lewis, to require him to leave the pope unmoleſted, intimating that as chriſtian princes, they could not diſpenſe with protecting the church, diſtributed by his ambition. Lewis ſaw plainly, that their meaſures being now taken, it would be too late to juſtify his conduct, and therefore choſe to return a haughty anſwer, which was preciſely what his enemies wanted.

Shortly after, on the 4th of October, the pope, the king of Arragon, and the Venetians, concluded a league at Rome, leaving a place for the king of England, who had ſhewn his deſire to be included. Indeed, cardinal Bambridge was concerned in the negotiation as embaſſador of England. But he was ordered not to ſign the treaty, becauſe Henry expected to make a private one, more agreeable to the intereſts of England than that which concerned Italy only. By this treaty, the pope promiſed to find for the ſervice of the league, ſix hundred men at arms, five hundred light-horſe, ſix thouſand foot[1], and twenty thouſand ducats a month. The Venetians were to furniſh eight hundred men at arms, a thouſand light-horſe, eight thouſand foot, and to pay monthly twenty thouſand ducats. Ferdinand was to provide twelve hundred men at arms, a thouſand light-horſe, ten thouſand foot, and twenty thouſand ducats a month. It is true, neither the king of France, nor the duke of Ferrara, were named in the treaty as enemies of the allies. But it was eaſy to perceive it, ſince the intent of the league was to reſtore to the pope the city of Bologna, and whatever belonged to the holy ſee, and to make war upon all perſons that ſhould offer to hinder it. A place was left for the emperor in caſe he would enter into it, and Raymond of Cardona, viceroy of Naples, was declared general of the league.

Whilſt the world was in expectation of the event of this league, the council of Piſa was ſolemnly opened in that city, by the cardinals who had convened it, and ſome biſhops of France and Milan. The firſt ſeſſion was held the 4th of November, though the pope had excommunicated the cardinals, and deprived them of their dignity. The ſecond was held the 11th of the ſame month. But becauſe there was a commotion that day in the city, the cardinals and biſhops were ſo terrified, that on the morrow they removed the council to Milan, where they expected to be more out of danger. Indeed the inhabitants of Piſa could not look with a good eye upon the council, which expoſed them to an excommunication and interdict, though it was not in their power to oppoſe the orders of the Florentines their ſovereigns.

I obſerved that the Switzers were at variance with Lewis XII. by the practices of the cardinal of Sion, or rather of the pope himſelf, who ſet him to work. Their firſt attempt to enter the Milaneſe proving unſucceſsful, they reſolved this

[1] In the treaty, as it ſtands in Rymer, it is only ſaid, that the pope was to furniſh ſix hundred men at arms, without any mention of light horſe and foot: neither is the number of troops that was to be ſent by the Venetians ſpecified, but it is ſaid, they were to find a fleet ſtrong enough to beat the enemy's: and on the day of the publication of the league, the pope and the Venetians were to pay eighty thouſand ducats of gold for two months wages for their forces. The year to levy ſixteen thouſand men, the cardinal of Sion, having poſitively promiſed them money at their entrance into Italy, and that the army of the allies would employ the French in la Romagna. As this levy could not be ready till the beginning of the winter, they began their march in November, and penetrated as far as Vareſe. Gaſton de Foix, nephew of Lewis XII. governor of Milan, was ſo deſtitute of troops, that he knew not how to oppoſe their paſſage. However, with the few men he had, he took the field, to annoy them and obſtruct their march. But it was not poſſible for him to hinder them from coming to the very gates of Milan. The French had now begun to furniſh the caſtle with ammunition in order to quit the city, when ſuddenly the Switzers hearing no news of the pope, nor the army of the allies which they thought to be aſſembled in la Romagna, retired to their own country, after burning ſome villages. If the pope had not diſappointed them of the money he had promiſed, and if the army of the allies had acted in la Romagna, Milan, Bologna, and Ferrara, would have been in great danger, ſince the French were at that time very weak in thoſe parts. La Paliſſe was then in the emperor's army with a large detachment of the king's beſt troops.

Nothing could be more advantageous to England, than to ſee the forces of France turned againſt Italy. The conqueſt of the duchy of Milan was leſs beneficial to Lewis XII. than to England. For it procured England a ſettled tranquillity, whereas it expoſed France to perpetual troubles, and an immenſe expence. It was therefore policy in Henry to ſuffer the French, Germans, Italians, and Spaniards to battle it in Italy, without involving himſelf in a war which could never procure him any advantage. To the time I am ſpeaking of, the kings of England had taken care not to meddle with the affairs of Italy, if we except Henry III. who being unfortunately deſirous of making his ſecond ſon king of Sicily, ruined his own kingdom to execute that extravagant project. But he was not a prince to be imitated by his ſucceſſors. The advantages of this policy were ſo manifeſt to all the Engliſh, that it required no leſs than a Ferdinand, the ableſt and moſt ſubtle prince of his age, to make them ſwerve from it.

This prince had joined with the pope ever ſince the beginning of the year 1510, or perhaps the end of the foregoing, and yet had been near two years without declaring himſelf. This delay proceeded only from his deſire to ſecure England firſt, that Henry might make a diverſion in France, which would oblige Lewis XII. to neglect the affairs of Italy. This diverſion muſt have been advantageous to the king Arragon, ſince it would remove from Italy, or at leaſt weaken a very formidable rival. But it is hard to conceive wherein it could be ſerviceable to England. On the contrary, there ſeemed to be ſeveral very ſtrong reaſons to divert Henry from ſuch a deſign, without mentioning the peace he had lately renewed with France, and confirmed by a ſolemn oath. This probably was the cauſe of his ſo long deferring the concluſion of the league I ſhall ſpeak of hereafter. Indeed it was not poſſible, but that ſome of the king's council were clear-ſighted enough to ſee that this league was no ways advantageous to England, what colour ſoever was given thereto.

Whilſt the negotiation languiſhed in England, new occurrences put Ferdinand upon taking freſh meaſures, and contriving all ſorts of ways to ſucceed with Henry. Lewis XII. perſiſted in his deſign to hold the council of Piſa, as was ſaid, and that cauſed Julius II. to convene another at the Lateran, and excommunicate by the ſame bull all princes and others who adhered to the firſt. Among theſe princes, was John d'Albret, king of Navarre, who being allied to Lewis XII. blindly followed the directions of the court of France. The king of Navarre had no ſooner declared for the council of Piſa, but Ferdinand upon that pretence, formed the deſign to ſeize his whole kingdom, and make Henry his ſon-in-law the inſtrument to execute it. To that end, he gave Henry to underſtand, that a fair opportunity offered to recover Guienne, taken by France from one of his predeceſſors, ſince the league that was going to be concluded in Italy would find Lewis XII. ſo much employment, that probably he would not be able to defend his own country. But as the diſtance of Guiennne might deter Henry from attempting that conqueſt, Ferdinand out of affection, very willingly promiſed to ſupply him with troops, tranſport ſhips, artillery, proviſions, ammunition, without ſtimulating any thing for himſelf, but the ſole pleaſure of procuring his ſon-in-law ſo great an advantage. This offer opened the eyes of Henry and his council [m]. The acquiſition of Guienne ſeemed to them a thing ſo advantageous, and withal ſo glorious in the beginning of this reign, that the king, without any farther difficulty, entered into the league propoſed by the pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians. Such was the real motive [n] that induced the court of England to break the peace lately renewed with France, without alledging other reaſons than the protection granted by Lewis to the Bentivoglios, and the calling of the unlawful aſſembly at Piſa. As if England was concerned to help the pope to Bologna, and oppoſe with arms a council, conſiſting of a ſcore of French biſhops, without power and credit, even in the very place where they were aſſembled. We ſhall ſee preſently, how Henry was the dupe of his affectionate father-in-law, and how Ferdinand politickly made uſe of him to ſerve his own ends, without giving himſelf the leaſt trouble about his ſon-in-law's affairs.

When Ferdinand had gained Henry, he concluded at Rome, with the pope and the Venetians, the fore-mentioned league. In this treaty of Rome, it was expreſsly ſaid that all the articles were negotiated and ſettled with the king of England's knowledge, the cardinal of York acting for him, and daily expecting orders to ſign it, but that for certain reaſons the concluſion of it could be no longer delayed.

About ſix weeks after, Henry and Ferdinand concluded at London, a private league for the conqueſt of Guienne [o]. This was a conſequence of the firſt, on the ſuppoſition that the depriving the king of France of that province was a good means to ſerve and protect the church of God, the great and principal aim of the allies. If ever God's holy name was openly and ſhamefully taken in vain, it is in the preambles of theſe two treaties. In the firſt, the pope proteſted that his ſole aim in deſiring Bologna, and the other ſtates which belonged to the church, was, to reſtore Italy to her former tranquillity, that all Chriſtians might join their forces againſt the infidels, as he had ever wiſhed, and ſtill did wiſh moſt ſincerely. Thus, to make war upon the infidels, it was neceſſary that Italy ſhould be free from troubles, which could not be hoped, till the pope had executed his ambitious projects, without which Italy was not to expect to enjoy any quiet.

In the ſecond treaty, Henry and Ferdinand ſet forth, "That they had made alliances with all Chriſtian princes, ſolely to be enabled to wage war with the enemies of Chriſt; and for that purpoſe, were now employed in preparing powerful armies by land and ſea; but that ſuddenly, when they leaſt expected it, they were told, the king of France's troops were beſieging Bologna, where the pope, old and infirm, lay ſeized with a grievous diſtemper, and attended by all his cardinals: that being extremely afflicted at this news, they had beſought the king of France by letters and embaſſadors, to give over his deſign: that the pope had offered him the pardon of all his ſins, provided only he would abſtain from the patrimony of the church, ceaſe to enflame the ſchiſm, and adhere to the council of Lateran: but that all this had been to no purpoſe. On the contrary, he had made himſelf maſter of Bologna, by the treachery of ſome of the inhabitants; twice routed the army of the holy church of Rome, and in contempt of the holy ſee, called a council, after having bribed ſome of the cardinals. That ſince, the pope had ſent a legate to him to demand only that he would forbear to attack the church. That the legate for prevailing, the kings of England and Spain had ſent embaſſadors to adviſe him amicably to deſiſt from the attempts and to be reconciled with the pope, or elſe they could do no leſs than undertake the protection of the church; but that their advice had been ſlighted. That upon all theſe conſiderations, the two kings perfectly knowing how detrimental ſuch an ambition might prove to the catholic faith, the church of God, and the welfare of Chriſtendom, had thought proper to agree upon the following articles, to the praiſe and glory of almighty God, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the whole triumphant court of heaven, for the defence, exaltation, increaſe of the catholic faith, the Chriſtian religion, the holy Roman church, which was unjuſtly oppreſſed, and upon the frequent inſtances, ex-

England alone is a juſt empire: or when we would enlarge ourſelves, let it be that way we can, and to which it ſeems the eternal Providence hath deſtined us; and that is by ſea. Herbert, p. 8.

[n] Another inducement to Henry was the pope's promiſe to take away the title of Moſt Chriſtian from the king of France, and confer it on him. Which he thought would be a perpetual glory to the nation. Ibid.

Contra-

hortations, and admonitions of the pope, the head thereof." The ſubſtance of this pious treaty was as follows:

I. The two kings took upon them the defence and protection of the holy Roman church, againſt all perſons that ſhould attack her [p].

II. Ferdinand, as catholic king, and to diſcharge his duty to God and the church, promiſed to take up arms in her defence in Italy.

In the IIId. article it was ſaid, that the pope and the ſacred college of cardinals had judged, that in order to deliver the church from the oppreſſion ſhe groaned under, it was neceſſary to wage war upon the king of France, not only in Italy, but in ſuch of his provinces alſo as bordered upon the two allies. And therefore it was agreed, that they ſhould carry their arms into Guienne, and conquer that province for the crown of England, and that Henry, in aſſiſting the church, might at the ſame time recover what belonged to him. To that purpoſe, as ſoon as Ferdinand ſhould have actually declared againſt the kingdom of France, and taken up arms in defence of the church, Henry, at a proper ſeaſon, ſhould proclaim war againſt the ſame prince in defence of the ſame church.

To perform this article, Henry promiſed to ſend into Guienne ſome time in April, 1512, ſix thouſand foot [q] commanded by a good general: to maintain them at his own expence, and not recall them without the conſent of the king of Arrgon. Ferdinand bound himſelf, on his part, to find five hundred men at arms, fifteen hundred light-horſe, and four thouſand foot, on the ſame terms. Moreover, he engaged to furniſh the Engliſh troops with proviſions and ammunition at a moderate price. It was farther agreed, that each of the two kings ſhould ſend a fleet to ſea with three thouſand good ſoldiers, for ſix months, beſides the mariners, and that neither ſhould recall his fleet without the other's conſent.

IV. That Ferdinand ſhould find forty ſhips, at a reaſonable rate, to tranſport the Engliſh forces.

V. That in caſe the allies ſhould take any places in Guienne and elſewhere, they ſhould be delivered to him of the two kings, who had a prior title to the ſame.

VI. That if either of the two kings ſhould be attacked out of Guienne, they ſhould jointly take care of the defence of the country, of him who wanted aſſiſtance, ſincerely and with all their power.

VII. That the two kings conſidering that the pope had called at Rome a council, which all Chriſtian princes ought to obey, and ſend embaſſadors to, and it was affirmed that the king of France perſiſted in his deſign to continue the council ſummoned to Piſa, they agreed to adhere to whatever ſhould be decreed by the council of Lateran, and oppoſe that of Piſa, with all its favourers and adherents.

VIII. That neither of the two kings ſhould make peace or truce, without a mutual conſent.

IX. That by this, the former treaties ſhould not be deemed void, but, on the contrary, remain in full force.

X. That it ſhould be ratified within four months by Henry and Ferdinand, in his own and the name of queen Jane, his daughter.

Henry and his council thought, without doubt, they had made a very advantageous treaty, ſince it was to procure them the duchy of Guienne, and Ferdinand demanded nothing for himſelf, as if he had acted purely from a motive of religion, and out of affection to his ſon-in-law, though in reality, he had conſulted only his own intereſt. As for the pope's affairs, about which both kings ſeemed to be ſo greatly concerned, it may be affirmed, they did not ſo much as think of them, as it afterwards appeared. But they wanted that pretence to dazzle the public, though, in all appearance, the world was not ſo blind, as to imagine that two great kings ſhould take up arms on purpoſe to diſſolve a council which called itſelf general, compoſed of a ſmall number of biſhops, of one nation only, and ſo little regarded, that even at Milan, where it was removed, the government was forced to make uſe of their whole authority to procure its reception.

During theſe tranſactions, the emperor gave the king of France ſo much cauſe to ſuſpect his ſincerity, that neceſſity only obliged him to feign any further confidence in him. There was no German biſhop come to the council, and when the emperor was preſſed upon that ſubject, he replied, it was neceſſary firſt to have the approbation of the diet of the empire, which he did not doubt of obtaining: that though he ſhould ſend biſhops from his hereditary dominions to Piſa, it would be more prejudicial than advantageous to the council, ſince it would give occaſion to imagine, he deſpaired to obtain the diet's conſent. On the other hand, inſtead of commanding in perſon his army in the ſtate of Venice, as he had promiſed, he left all to the French troops who were come to his aid. In ſhort, while he liſtened to the offers of the pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians, he told the French embaſſador, he was ready to march to Rome, at the head of an army, provided his maſter would ſend him a ſtrong reinforcement, and a ſum of money, proportionable to the greatneſs of the undertaking. Amidſt theſe uncertainties, Lewis new not what to truſt to. He could not look upon Maximilian but as an ally ready to abandon him, if he found it more for his intereſt to join with his enemies. In that caſe all the emperor's conqueſts upon the Venetians would be ſo many loſſes to France. Mean while the ſupplies he lent him were very expenſive, and yet he durſt not afford him a pretence to change ſides. Thus Lewis ſaw himſelf upon the point of being attacked by all the forces of the pope, the king of Spain, and the Venetians, without any hope of aſſiſtance from the emperor. As for England, though he was yet ignorant of the treaty of London, and Henry's embaſſador poſitively denied that his maſter intended to be concerned, all Henry's proceedings were plain indications that he would ſoon declare againſt him.

Mean while, the pope, who had ever in view the taking of Bologna and Ferrara, was very preſſing with the viceroy of Naples to advance with his troops, and take the command of the confederate army. But notwithſtanding all his ſolicitations, the junction could not be till the middle of December, and even then, the Naples artillery not being yet arrived, the army could be only employed in ſome trifling expeditions in la Romagna, with which ended the year 1511. It is now time to return to the affairs of England.

Though Henry had not yet proclaimed war with France, Lewis II. knew what he was to expect. He had good intelligence by means of one Buonviſo, a merchant of Lucca, who being a bankrupt, was retired into England, where he had obtained ſo much favour from the pope as to be made a kind of agent [r]. This man being corrupted by France, diſcovered to Lewis the ſecrets, the pope was ſometimes forced to truſt him with; and hence it was that the court of France was informed of many things which the Engliſh would have concealed from them. It was probably by this means that the king of France had the firſt notice of the league concluded at London, though it was made a great ſecret. But ſhortly after, he had no more occaſion for ſpies to know Henry's intentions.

[1512] The parliament being met the fourth of February [s], the king communicated his deſign of making war with France. He proteſted, his ſole aim was to free the pope from the king of France's oppreſſion, and eſpecially to cauſe the ſchiſmatical council of Piſa, now removed to Milan, to be diſſolved. Though this war, undertaken, as the king himſelf affirmed, ſolely to oblige the pope, was little agreeable to the intereſt of England, the parliament however gave the king a large ſubſidy [t]. In all appearance, the leading members of the houſe of commons being informed of the true reaſons, ſo ordered it, that the reſt came into their opinion. Otherwiſe, it would have been difficult to make them perceive the neceſſity of England's engaging in a war with France, to reſtore Bologna to the pope, and diſſolve a council ſo inconſiderable as that of Piſa. Before the parliament broke up, the king was pleaſed to reſtore John Dudley, ſon of Edmund Dudley, to the rank and honours his family had been deprived of by the father's attainder. From that time, he had always an affection for him, and at length, towards the end of his reign, made him lord admiral of England.

The

The war Henry intended to undertake againſt France, having for pretence the diſſolving of the council of Piſa, he could not diſpence with acknowledging that of Lateran, and ſending thither embaſſadors. He made choice of Silveſter, biſhop of Worceſter, with ſir Robert Wingfield, and commiſſioned them to agree in his name to whatever ſhould be deemed neceſſary for the reformation of the church, as well in the head as in the members. This clauſe was only to caſt a miſt before people's eyes, ſince nothing certainly was farther from the pope's thoughts, than to endeavour in this council, either his own or the church's reformation.

The time being come to execute the projects agreed by Henry and Ferdinand in the treaty of London, Henry gave the command of his fleet to ſir Edward Howard, ſon and heir to the earl of Surrey [u], and of his army, which was to act on land, to Thomas Grey, marquis of Dorſet [w]. All the troops that were to ſerve in the Guienne expedition being embarked about the middle of May, in Spaniſh veſſels, arrived the 8th of June, at Paſſage, in the province of Guipuſcoa, where the marquis of Dorſet landed thoſe he was to command. The lord Herbert ſays, theſe troops conſiſted of ten thouſand men, but probably, he included in that number the three thouſand that were to ſerve at ſea according to the treaty [x].

The admiral having convoyed the marquis of Dorſet to Spain, put to ſea again, and arriving on the coaſt of Bretagne, landed ſome troops, and plundered the country [y]. Henry, hearing the king of France was preparing a great naval armament, ſent a reinforcement [z] to his admiral, which enabled him to make head againſt the French. The two fleets meeting the 10th of Auguſt, came to a furious engagement which ended in great loſs on both ſides. The Regent, a firſt-rate ſhip [a], and the Cordelier, commanded by Primauget [b], being grappled, were both blown up, with the loſs of all their men. This accident happened by the deſperate courage of Primauget who, finding he could not ſave his ſhip ſet fire to the powder [c].

The treaty of league concluded at London, ſeemed to be made only to pave the way for Henry to the conqueſt of Guienne. But Ferdinand had never any ſuch thought. His ſole aim was to conquer Navarre for himſelf, and employ to that end the Engliſh troops he had ſent for into Spain. But as it was by no means proper to inform Henry of ſuch a project, he had been obliged to allure him with the hopes of recovering Guienne, in order to induce him to ſend his troops. This is the true reaſon why Ferdinand ſhewed in the treaty ſo much diſintereſtedneſs, that all the advantage ſeemed to be on the ſide of England. But the performance was very far from anſwering the engagement.

The marquis of Dorſet being arrived in Guipuſcoa, found a commiſſioner of the king, who paid him great reſpect, and told him the duke d'Alva was taking the field, in order to join him. And indeed the duke immediately put himſelf at the head of the Spaniſh army. But inſtead of joining the Engliſh, who were encamped near Fontarabia, with deſign to beſiege with him the city of Bayonne, as was reſolved, he kept at Logrogno, on the borders of Navarre. He intimated to the Engliſh general, that the king of Navarre being in alliance with France, it would be very dangerous to attack Bayonne with Navarre behind them: that whilſt they ſhould be employed in the ſiege, the king of Navarre might introduce the French into his dominions, join with them, and, by encamping between the mountains of Navarre and the ſea, cut off the proviſions which ſhould be brought to the camp before Bayonne without being obliged to give battle, if he thought proper: that therefore it was neceſſary, before they engaged in the ſiege, to try to gain the king of Navarre to the intereſts of their maſters.

Theſe reaſons were ſo plauſible, that the marquis of Dorſet was eaſily perſuaded to ſend an Engliſh officer to the king of Navarre, to require him to join with the allies. Ferdinand ſummoned him likewiſe, but more haughtily, to forſake the king of France, and come into the league [d]. The king of Navarre replied, he was reſolved to ſtand neutral. But the Engliſh and Spaniards not being ſatisfied with this anſwer, jointly preſſed him to declare himſelf, or deliver four of his towns for their ſecurity, which that prince would not grant. During theſe negotiations, a French army, commanded by the duke of Longueville, approached the frontiers of Bearn. Whereupon the marquis of Dorſet complained to Ferdinand, that the time loſt in ſolliciting the king of Navarre had ſerved only to give the French opportunity to come and defend their borders, and withal preſſed him to declare, whether he would attack Guienne purſuant to the treaty of London. Ferdinand anſwered, prudence would not ſuffer him to ſend his army to Fontarabia to beſiege Bayonne, and leave his dominions expoſed to the invaſions of the French and Navarrois: that it was much more convenient to paſs through Navarre, and ſecure three or four places, in order to hinder his enemies from making uſe of that kingdom againſt him: that therefore he wiſhed the Engliſh would join the duke of Alva, and his army ſhould make the vanguard, to be expoſed to the firſt dangers: that however the ſiege of Bayonne would not be retarded, becauſe there was no queſtion, the king of Navarre would be glad to be preſſed, in order to juſtify himſelf to the king of France, when he ſhould enter into the league. The marquis of Dorſet, who did not yet ſee into his deſigns, having held a council of war, replied, that by his inſtructions he could undertake nothing againſt the king of Navarre; but if the duke of Alva would paſs through that kingdom, he might if he pleaſed, but for his part, being already near Bayonne, he could not think of taking ſo great a compaſs to join him.

Ferdinand was not content with this anſwer. He ſtrongly inſiſted upon what he had propoſed, that the Engliſh troops ſhould come and join his army, and in the mean while, gave orders to the duke of Alva to beſiege Pampeluna, metropolis of Navarre. During the ſiege, he continually amuſed the marquis of Dorſet with poſitive promiſes, that immediately after the taking of Pampeluna, the duke of Alva ſhould join him to beſiege Bayonne. Mean while, the king of Navarre being unable to defend himſelf, was retired into France, where he made a treaty with Lewis XII. for their common defence. But it coſt him the town of Salvatierra, and all Bearn, which he was forced to deliver to the French.

Pampeluna having ſurrendered by capitulation the 25th of July, Ferdinand, according to his promiſe, ſhould have ordered the duke of Alva to join the Engliſh. But the reſt of the fortified towns in Navarre ſerved him for pretence to delay the junction. So the duke of Alva continued his conqueſts, whilſt the Engliſh troops, though without ſtirring from their camp, ſerved as a countenance to his deſigns. And indeed, though the French, who daily received freſh ſupplies, ſaw themſelves ſufficiently ſtrong to withſtand the duke of Alva, they never dared to enter Navarre, for fear of coming between the Engliſh and Spaniards. Wherefore, being contented to remain encamped between Bayonne and Salvatierra, they gave the duke of Alva all the leiſure he wanted to ſubdue almoſt all Navarre.

Then it was that the marquis of Dorſet plainly perceived the king of Arragon acted with inſincerity, and that his deſign from the very firſt was not to invade Guienne, but conquer Navarre. Ferdinand was very ſenſible, his artifice would at laſt be diſcovered. So, to prevent the complaints the Engliſh general might make to the king his maſter, he ſends an expreſs to England, to give Henry an account, after his manner, of the affairs of that country, and to deſire him to order his general to act in concert with him. Henry, who had received nothing to the contrary from the marquis, readily ſent Windſor herald with the deſired orders to the general.

Whilſt the herald was on his journey, the duke of Alva became maſter of St. Juan de Fie del Puerto. Preſently after the taking of that place, Ferdinand acquainted the marquis of Dorſet, that his army was ready to march into Guienne, and deſired him to join the duke of Alva without delay. But the marquis was no longer willing to be deceived. He knew the French army was intrenched between Bayonne and Salvatierra, with the river Bidaſſoa in front which muſt be paſſed within view, and beſides Bayonne was ſo well provided, that there was no likelihood of beſieging it. What Ferdinand therefore propoſed was impracticable, and only a continuation of his artifices. From St. Juan de Pie del Puerto, the right-hand road led into Bearn, and the left to Bayonne, ſo the duke of Alva's intent was to engage the Engliſh to enter Bearn with him, under colour there was no other way to draw the enemies from their advantageous poſt, or at leaſt to beſiege Salvatierra. But the Engliſh general having no orders to make war upon the king of Navarre, either in Bearn or elſewhere, refuſed to join the Spaniards. Ferdinand reaped this advantage from his refuſal, that he caſt the whole blame upon him, of their not invading Guienne according to the treaty. After that the duke of Alva turning back, laid ſiege to Eſtella, the only place that remained to the king of Navarre.

The marquis of Dorſet, full of indignation at theſe proceedings, and conſidering that his army was daily weakened by ſickneſs and want of proviſions, which were grown ſcarce ſince the war in Navarre, deſired Ferdinand to furniſh him with ſhips for his return. It was with great difficulty that he obtained his requeſt, Ferdinand ſtill proteſting againſt his departute, as directly contrary to the treaty. Mean while, he was not ſorry for it, ſince the Engliſh were almoſt become uſeleſs, after the conqueſt of Navarre. In the mean while, the marquis of Dorſet falling ſick, the lord Thomas Howard took the command of the army. At the ſame time, as the troops were going to embark, the hereld arrived from England, with poſitive orders to the general, to obey the commands of king Ferdinand[e]. But the army mutinying it was impoſſible to detain the ſoldiers any longer in Spain, and the embarkation being made, they arrived in England in November[f]. Henry was at firſt very angry with his general, but being informed of all particulars during the campaign, plainly ſaw Ferdinand had deceived him, and that his affected diſintereſtedneſs in the treaty of league, was only to draw him more eaſily into the ſnare. He thought proper however to diſſemble, for fear of giving Ferdinand a pretence to join with France, and leave him embarraſſed.

Before the year was expired, Ferdinand ſaw himſelf in full poſſeſſion of Navarre, though the king of France uſed ſome endeavours to wreſt that conqueſt out of his hands. In December, the king of Navarre, and Francis duke of Angouléme beſieged Pampetuna, but not being able to take the place, were forced to abandon the reſt of the kingdom to the Spaniards. After Ferdinand was in poſſeſſion of Navarre, he ſought pretences to keep it, but found no better than a bull of pope Julius II. who excommunicated John D'Albret king of Navarre, and gave his kingdom in prey to the conqueror. Mezerai affirms, this bull never appeared, but the lord Herbert ſays, it was dated March 1, 1512.

We muſt now ſee what paſſed in Italy whilſt Ferdinand was conquerring Navarre. The confederate army of the pope, the king of Arrogan and the Venetians, under the command of the Viceroy of Naples, taking the field in December, the pope cauſed the viceroy to be continually preſſed by cardinal John de Medici, his legate, to beſiege Bologna. At length, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the viceroy, and the Venetian general, who foreſaw great difficulties in the execution of that deſign, the pope's inſtances were to be complied with, and the ſiege of Bologna being reſolved, the army of the allies[g] appeared before the city. But Gaſton de Foix, duke of Nemours, and governor of Milan, coming to its relief, compelled the allies to raiſe the ſiege. Some days after, he defeated a Venetian army at Breſcia, and ſlew eight thouſand men. At laſt, on the 11th of April finding means to give the allies battle near Ravenna, he put them to rout, and took the legate priſoner; but was himſelf ſlain after the battle, in too warmly purſuing a body of Spaniards, who were retreating in good order. After that prince's death, la Paliſſe took the command of the army, and the next day became maſter of Ravenna. Whereupon all the towns of la Romagna, taken by the pope after the battle of Agnadel, voluntarily ſurrendered to the cardinal of St. Severin, who was in the French army as legate of the council of Piſa, transferred to Milan.

The conſternation at Rome was ſo great, that the cardinals went in a body to petition the pope to make peace with France. But Julius II. had reſources unknown perhaps to the cardinals. So, all they could obtain was to engage him to make ſome feigned advances, in order to gain time, and hinder the French from marching to Rome, as they might eaſily have done, without fear of meeting any obſtacle.

Whilſt Lewis's affairs ſeemed to be in the moſt flouriſhing condition, they were in reality upon the decline. The Switzers, encouraged by the cardinal of Sion, preparing to exert their utmoſt to invade the duchy of Milan, la Paliſſe thought it more for his maſter's intereſt to relieve that country, which was deſtitute of troops, than make conqueſts in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. So, leaving the cardinal of St. Severin in la Romagna, with five or ſix thouſand men, he haſtily marched into Milan. The retreat of the French, when it lay in their power to march to Rome, inſpired Julius II. with freſh courage. From thence forward he would no more hear of peace, though Lewis XII. offered him the ſame terms as before his victory. At this juncture it was that the council of Lateran was opened the 3d of May, which had been delayed by reaſon of the battle of Ravenna.

All hope of peace vaniſhing, the pope excommunicated Lewis XII. and put France under an interdict[h]. He uſed for pretence the captivity of his legate, who was detained at Milan, where, though a priſoner, he performed however the functions of the pope's legate, the inhabitants of Milan refuſing to own the authority of the council held in their city. It was a great mortification to Lewis, to ſee his council contemned by his own ſubjects, but this was only a ſmall part of the misfortunes to which he was expoſed the ſame year. After la Paliſſe had quitted la Romagna, all the towns of that country ſubmitted to the pope. At the ſame time, Ferdinand became maſter of Navarre, and Lewis was forced to ſend an army into Bearn, to hinder the Engliſh and Spaniards from invading Guienne. On the other hand, the emperor concluded a truce with Venice, and ſecretly promiſed to withdraw from the French army a body of German troops, lent the king for the defence of the Milaneſe. And yet upon the aſſurance of this aid it was that Lewis recalled from Milan part of his own troops, not doubting, that with thoſe he left there, and the Germans ſent him by the emperot, he ſhould be able to reſiſt his enemies. Thus, the French finding themſelves weak in the duchy of Milan, la Paliſſe was obliged to recall the cardinal of St. Severin, with his troops, which was the cauſe of the loſs of Romagna.

Mean while, the Switzers, to the number of ſixteen thouſand, began their march about the end of Auguſt, or the beginning of September. But inſtead of taking the direct road to the Milaneſe, the paſſes whereof they did not queſtion were ſtrongly guarded, they marched to Trent, with Maximilian's permiſſion. Though this, if any, was an enemy's act, he was ſtill deſirous to hide his intentions, by telling the French embaſſador, that his alliance with the Switzers ſuffered him not to refuſe them a paſſage through his dominions, as if his treaty with Lewis XII. was to be leſs obſerved. The Switzers having paſſed unmoleſted through Trent proceeded to Verona, and joining the Venetians, they marched together towards Milan. Whereupon the French, entirely diſconcerted, and not having above ten thouſand men, reſolved to retire into the fortified towns, in order to waſte the enemy's army by ſieges, till the king ſent them ſupplies, or the approaching winter ſtopped the progreſs of the allies. But they were ſoon deprived of this refuge, by the emperor's orders for his troops to retire immediately. Theſe orders being punctually obeyed, la Paliſſe found himſelf ſo weak, that deſpairing to ſave the Milaneſe, he reſolved to repais the mountains, and return into France. The prelates of the council ſeeing Milan was going to be abandoned, by a ſudden decree, removed the council to Lyons, and followed the French troops. They would have carried the cardinal de Medici with them, but went away in ſuch confuſion, that his friends found means to ſecure him. After the French were retired all the towns of the duchy readily ſurrendered to the Switzers and Venetians, except Parma, Placentia, and Reggio, which ſubmitted to the pope. On the other hand, Alexander Bentivoglio, not thinking himſelf ſafe in Bologna, departed from thence with all his family, leaving the city to the pope's mercy. Thus Julius II. who about a month before, ſaw himſelf in a very ill ſituation, was arrived at the height of his wiſhes by this ſurpriſing revolution, which reſtored him Ravenna, Bologna, all la Romagna, and drove the French out of Italy.

There remained ſtill four things to do to complete the pope's happineſs, namely, to diſpoſſeſs the duke of Ferrara, to reſtore the Sforzas to Milan, and the Medici to Florence, and laſtly to expel the Germans and Spaniards out of Italy. As for the duke of Farrara, he voluntarily delivered himſelf to the pope, upon the faith of a ſafe conduct. An imprudence which would have coſt him dear, had he not been freed by Fabricius Colona, his friend, who forced the guard, ſet at the gates of Rome to hinder his departure.

The French were no ſooner out of Italy, than the allies began to diſcover their different ends in acting againſt France. Upon this occaſion they judged proper to meet at Mantua, where they could agree but upon two articles, namely, that Maximilian Sforza, eldeſt ſon of Lodovico the Moor, ſhould be reſtored to Milan, and the houſe of de Medici to Florence. In conſequence of this laſt reſolution, the army of the allies approaching Florence, compelled the Florentines to conſent to a treaty, whereby the Medici were reſtored to their country as citizens only, and not as governors. But the cardinal de Medici entering the city by virtue of the treaty, whilſt the army of the allies was at the gates, found means to introduce many officers and ſoldiers, and raiſe a ſedition which made him maſter of the city. Whereupon, the government was ſettled upon the ſame foot, as before the baniſhment of the Medici.

It was a great matter for the pope to have reſtored the Medici to Florence, and Sforza to Milan. But this did not ſuffice to content him. The duke of Ferrara was ſtill maſter of his duchy, and the council of Piſa ſitting at Lyons. The allies therefore muſt be brought to turn their arms againſt Ferrara, and procure a peace between the emperor and the Venetians, that the emperor might without difficulty abandon his council. To that purpoſe, the pope obtained a ſecond meeting at Rome, where he could gain nothing with reſpect to Ferrara, becauſe the duke was protected by the king of Arragon. Beſides the Venetians could not agree to find men and money to render the pope maſter of that duchy. As for the peace between the emperor and Venice, he found ſtill greater difficulties, though he paſſionately wiſhed to accompliſh that project, for fear one or other of the two powers ſhould recall the French into Italy. But the intolerable terms propoſed by the emperor to the Venetians hindered him from ſucceeding. In ſhort, the pope ſeeing his labour was in vain, and deſiring at any rate to diſſolve the council of Piſa, and prevent the return of the French into Italy, concluded with the emperor a league offenſive and defenſive againſt Venice. By this treaty, the emperor engaged to become a principal party in the league of Rome, and agreed, that the pope ſhould keep Parma, Placentia, and Reggio, ſaving however the rights of the empire. He promiſed to renounce the council of Piſa, and forſake the duke of Ferrara and the Bentivoglios. The pope engaged on his part to aid the emperor with all his power, thunder his cenſures againſt the Venetians, declare them excluded out of the league of Rome, and drop the proſecution of the Colonnas for aiding the duke of Ferrara to make his eſcape. The treaty being ſigned and ratified, the biſhop of Gurck, as the emperor's lieutenant, renounced in the next ſeſſion of the council of Lateran the aſſembly of Piſa, and revoked whatever had been done by the emperor towards the calling and ſupporting it.

About the end of December, Maximilian Sforza, eldeſt ſon of Lodovico the Moor, was put in poſſeſſion of the duchy of Milan, purſuant to the agreement of the allies at Mantua.

I have now ran over the occurrences of the year 1512, a year very remarkable for the ſeveral changes in the affairs of Italy, and ſtill more ſo for the conduct of the princes concerned, which diſcovers their different characters. Lewis XII. was the dupe of his ſcruples, which made him loſe the opportunity of diſabling the pope to hurt him, and in the end occaſioned the loſs of the Milaneſe. Julius II. made religion ſubſervient to his immoderate ambition, by uſing the glory of God, and the good of the church, for a cloak to gratify his paſſions. Having formed a league to reſtore the Venetians to their dominions, to the glory of God, and exaltation of the Chriſtian faith, he concluded another, on the ſame pretence, to diſpoſſeſs them of all they had recovered. Ferdinand drew Henry VIII. into a war for the pope's defence, and to procure Guienne for the crown of England, but artfully made it ſubſervient to the conqueſt of Navarre for himſelf. The emperor Maximilian acted with no more ſincerity. His conduct was the more extraordinary, as he was ſolely indebted to Lewis XII. for all he had conquered in Italy after the league of Cambray. Nay, the very preſervation of his conqueſts was wholly owing to that prince's continual ſupplies. And yet he no ſooner ſaw him upon the decline, but he moſt ungratefully helped to hurl him down the precipice. It is ſaid he had a book wherein he marked in red letters the injuries received from the king of France. But I do not know in what colour Lewis XII. ſhould have wrote in his book the wrong done him by Maximilian on this occaſion. As for Henry VIII. he was certainly the dupe of the king of Arragon and the pope. But what is more ſtrange, after Ferdinand and Julius II. by their artifices had engaged that prince in a league againſt France, as ſoon as affairs had taken ſuch a turn that they no longer wanted his aſſiſtance, they thought no more of him than if there had been no ſuch perſon in the world. In all the negotiations between the allies, whether at Mantua or Rome, after the retreat of the French, cardinal Bambridge was never called to them, neither was there any mention of the king of England. The pope and the king of Arragon, ſatisfied with expelling the French, forſook Henry without troubling themſelves about his concerns. It even appears that he was not informed of theſe negotiations. We ſee in the collection of the public acts, that the 10th of November he ſtill gave full powers to his embaſſadors[i] at ſeveral courts, to treat of a league in favour of the pope, at the very time the pope was entirely neglecting the intereſts of England. About the ſame time Henry ſigned letters patents declaring he entered into the league concluded at Rome a year before, though ſince that Julius II. was in poſſeſſion of Ravenna, all la Romagna, Parma, Placentia, Reggio, and his deſires had been accompliſhed by Lewis's loſs of Genoa, and Milan, and by the emperor's renouncing the aſſembly of Piſa. Thus he was evidently the dupe of all theſe intrigues. He lent, without knowing it, his troops to Ferdinand to conquer Navarre. On the other hand, the terror of his arms was greatly ſubſervient to the pope's deſigns, as it hindered Lewis XII. from keeping in Italy troops, which he believed neceſſary for the defence of his kingdom againſt the Engliſh. This was the real aim of Julius and Ferdinand, and Henry was ſo blind as to engage, without neceſſity, in a war with France for their intereſt, imagining he was acting for his own.

Who would not have thought that Henry's experience ſhould have rendered him wiſer and more circumſpect? And yet, he was farther amuſed by theſe very princes, who told him, that having nothing more to fear in Italy, they were going to join all their forces to invade France, and if he would likewiſe act, he might eaſily recover Guienne and Normandy. Henry being perſuaded of their ſincerity, immediately ſent embaſſadors to Bruſſels[k], to conclude a league againſt France with the pope, the emperor, the king of Arragon, Charles of Auſtria, ſovereign of the Low Countries, and Margaret ducheſs dowager of Savoy, his aunt, who governed his dominions during his minority. Henry reckoned that the execution of the treaty would immediately follow the concluſion. But it will hereafter be ſeen, that if they concluded the league, it was only to draw money from him, and leave him to make war all alone. He was young and unexperienced, but withal ſo ſelf-conceited as to think himſelf wiſer than his council. Beſides, he had plenty of ready money in his coffers. What would perſons ſo ſubtle as Julius, Maximilian, and Ferdinand, deſire better than to have to deal with ſuch a prince as Henry? We have already ſeen this year 1512, how artfully they improved ſo favourable a diſpoſition, and we ſhall ſee in the following years, how very little he himſelf profited by what he might have learned by experience, during the courſe of the preſent. However this be, being reſolved to carry war into France, he aſſembled a parliament the 4th of November, to demand an aid of money. Shortly after, the commons, without examining too cloſely the reaſons which induced him to take up arms, granted him a ſubſidy[l],

A fifteenth, or quinvime, is a tax of money laid upon a city, borough, or other town through the realm, and ſo called, becauſe it amounted to a fifteenth part of that which the city or town had been valued at of old; and therefore every town knew what a fifteenth for themſelves did amount to, which was in proportion to the land or

and a poll-tax[m] upon all his ſubjects, for the expences of the war[n].

During the ſeſſion of the parliament, Henry received a bull from the pope, who, to encourage him to puſh the war vigorouſly againſt France, granted a plenary indulgence to all his ſubjects that ſhould aid him with their perſon or purſes. This was all the aſſiſtance he had from the pope for a war the ſole motive whereof, as it was pretended, was the defence of the church.

Nothing more remains to finiſh the account of the occurrences of this year, but briefly to mention the meaſures taken by Henry with regard to Scotland.

Whilſt Henry reſolved to carry war into France, he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to preſerve a good underſtanding with the king of Scotland. But it was almoſt impoſſible that England ſhould be in war with France, and Scotland not interpoſe. However, Henry imagined, that by the aſſurances he gave the king of Scotland of his intention to obſerve punctually the treaty of peace, ſhe ſhould prevent him from being concerned in the quarrel. James ſuffered him to think what he pleaſed, and in the mean time was preparing to aſſiſt France by a powerful diverſion, in caſe that kingdom was attacked. Upon the firſt report that the king of England was going to quarrel with Lewis XII. James took care to be provided with pretences to break with him. The affair of Breton furniſhed him with one, and he moreover ſought others. But the true reaſon of his acting was, that for ſome ages paſt the kings of England were grown ſo powerful, and had ſhewn ſo great a deſire to unite all Great-Britain under their dominion, that the Scots could little expect to reſiſt them, but by the aſſiſtance of France, which had ever protected them. It was therefore more neceſſary than juſt for Scotland to continue firm to the intereſts of France, and not ſuffer that crown to be diſabled to aſſiſt her allies. So not to ſwerve from this maxim, James IV. who had determined to go to Jeruſalem, laid aſide his deſign, when he heard there was like to be a rupture between France and England. He equipped a fleet, which he intended to ſend into France, under colour of preſenting it to queen Anne, wife of Lewis XII. But the fleet, in which was the largeſt ſhip that had yet been ſeen on the ſea, was loſt or diſabled by a ſtorm, and the admiral's ill conduct.

At laſt, Henry having proclaimed war with Lewis XII. James concluded a league againſt him with France the 22d of May this year. Shortly after, he prepared an army, but without divulging for what it was deſigned. His intent was to make an inroad into England, as ſoon as Henry had ſent his forces into France. Henry having notice of this armament, ſent two embaſſadors[o] into Scotland, under colour of adjuſting ſome little differences, but in reality to ſound the king's intentions. The embaſſadors acquainting king James that their maſter ſuſpected this armament was made in favour of France, James replied, That being equally an ally of both crowns, his deſign was to obſerve an exact neutrality. The embaſſadors prayed him to give that anſwer in writing, but he refuſed, on pretence it would breed a ſuſpicion in the king of France. Shortly after, Henry learnt by his ſpies, that a league was concluded between France and Scotland, and he even procured a copy of the treaty[p]. So, perceiving that a war with Scotland was unavoidable, he ſent the earl of Surrey into the northern parts, with power to levy an army, and act againſt Scotland in caſe of neceſſity[q].

[1513] The occurrences of this year, made great alterations in the intereſts of the princes concerned, and conſequently in their deſigns and meaſures.

Julius II. pleaſed with having expelled the French out of Italy, and ſo greatly increaſed his power by the acquiſition of ſo many places, was thinking, however, of ſeizing Ferrara. After that, he hoped, with the aſſiſtance of the Venetians and Florentines, to be able to drive the emperor out of Venice, though he had lately leagued with him. As for the reſt, he had no thoughts of making conqueſts in France, his ſole aim was to find Lewis XII. employment at home, and entirely diſſolve the remains of the council of Piſa, which however was not very formidable to him, ſince the emperor's diſingagement.

The king of Arragon's ſole view was to preſerve his late conqueſt of Navarre. To enjoy it in peace, the only way was to keep Lewis XII. elſewhere employed, or prevailed with him not to diſturb him. To that purpoſe it was neceſſary to uſe the terror of the arms of the allies, and particularly of the king of England, that the king of France being attacked from ſeveral quarters, might be induced of himſelf to deſire a peace, and leave him in poſſeſſion of Navarre. Ferdinand would not have ſcrupled to abandon his allies, provided he could obtain ſuch a peace as he wanted.

The emperor ſought only to draw money both from his friends and enemies. He was very ſenſible, that with his own forces alone it would be difficult to make conqueſts upon the Venetians, and that the pope, though his ally, did not wiſh it. But he was extremely reſerved to them, in order to procure the larger ſums in making a peace. On the other hand, he endeavoured to embroil matters as much as poſſible, and make new leagues, becauſe, in all the treaties of that kind, money was ſtill given him to maintain imaginary troops, which he never raiſed, at leaſt not ſo many as he promiſed.

The Venetians were extremely deſirous to end a deſtructive war, by which they were drained. Their ſole aim was to induce the emperor to be ſatisfied with a good ſum of money for the reſtitution of their towns, and thereby put their ſtate upon the ſame foot as before the league of Cambray. But as the emperor could not think of depriving himſelf of an entrance into Italy by the reſtitution of theſe places, it was their buſineſs to compel him in ſome meaſure by new leagues, which might make him apprehenſive of loſing them without any advantage. But as this was the ſenate's ſole view, they were always ready to break all their engagements, as ſoon as the emperor would hearken to reaſon.

The Switzers thought only of ſupporting Sforza at Milan, to have always in that duchy a prince who ſhould rely on their aſſiſtance. Conſequently, it was their intereſt to keep the king of France at a diſtance, and oppoſe all his attempts to recover it.

Lewis XII. extremely mortified at the ſucceſs of his enemies in Italy, ardently deſired to recover Genoa and Milan. To ſucceed, the aid of the Venetians, the emperor, or the Switzers, was neceſſary. It was alſo requiſite ſo to haſten the concluſion with one or other of the two laſt powers, that the expedition of the Milaneſe might be made in the ſpring, for fear it ſhould be prevented by the war, the king of England was preparing againſt him in Picardy.

Of all Lewis's enemies, Henry alone thought of making conqueſts in France, prepoſterouſly imagining his allies would make diverſions in ſeveral places to facilitate the execution of his deſigns. But he did not yet ſufficiently know them. The Venetians had been excluded out of the late league. The pope and king of Arragon had no deſire to attack France, but only to create Lewis troubles, which might hinder him from thinking of Italy. It was ſolely with this view that they feigned a willingneſs to ſecond the king of England. As for Maximilian, Henry and his council muſt have voluntarily deceived themſelves, to hope for any aſſiſtance from him.

James IV. king of Scotland, ſeeing France upon the point of being attacked by the king of England, was preparing to aſſiſt her, deeming his own and that kingdom's intereſts to be inſeparable. He eaſily perceived, Henry courted him only to hinder his interpoſing in the quarrel, and was willing to feed him with hopes of ſucceeding in his deſign. But he was however determined to break the peace, rather than leave a kingdom in danger, from which alone he could expect a ſpeedy and powerful protection in caſe of need. It is true, he had made a peace with Henry VII. and renewed it with Henry VIII. But it was when theſe princes had no quarrel with France, his ancient and conſtant ally. In his opinion, Henry by wantonly attacking France on frivolous pretences, violated indirectly the peace made with Scotland. At leaſt, James pretended, that in ſigning a peace with England, he was not bound to forſake France whenever the king of England ſhould think of attacking her.

Such were the diſpoſitions of all theſe potentates in the be-circuit belonging to it. Thus Camden ſays of Bath, geldabat pro viginti hidis. Whereas a ſubſidy was raiſed upon every particular man's goods or lands, and therefore was uncertain, becauſe the eſtate of every particular man is uncertain. Cowel's Dict.

He

ginning of the year 1513. We muſt ſee now by what means each endeavoured to attain his ends. This new ſcene will diſcover to us no leſs variety, artful managements, devices, and artifices than the former, ſince the actors and perſonages will ſtill be the ſame.

Whilſt Henry was ſeriouſly preparing for the war with France, his pretended allies were minding their own affairs, without regarding his intereſts. Since he had entered into the league of Rome, the allies, it ſeemed, ſhould have done nothing without his knowledge. And yet Julius II. had leagued with Maximilian, and excluded the Venetians, without informing him of it.

In the beginning of the year 1513, the emperor had no farther regard for his new allies, ſince he ſent and propoſed a freſh league to Lewis XII. upon new terms. He offered to aſſiſt him in recovering the Milaneſe, provided Lewis would aid him againſt the Venetians. Moreover, he demanded René, Lewis's ſecond daughter, for Charles of Auſtria, his grandſon, and that for her dower, Lewis ſhould aſſign him all his pretenſions to Milan and the kingdom of Naples. But that the performance of the treaty might not entirely depend upon the faith of the king of France, he required that the princeſs ſhould be immediately ſent to him, and Cremona and all Gierradadda delivered to him as ſoon as the duchy of Milan was recovered. Certainly, one cannot but admire the emperor's aſſurance in making theſe propoſals. He had not hitherto been able to continue the war againſt Venice, without the aſſiſtance of Lewis XII. nay, he thought he ſtill wanted it, and yet made him an offer of his aid to recover the Milaneſe. But upon what terms? Why, after Lewis ſhould have been at a vaſt expence to recover that duchy, he was to reſign it to the emperor's grandſon, with his pretenſions to Naples. This is called uſing people like true dupes. But after the ill turn Maximilian had lately ſerved Lewis XII. it is not very likely that he believed his propoſals would be accepted. Probably, he made them only to hinder Lewis from joining with the Venetians. At the ſame time he intended to inſpire theſe with jealouſy, and a fear of his uniting with France, that this fear might induce them to offer him more advantageous conditions.

Lewis XII. hearkened to theſe propoſals, as if he had ſome deſign to accept them, becauſe he thereby hoped to create ſuſpicions in the Switzers and Venetians, and incline them the ſooner to join with him. As for the Venetians, they deſired nothing more than a ſtrict union with France, and if any thing retarded the negotiation, it was only the hope of an agreement with the emperor, in which caſe they would have gladly renounced all ſorts of leagues. As for the Switzers, it was not poſſible for Lewis XII. to gain them to his ſide, though he offered them more than the firſt was demanded. Beſides their hatred of him, the face of their affairs was altered, ſince the reſtoration of Sforza to Milan. Whilſt that prince was in exile, it was doubtful, whether in good policy they ought to engage in a war with France for his ſake. But ſince he was by their aſſiſtance in poſſeſſion of the duchy, their honour and intereſt required their utmoſt endeavours to ſupport him[r]. However this be, Lewis's negotiation with the Switzers not ſucceeding, he was under a neceſſity to join in a league either with the emperor or with Venice, otherwiſe he could little expect to recover Milan.

In the mean time the Venetians ſent and propoſed a league to him upon the ſame terms with that of the year 1498, namely, that they would aſſiſt him to recover Milaneſe, provided he would reſign Cremona, and Gierradadda. Lewis readily liſtened to their offers, but the Venetians themſelves did not haſten the concluſion, by reaſon of their circumſtances preſently after.

The king of Arragon having good intelligence of what paſſed between Lewis XII. and the Venetians, informed the emperor, and adviſed him to offer Verona to the Venetians, for a ſum of money. This was the ſubject of a long, though fruitleſs negotiation.

Whilſt the affairs of Italy were in this ſtate of uncertainty, Julius II. who was preparing to beſiege Ferrara, in the beginning of the ſpring, died the 21ſt of February, having kindled a flame which his death could not extinguiſh[s]. As ſoon as the news reached the viceroy of Naples, who was ſtill with his army in Lombardy, he approached Placentia, and entering without oppoſition, reſtored that place to the duke of Milan. Parma quickly followed the example of Placentia, and was likewiſe delivered to the ſame prince. No one was in haſte to ſend aſſiſtance to the future pope, to preſerve theſe places for him. On the contrary, the princes of Italy could not ſee without uneaſineſs, that the popes had footing in Lombardy, under a pretence which might, upon occaſion, be uſed againſt moſt of them.

On the 11th of March, cardinal John de Medici, who eleven months before was taken priſoner at the battle of Ravenna, was elected pope, and aſſumed the name of Leo X. He was but thirty-ſeven years old, but had however great experience, having been employed in divers important affairs in the late pontificate. He was neither ſo hot nor ſo haughty as Julius II. his predeceſſor, but was much more artful and politic. I ſhall have occaſion hereafter to add to his portraiture ſome ſtrokes, which will more fully ſhew his genius and character.

Before the death of Julius II. Ferdinand was employed in framing a ſcheme perfectly anſwering the name he had in the world. The beginning of the year he had ſent two monks into France, to make ſome overtures to Lewis XII. by means of queen Ann, to whom they had acceſs. But as Lewis perceived it was not poſſible to make a peace, or even a truce with Ferdinand, without leaving him in poſſeſſion of Navarre, he had appeared at firſt very cold. But at length, conſidering that he could hardly expect to recover the duchy of Milan, whilſt the king of Arragon was his enemy, becauſe it was he that excited the king of England his ſon-in-law, he determined, though unwillingly, to conclude with him a truce, for a year, on condition the king of England was included, and Italy excepted. He reckoned, that during this truce he ſhould with eaſe be able to re-conquer the duchy of Milan, after which, he ſhould be ſufficiently ſtrong to defend his own kingdom againſt the Engliſh. Nothing was farther from Henry's thoughts than ſuch a truce, which would have broke all his meaſures, and yet, Ferdinand doubted not to act in his name, as if he was ſure of his conſent. The affair was begun in January, and the 8th of February, Lewis impowered Odet de Foix, lord of Lautrec, to treat with Ferdinand's commiſſioners. In ſhort, the treaty was concluded at Orthez, in Bearn, the 1ſt of April. The treaty ran, that there ſhould be a truce for a year, out of Italy, between the king of France, the king of Scotland, the duke of Guelders, on the one part; and on the other, the emperor, the king of Arragon, the queen of Caſtile, and the king of England. Lewis XII. undertook to procure the king of Scotland, and the duke of Guelders's conſent, and Ferdinand engaged for the king of England. But as Ferdinand knew he ſhould not eaſily obtain Henry's conſent, he cauſed it to be inſerted in the treaty, that it ſhould be ratified within a month by himſelf and Lewis XII. but that the other parties ſhould be allowed two months, with expreſs declaration, that with regard to the emperor, the king of England, the king of Scotland, and the duke of Guelders, the truce ſhould take place, but from the day of the exchange to the ratifications. Never perhaps was ſeen any thing ſo bold as what Ferdinand did on this occaſion. He perfectly knew that Henry would never agree to the truce, and yet took upon him to procure his conſent, as if he had been fully empowered to that end. The laſt article, concerning the ratification, plainly diſcovers his thoughts. But it is ſtill more viſible, in that he not only took no ſtep to perſuade Henry to do what he ſeemed to deſire, but even concealed from him the truce as far as poſſible.

As ſoon as the treaty was ſigned, Ferdinand took care to publiſh his complaints, that he had been very ill uſed by the allies of the league, that the pope and Venetians had acquired many places, but for his part he had gained nothing at all, and yet the allies refuſed to continue the ſupply to which they were bound, though the king of France ſtill poſſeſſed ſeveral towns in Italy, and the Spaniſh army was ſtill in the ſervice of the league. But this was only to prepare people, to ſee with leſs ſurpriſe and indignation, the private truce he had juſt made with France, without the participation of his allies.

The eyes of the public were fixed upon the new pope, to ſee what courſe he would take. But he did not long leave the politician in ſuſpence. Though, whilſt a cardinal, he did not entirely approve of Julius IId's conduct, he purſued however his plan as ſoon as he was in his place. He was doubly concerned to keep the French out of Italy: firſt, as pope, ſince neighbours ſo powerful could not but be formidable to him. Secondly, as head of the houſe of the Medici, he had

[r] He had promiſed to pay them one hundred and fifty thouſand ducats upon his reſtoration to Milan, and forty thouſand yearly, for five and twenty years. Guicciard, l. 11.

[s] He took the name of Julius from his inclination to war, in memory of Julius Cæſar. He commanded his army in perſon againſt the French; and it is ſaid, as he marched over a bridge on the Tiber, he threw St. Peter's keys into the river and called for St. Paul's ſword.

cauſe to fear, that if Lewis XII. recovered the Milaneſe, he would undertake to reſtore the Florentines to their liberty. In a word, he wiſhed to put an end to the council of Piſa, which could be done only by engaging Lewis XII. in wars, which ſhould compel him to make his peace with the church. Ferdinand had likewiſe the ſame views, to keep the king of France at a diſtance from Navarre, Rouſſillon, and the kingdom of Naples. As for the emperor, it was his intereſt to diſable France to aſſiſt the Venetians. But they had none of them any deſire to carry war into France, but only ſo to manage, that this diverſion might be made at another's expence.

To that purpoſe they unanimouſly caſt their eyes upon Henry VIII. as a prince extremely proper to execute their deſigns. He had ready money, warlike ſubjects, and could with eaſe tranſport troops into ſome part of France remote from the borders of Spain and Italy. In fine, he was very deſirous to ſignalize himſelf by illuſtrious actions, and ſcrupled not to ſhew it publicly. So, each of them laboured with all his power to confirm him in his deſign, to wage war with France, by putting him in hopes of being vigorouſly ſupported, though nothing was farther from their thoughts. Leo X. was no ſooner in the papal chair, but under colour of notifying his promotion, ſent him a letter, aſſuring him, that he was fully determined to adhere to the league formed by Julius II. his predeceſſor, and even to conclude a new one with England. But, at the ſame time, he preſſed the emperor to make a peace with Venice, and negotiated with the Venetians to hinder their union with France, promiſing to uſe all his intereſt with the emperor to procure them an honourable and advantageous peace. All theſe practices could not be managed ſo privately but the king of France had ſome intelligence of them, ſo that he ſoon grew very jealous of the new pope.

Henry did not want much ſollicitation to carry his arms into France. His thoughts were already bent upon war. So, finding the pope, emperor, and king of Arragon, promiſed him to act vigorouſly, he did not queſtion the favourableneſs of the opportunity to recover good part of what his predeceſſors had formerly loſt. And therefore, he readily agreed to form a new league with them, not for the affairs of Italy, with which he was probably diſguſted, but to attack France from ſeveral quarters. And that the league might be the more ſecret, it was agreed, that it ſhould be negotiated at Mechlin, between Margaret, of Auſtria, governeſs of the Low Countries, authoriſed by the emperor, her father, and the embaſſadors of England[t], and that afterwards it ſhould be approved and ratified by the pope, the emperor, and Ferdinand. This was another ſnare laid for Henry, which he perceived not till it was too late to avoid it. Though Ferdinand was then upon the point of concluding the truce with the king of France, he made himſelf, however, one of the principal parties in this league, as repugnant as it was to the truce. The ſubſtance of the new league concluded at Mechlin the 5th of April, about the ſame time the truce was ſigned at Orthez, was as follows:

That within thirty days after the date of this treaty, each of the confederates ſhould proclaim war with the king of France, and within two months invade him, viz. the pope in Providence or Dauphiné: the emperor in ſome place out of Italy: the king of Arragon in Bearn, Guienne, or Languedoc: the king of England in Guienne, Normandy, or Picardy, and that their armies ſhould be ſtrong and well provided with all things.

That the emperor (if he had not yet done it) ſhould revoke all his proceedings in favour of the council of Piſa [This ſhews how little Henry or his plenipotentiaries knew of what paſſed at Rome, ſince it was now three months or more, that the emperor had abandoned that council.]

That the pope ſhould thunder his cenſures againſt all the oppoſers of this league and abetters of the contrary party.

That towards the expences of the war, the king of England ſhould give the emperor a hundred thouſand crowns of gold, at three payments, thirty-five thouſand preſently after the declaration of the war, as much more when the war was begun, and thirty thouſand within three months after.

That the emperor meant not to enter into this league as guardian to Charles, his grandſon.

That the emperor and king of England ſhould ratify the treaty within a month, and the pope and king of Arragon within two months, with this expreſs declaration, that in caſe the pope and the king of Arragon ſhould not ratify the treaty by the time appointed, it ſhould however be in force between the emperor and the king of England.

Laſtly, the confederates renounced all exceptions whatever, and particularly that which might be made to another's ſtipulating for them.

Never perhaps was ſeen more inſincerity than in this whole negotiation, ſince of all the confederates Henry alone intended to keep his word. Leo X. ratified not the treaty: Ferdinand, as will be ſeen preſently, diſavowed his embaſſador: as for the emperor, he received the money from the king, without troubling himſelf to perform his engagements. Thus Henry was the conſtant dupe of theſe princes, who were a little too politic for him.

The treaty being brought to London. Lewis Carroz de Villaragud, Ferdinand's embaſſador, approved and ratified it, by letters patent of April 18th. He declared in theſe letters, that though he had a ſufficient power from the king, his maſter, to conclude the league with the plenipotentiaries of the confederate princes, he had not been able, for certain weighty reaſons, to be preſent at the ſigning at Mechlin. But being very ſure, the treaty contained only what was agreeable to the king his maſter, who deſired nothing more earneſtly than its execution, he approved and ratified, in the ſaid king's name, all the articles of the treaty. And to remove all occaſion of diſputing the validity of his ratification, he inſerted the treaty, word for word, in his letters of ratification, and concluded it again with the earl of Surrey, the king of England's commiſſioner, by virtue of a full power received for that purpoſe. Afterwards, the 25th of the ſame month, he ſwore to the obſervance of the articles upon the ſouls of Ferdinand, king of Arragon, and Jane, queen of Caſtile. It is uncertain whether the embaſſador was himſelf deceived, or whether knowing it, voluntarily helped to impoſe upon Henry. All that can be ſaid is, that the great precautions taken to hinder his being ſuſpected of inſincerity, are not very common with thoſe who intend to act fairly.

It muſt doubtleſs be thought ſtrange, that a pope, an emperor, and a king of Spain, ſhould thus join, to lay ſuch a ſnare for a young prince of twenty-one years of age, and who was even ſon-in-law to one of them. And yet it is ſcarce to be doubted, that the league concluded at Mechlin, in the abſence of the pope's and king of Arragon's embaſſadors, was thus projected to entangle Henry, under colour of keeping it the more ſecret. They ſucceeded ſo well, that Henry relying upon the diverſions, his pretended allies would make in Guienne, Bearn, Providence, Dauphiné, Burgundy flattered himſelf that he might eaſily extend his conqueſts in Picardy. To that end, he made extraordinary preparations by ſea and land, which put him to a vaſt expence. But whilſt we leave him employed in preparing for the next campaign, it will be neceſſary to relate what paſſed in Italy.

The Venetians not being able to obtain a peace from the emperor, who pretended to ſubject them to very unreaſonable terms, ſollicited a freſh the nogotiation they had began with France. On the other hand, Lewis XII. to whom time was precious, readily accepted their propoſals. Thus the league between that monarch and the Venetians was quickly concluded, upon the ſame foot as that of the year 1498. This was tranſacted by Andrew Gritti, who being then priſoner in France, was commiſſioned to conclude it in the ſenate's name. Preſently after he was releaſed, as well as Alviano, who returning to Venice, was made general of the forces of the republic.

When Lewis XII. had concluded his treaty with the Venetians, he ordered his troops to march into Italy, where they arrived in June. As, by the treaty of truce concluded at Orthez, Henry was allowed two months to ſend his pretended ratification, and as that term was not yet expired, very probably Lewis ſtill flattered himſelf that Henry would perform what the king of Arragon had promiſed for him, otherwiſe he would not doubtleſs have ſent his beſt troops into Italy. Mean while the preparations which were continued in England, and the hoſtilities already begun at ſea ſince April, between the French and Engliſh, ſhould have convinced him that Ferdinand had deceived him. However that was, the French army commanded by la Trimouille, being arrived upon the borders of the Milaneſe, Maximilian Sforza quitted his capital, and retired among the Switzers, who were, to the number of ſeven or eight thouſand men, at Como and Novarra, where they expected ſupplies from their own country.

[t] Which were ſir Edward Poynings, controller of the houſhold, John Yonge, maſter of the rolls, ſir Thomas Boleyn, and ſir Richard Wyngfield. Rymer's Fœd. tom. xiii. p. 354.

In

Upon the approach of the French, Raymond de Cordona, who was ſtill in Lombardy with the Spaniſh army, retired without making the leaſt motion to aſſiſt the duke of Milan, though Italy was not included in the truce of Orthez. Very likely Ferdinand was not diſpleaſed, that the French ſhould make ſome progreſs in the Milaneſe, to keep them employed there, whilſt Henry carried war into Picardy. At leaſt, any other reaſons of his general's conduct can ſcarce be imagined. The duke of Milan having no other forces but the Switzers to oppoſe to the French, Milan and the reſt of the towns of the duchy, except Como and Novarra, ſubmitted to la Trimouille, without offering to reſiſt, whilſt the Switzers, who were not ſtrong enough to take the field, remained immured within the walls of theſe two places. Whilſt the French were making theſe conqueſts, Alviano took for the Venetians, Peſchiera, Breſcia, Valeggio, and at laſt, Cremona, after a fruitleſs attempt to become maſter of Verona by intelligence.

About this time the faction of the Adornos, who in Genoa ſided with France, found means to become ſuperior, and put the city again under the dominion of the king.

Lewis XII. was now in poſſeſſion of the whole Milaneſe, except Como and Novarra. La Trimouille knowing the Switzers expected a ſtrong reinforcement from their own country thought he ſhould make haſte and beſiege Novarra, before the arrival of thoſe troops. He marched therefore to the town, and in the expectation of taking it immediately, furiouſly ſtormed it. But whatever bravery the French ſhewed upon this occaſion, they were repulſed with a very great loſs, which even obliged the general to retire to Riotra, a village about two miles from Novarra. Mean while, the Switzers proud of repulſing ſo terrible an aſſault, and beginning to deſpiſe the French, before whom they had not yet dared to appear in the field, ſuddenly reſolved to ſally out of Novarra, and attack the enemy in their camp. This reſolution was immediately executed, to the aſtoniſhment of the French, who not being able to reſiſt the unexpected attack, were entirely routed. But that was not all. Their conſternation after the defeat was ſo great, that they thought it their only ſafety to repaſs the mountains, and with all poſſible diligence return into France. The news of their flight reaching Genoa, the Adornos quitted the city to the Fregoſas their enemies, who choſe for doge Octavian Fregoſa, head of their family and faction. Thus, within the ſpace of a month, Lewis XII. got and loſt Genoa and Milan, and Maximilian Sforza, who had been expelled out of his duchy, took poſſeſſion again. But it was the latter end of the year before he recovered the caſtles of Milan and Cremona, kept by the French and Venetians.

The revolution in the king of France's affairs, occaſioned the like in thoſe of the Venetians. Alviano, their general, no ſooner heard of the French army's misfortune, but he haſtily retired into the territories of Venice, and beſieged Verona. But Raymund de Cordona, who had affected a ſort of unetrality whilſt the French were in the Milaneſe, knowing they were out of Italy, turned his forces againſt Alviano. He not only forced him to raiſe the ſiege of Verona, but even purſuing him from place to place, obtained over him a ſignal victory, which obliged the Venetians to refer their differences to the pope, though he had declared againſt them by aſſiſting the emperor. The neceſſity of their affairs compelled them to take that ſtep, in order to gain time. They had loſt all their towns in the Milaneſe, and their own country had been horribly ravaged by the Spaniſh troops, even within ſight of Venice.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Italy, Henry was preparing to go into France with a numerous army. But Before I ſpeak of the ſucceſs of his firſt campaign, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention what paſſed at his own court, and which it will be worth while to inſiſt upon a moment. Thomas Wolſey had been introduced to court by the biſhop of Wincheſter. Preſently after, he was made privy-counſellor, and as ſuch had opportunity to make himſelf better known to the king, and gain his eſteem, as well by his own qualifications, as by the intereſt of the biſhop his benefactor, who ceaſed not to cauſe the king to admire the ſtrength of his genius, and obſerve how fit he was for the greateſt affairs. Wolſey on his part neglected not what he thought capable of encreaſing the king's good opinion of him. To an indefatigable application, and extreme diligence in all the affairs he was charged with, he added a blind condeſcenſion for all his maſter's paſſions. The king was highly pleaſed to ſee in his court and council, a churchman leſs rigid and ſcrupulous than the archbiſhop of Canterbury, or the old biſhop of Wincheſter. Wolſey danced, ſang, laughed, and played with the young courtiers who were moſt in favour; and if Polydore Virgil is to be credited, who loved him not, neither had reaſon to love him, he carried his complaiſance ſo far as to lend the king his houſe for his moſt ſecret pleaſures. However that be, his condeſcenſion, joined to his talents for buſineſs, and to his knowledge in divinity which he had acquired, as well as the king, by reading the works of Thomas Aquinas, ſoon gave him the advantage over all the other courtiers. When he ſaw himſelf well fixed, he made it his particular buſineſs to ſhew the king his errors ſince his acceſſion to the throne, and how his youth had been abuſed. By this method he inſinuated to him by degrees, that he was ill-ſerved, and wanted an able miniſter, capaple of eaſing him in the adminiſtration of the moſt weighty affairs, and of ſhewing him the conſequences. In a word, he ſo managed, that he became himſelf that miniſter which he adviſed the king to ſeek, and by degrees was intruſted with the care and conduct of the king's principal affairs. His credit rendered him haughty, proud, inſolent, and ungrateful to his old friends. In ſhort, he was taxed with all the failings which favourites are uſually charged with, and which indeed few favourites can avoid. Wolſey, like moſt others, grew extremely odious, chiefly becauſe his counſels were always ſelf-intereſted, which the event diſcovered to all but the king, who was blind in that reſpect. His favour and credit, cauſed the moſt potent princes of Europe to ſtrive to gain him to their intereſts, and to glory, at leaſt outwardly, in being of the number of his friends. The reaſon is, becauſe during this reign, the affairs of Europe were in ſuch a ſituation, that England was capable of making the balance incline to the ſide ſhe eſpouſed. Wolſey knew how to improve this advantage, to render himſelf the richeſt and moſt powerful ſubject that ever was, but laboured not with the ſame ardour for his maſter's honour, as for his own intereſt. After he was declared prime-miniſter, he managed, during the ſpace of ſeventeen years, all the king's affairs both foreign and domeſtic [u].

Before the king was ready to paſs into France, the war was begun at ſea. In April, admiral Howard had put to ſea with thirty-two ſhips of war [w], whilſt the French fleet remained at Breſt, expecting ſix gallies, which Pregent [x] was to bring from Marſeilles. The Engliſh admiral approaching Breſt, reſolved to attack the French ſhips as they lay at anchor. But upon notice that Pregent was arrived at Conquet, he ſailed that way, to endeavour to take the ſix gallies, and attacked them indeed with great bravery. But during the fight his ſhip being grappled with Pregent's galley, he entered it ſword in hand, and at firſt cauſed great diſorder. Unhappily, the galley being afterwards diſingaged, he was left in the hands of his enemies, with a few attendants, and being unknown, was knocked over-board with a half-pike. The loſs of the admiral cauſed ſuch a conſternation in the Engliſh fleet, that they durſt not continue the fight [y]. The news being carried to court, the king conferred the office of lord admiral upon Thomas Howard brother of the deceaſed. Mean while, as the French fleet, by receiving a ſtrong reinforcement, was become ſuperior, the Engliſh returned to ſome port in England, expecting the arrival of the new admiral. The French, encouraged by the retreat of the Engliſh, ſailed to the coaſt of England, and even made a deſcent in Suſſex, and carried away ſome booty.

Mean time, Henry was preparing to carry war into France, though none of his pretended allies had yet made the leaſt ſtep towards performing the treaty of Mechlin. Leo X. had not ratified the treaty, and nothing was farther from his thoughts, than the ſending of an army into Provence or Dupahine. The emperor began to ſeek excuſes not to enter Burgundy with an army, though he had poſitively promiſed it. As for the king of Arragon, he had not only concealed from Henry his one year's truce with France, but was even trying to amuſe him with hopes, that he was inſtantly going to make a powerful diverſion in Guienne. He ſo artfully acted his part, that it was June before Henry was fully informed of the truce of Orthez. Provoked at ſuch a fraud, he diſpatched an embaſſador to the king his father-in-law, to upbraid him with breach of faith, and ſummon him to execute the treaty of Mechlin, or rather, that ſigned by his embaſſador in his name at London. Whereupon Ferdinand ſeeing he could no longer wear the maſk, diſavowed his embaſſador, and ſaid, he had exceeded his inſtructions. He confeſſed however, he had concluded a truce for a year with Lewis XII. being forced by the neceſſity of his affairs, but promiſed to do wonders when it was expired, and adviſed his ſon-in-law to accept of the truce, that they might afterwards unite their forces, and jointly attack the common enemy. But Henry could no longer rely upon ſuch promiſes. Thus, by the artifices of the pope, the emperor, and Ferdinand, he ſaw himſelf engaged to carry war alone into the enemy's country, which was to have been invaded in four ſeveral quarters. He was not convinced of their inſincerity till it was almoſt too late to recede, the greateſt part of his army having already paſſed the ſea, and juſt entering upon action. Happily for him, Lewis XII. deceived by the treaty of truce concluded at Orthez, had now ſent his beſt troops into Italy, imagining Henry would accept of the truce, according to the king of Arragon's engagement.

Shortly after, Henry received a letter from the emperor, with many excuſes, that it was impoſſible for him this year to lead an army into Burgundy, but he would punctually perform his engagement next year. Mean while, to ſhew, he meant not to forſake him, he ſaid, he would come and ſerve as volunteer in his army. Thus, of the four allies who were to act at once againſt France, Henry alone was charged with the burden of the war. Edward IV. his grandfather, had been formerly in much the ſame caſe, and thought it no diſhonour to make a ſpeedy peace with Lewis XI. when diſappointed by his allies. If Henry had followed his example, he would have terribly embarraſſed thoſe by whom he was deceived, but being greedy of glory, would ſhew he had no occaſion for them. He had ſo relied on the ſincerity of his allies, that though the treaty of Mechlin was not to be ratified by the pope and the king of Arragon till the 5th of June, he had cauſed the beſt part of his army to paſs over to Calais in the middle of May. It is evident, the ratification of the treaty of Mechlin had been ſo long retarded, only to engage Henry beyond a poſſibility of receding.

Before the departure of the firſt troops[a], Henry had beheaded the earl of Suffolk, priſoner in the Tower ever ſince the reign of Henry VII. who gave Philip I. king of Caſtile, a poſitive promiſe to ſpare that lord's life. But probably, he gave the prince, his ſon, orders like thoſe given by king David to Solomon, with reſpect to Joab. The hiſtorians have endeavoured of diſcover Henry's inducement at ſuch a juncture to put the earl of Suffolk to death, who was not in condition to hurt him. But they have ſaid nothing ſatisfactory[a].

The two bodies of troops tranſported to Calais, departed thence the 17th of June[b], under the command of the earl of Shrewſbury[c] and the lord Herbert[d], in order to march to Terouenne, to which they laid ſiege[e]. But the king departed not from England till the 30th of the ſame month, having conſtituted queen Catherine regent[f]. He arrived the ſame day at Calais, being attended by Thomas Wolſey, his prime-miniſter, Charles Brandon, another favourite lately made viſcount Liſle[g], with many other lords[h]. Whilſt the troops continued the ſiege of Terouenne he remained at Calais with nine thouſand men, ready to march upon the firſt occaſion. At laſt, having certain advice that the duke of Longueville was approaching to relieve the town, he haſtened from Calais to the ſiege, where he arrived the 4th of Auguſt. On the 9th the emperor came and conferred with him between Aire and Terouenne, and three days after repaired to the camp, and ſerved as volunteer under the king, making no ſcruple to receive a hundred crowns a day for his pay. By this mark of eſteem and the imaginary honour he did the king, he meant to make amends for his breach of faith, and the hundred thouſand crowns received for an expedition which he had never intended to make.

Mean time the duke of Longueville, who commanded the French army, approaching Terouenne, Henry paſſed the Lys with the greateſt part of his troops, in order to meet him. The two armies engaged, but not long. For the fight was hardly begun, when the French, by what accident is unknown, ran away in confuſion, without any poſſibility of their being rallied. But the principal officers choſe rather to be taken priſoners than follow ſo diſhonourable an example. The duke of Longueville was of the number, with the chevalier Bayard, la Fayette, Buſſi d'Amboiſe, and ſome others of the greateſt diſtinction. This battle, if ſuch a rout may be ſo termed, was called, the battle of Guinegaſte, and by ſome, the battle of ſpurs, becauſe the French made more uſe of their ſpurs than their ſwords Whilſt the two armies were in view, before the engagement, a body of French attempted to introduce a convoy of proviſions into the town, but were repulſed by the lord Herbert, who was left to guard the trenches. After the battle, the beſieged deſpairing of relief, ſurrendered the city the 22d of Auguſt, and the king, in company with the emperor, entered the 24th.

It ſeemed to be Henry's deſtiny to be always the emperor's dupe. After the taking of Terouenne, Maximilian, who had only ſerved at the ſiege as volunteer, found means to have the place delivered to him, and immediately ordered it to be demoliſhed. It is hard to conceive what induced Henry to this condeſcenſion. All that can be conjectured is, that there was perhaps in the capitulation, ſome article againſt the razing of the place, but that altering his mind, he was willing to ſave his honour by delivering it to the emperor. Though this were the caſe, there would be no leſs reaſon to be ſurpriſed at his management. 'Tis eaſy to perceive it was very advantageous to Charles of Auſtria, grandſon to Maximilian, that Terouenne belonged neither to the French nor to the Engliſh. But what intereſt could Henry have to loſe ſo many men, and ſo much time, to take a place in order to have it razed in favour of Maximilian, who had not merited ſuch a condeſcenſion[i]?

[a] The chief reaſon, as my lord Herbert and others ſay, was for fear, in caſe of the king's death in France, the people being well affected to the houſe of York, ſhould take him out of the Tower, and make him king. Edmund de la Pole, was ſon of John de la Pole duke of Suffolk, by Elizabeth ſiſter of Edward IV. The

As the ſeaſon was not yet far advanced, Henry reſolved, before the end of the campaign, to beſiege Tournay, whether he heard the place was ill provided, or the emperor's intrigues had again influenced his council is uncertain. For, the conqueſt of Tournay, which lies at ſome diſtance from Calais, was much leſs advantageous to Henry than to the archduke Charles, whoſe dominions it ſecured; whereas Boulogne would have been, without doubt, much more convenient for the king, by reaſon of the neighbourhood of Calais. Nevertheleſs the ſiege of Tournay was reſolved, probably becauſe the emperor hoped the king would give him that place as he had done Terouenne. But he found againſt him intereſts ſtronger than thoſe of the king himſelf, which oppoſed his deſigns.

Whilſt the preparations were making for the ſiege, Henry paid a viſit to Margaret, governeſs of the Low-Countries, who was at Liſle, and ſtaid three days with her. Then he returned to his army which was marching to Tournay [k], but the emperor left the king upon ſome diſguſt, the reaſon whereof is unknown. Next day, the 15th of September, the army arrived before Tournay, which held out but ſeven or eight days [l]. Henry entered the city, on the 24th [m], a month after his entry into Terouenne. By the capitulation, the inhabitants were to have their antient privileges, upon paying to Henry a ſmall annual acknowledgment of four thouſand livres Tournois, for ten years only [n].

After the taking of Tournay, the king calling a council of war, it was debated, whether it was proper to keep the place, which ſeemed to be difficult, by reaſon of its diſtance from Calais. But after a long debate, it was reſolved to keep it, and leave for governor ſir Edward Poynings with a ſtrong garriſon. The contrariety of the two reſolutions with reſpect to Terouenne and Tournay will, perhaps, appear ſtrange. The firſt of theſe places, which was neareſt Calais, and ſecured the road from Calais to Tournay, was demoliſhed. The ſecond, which could not without great difficulty be relieved, was deemed neceſſary to be kept. This contrariety could proceed only from Wolſey's intereſt, who influenced the council as he pleaſed. He had caſt his eyes on the biſhopric of Tournay, as a thing very convenient for him, whereas that of Terouenne was nothing in compariſon. Accordingly he afterwards found means to obtain the adminiſtration of that ſee, under colour, that the biſhop refuſed to ſwear fealty to the king. This is the true reaſon why it was reſolved to keep Tournay, and perhaps of undertaking the ſiege [o].

Next day after the king's entry into Tournay, the princeſs Margaret ducheſs-dowager of Savoy, and the archduke Charles her nephew, came to congratulate him upon his new conqueſt. The fortnight they ſtayed with him, he took care to entertain them with all ſorts of diverſions, as juſts, tournaments, running at the ring, balls, maſquerades, and the like. Mean while, amidſt all theſe diverſions, the miniſters of the two courts began a treaty, which was concluded a few days after.

Margaret and Charles being returned to Liſle, Henry repaid their viſit, and was received with all imaginable reſpect and civility. Some days after, on the 15th of October, they ſigned a treaty, importing, That though Henry had bound himſelf not to repaſs into England till the war was ended, he ſhould however have liberty to return thither with his army.

That during the winter, the emperor ſhould keep in Artois and Hainault four thouſand horſe and ſix thouſand foot, for the defence as well of Tournay and the Tournaiſis, as of the archduke's dominions.

That for the maintenance of theſe troops, Henry ſhould pay the emperor two hundred thouſand crowns at ſeveral payments.

That before the 1ſt of June the next year, Henry ſhould carry war into Guienne, Normandy, or Picardy, and the emperor into ſome other province of France.

That before the 15th of May, the emperor, the ducheſs Margaret, the archduke Charles, the king of England, queen Catherine, the princeſs Mary, ſhould meet altogether at Calais to celebrate the archduke's marriage with the princeſs Mary, purſuant to the treaty concluded between the emperor and the late king Henry VII.

Whatever was to be done, Henry muſt always find money. Maximilian had already received a hundred thouſand crowns of gold, without having executed any of his engagements entered into by the treaty of Mechlin, and found means to procure two hundred thouſand more by the preſent treaty, beſides the advantage of razing Terouenne, which very much annoyed his grandſon the archduke's dominions. Nay, it is very probable, the diſguſt which made him quit the king's army, proceeded from his not being able to perſuade him to promiſe him Tournay alſo when taken. This manifeſtly ſhews, he looked upon Henry as a novice eaſily to be enſnared. Certainly Henry's many falſe ſteps in the beginning of his reign can only be excuſed by his little knowledge of the character of the princes with whom he treated.

It cannot be doubted, that the king of Arragon was of the ſame opinion concerning Henry his ſon-in-law. Notwithſtanding the ill turn he had ſerved him laſt year, he had ſtill the aſſurance to ſend him an embaſſador at Liſle to propoſe a new league, as if his word had been more to be relied on than ſome months before. But it does not appear that Henry was then inclined to truſt to his promiſes.

Henry departed from Liſle the 17th of October, and on the 24th arrived at his palace at Richmond after a glorious campaign. I call it glorious, if the ſucceſs of his arms be only conſidered. But in another reſpect it was not very honourable, ſince he had been the dupe of the pope, the emperor and the king of Arragon, who had thrown upon him the whole burden of the war, which ſhould have been common to all the four. It is true, he had taken Terouenne and Tournay. But the firſt of theſe places being given to the emperor and razed, was to him of no benefit. As for Tournay, he never reaped any conſiderable advantage from it, by reaſon of its diſtance from Calais. Wolſey was the only gainer by it, the biſhopric of that city, which he obtained in the end, together with the abbey of St. Amand, being of a much greater revenue than what the king himſelf received from Tournay and its territory.

The ill ſucceſs of the Italian campaign had put Lewis XIIth's affairs in a bad ſituation, and the loſs of the battle of Guinegaſte with the taking of Terouenne and Tournay, had entirely diſordered them. But this was a trifle in compariſon of the danger France was in by a Swiſs invaſion, after the French were driven out of the Milaneſe. The warlike Switzers, excited againſt Lewis by the pope and the emperor, not being ſatisfied with their advantages over him in Italy, reſolved to attack him in his own kingdom. The opportunity was favourable, by reaſon of the ſeveral foremention junctures. To improve the opportunity, therefore, the Switzers levied fifteen thouſand men [p], to whom the emperor joined all the nobility of Franche Compté, and ſome German horſe, under the command of Ulric, duke of Wirtemberg. This army entering the duchy of Burgundy, encamped before Dijon, where la Trimouille lately returned from Italy, had ſhut himſelf up with ſome troops [q]; but that place was ſo weak, that there was no likelihood of keeping it. He defended it however ſix weeks. But at laſt, ſeeing that by the loſs of Dijon, not only Burgundy, but all the reſt of France would be in great danger, he thought he ſhould prevent it without waiting the king's orders, which might come too late. By a capitulation with the Switzers, he bound himſelf to pay them four hundred thouſand crowns [r], of which he paid down twenty thouſand, and promiſed in the king's name, that he would deſiſt from all his pretentions to the duchy of Milan. The Switzers, pleaſed with their expedition, retired into their own country, carrying with them four hoſtages, who found means to eſcape when they knew the king refuſed to ratify the capitulation.

and not doubting that the pope and the king of Arragon created him all theſe troubles, reſolved at laſt to be reconciled with the pope. This reconciliation was the more eaſy, as Leo X. had not like Julius II. a perſonal enmity againſt him. Since the French were out of Italy, he had nothing to demand of the king but the diſſolving of the council of Piſa, without which indeed he could not conſent to a peace. The council was grown ſo thin, that Lewis in forſaking it, made no great ſacrifice to the pope. It is true, the ſubmitting in a point he had hitherto openly maintained, ſeemed to be a little diſhonourable. But as the council of Piſa had been properly ſummoned againſt Julius II. he thought he might without reproach yield to another pope. However, Lewis perceiving that by his reconciliation with Leo X. he ſhould take from the kings of England and Arragon the pretence to make war upon him, was at length reduced to renounce his council, and acknowledge that of Lateran. This renunciation was ſolemnly made in the tenth ſeſſion, held about the end of December.

Leo X. in the beginning of his pontificate wrote to Henry as to all the reſt of the princes, earneſtly exhorting him to peace. In this manner he was to talk, in order to diſcharge the duty of the common father of Chriſtians. Henry, who ſaw plainly, and was afterwards ſtill more fully convinced, that this was only grimace, replied, he could not make peace without his allies, and that a ſeparate peace would be directly contrary to all his engagements. This anſwer diſpleaſed not the pope, who then ſought only to raiſe enemies to France. But when he was ſure of his agreement with Lewis XII. he took occaſion to ſend another letter to Henry, telling him, he never intended to perſuade him to make a ſeparate peace, but as he had taken up arms ſolely for the defence of the church and the holy ſee, and had by his late victories attained the end he had propoſed, it was reaſonable he ſhould lay them down, ſince the prince who oppreſſed the church was returned to his obedience. The letter was dated December the 17th, about the time of the tenth ſeſſion of the council of Lateran, wherein the French embaſſadors made a ſolemn ſubmiſſion in their maſter's name.

Nothing contributed more to open Henry's eyes, than this ſecond letter. He imagined, when he proteſted that he took up arms in defence of the church, his allies knew, he did not mean for all that to neglect his own intereſt, that language being properly only to amuſe the public. He had the more reaſon to believe it, as even in the treaty of league each of the allies had evidently propoſed to himſelf temporal advantages. And yet, he ſaw, the pope had no ſooner obtained his deſire, but he took the words of the preamble of the treaty in the literal ſenſe, as if there had been indeed no other deſign than to labour for the church, and under that colour, pretended to diſſolve a league formed by himſelf. This convinced him, that the pope in drawing him into a war with France, had only his own intereſt in view. On the other hand, he was not better pleaſed with the king of Arragon, nor had reaſon to be ſo. As for the emperor, he had performed nothing of what he had promiſed. All theſe conſiderations, having at laſt opened his eyes, produced a peace with France, which was concluded the next year. But before we cloſe this, it will be neceſſary to relate what paſſed during the campaign between the Engliſh and Scots.

James IV. ſeeing Henry ready to carry war into France, called his parliament, and repreſented to them the indignities Scotland had ſuffered from the Engliſh ſince the laſt peace. Breton's affair was not forgot in this enumeration. But the beſt reaſon, he alledged, to induce the Scots to a war was, that France, the ancient and faithful ally of Scotland, being about to be invaded by the king of England, he could not diſpenſe with aſſiſting her. This reaſon, though very plauſible, was not however univerſally approved. Many thought it ſtrange that the king ſhould thus wantonly, and without any urgent neceſſity, break a peace advantageous to Scotland, ſolemnly ſworn to, and even lately renewed. But the king's creatures and the penſioners of France, whom Lamothe, the French embaſſador, had now prepared to ſerve the king his maſter upon this occaſion, carried it by a great majority, ſo that war was reſolved.

Henry was in France, when James aſſembled his army to invade England, purſuant to the foregoing reſolution. But to keep ſome ſort of formality, James wrote him a letter, and ſent it by a herald, who found him at the ſiege of Terouenne. The letter dated the 26th of July contained the grievances, James believed to have cauſe to complain of, and a declaration of war in caſe he deſiſted not from his invaſion of France. Henry could not ſend his anſwer till the 12th of Auguſt, the ſubſtance whereof was, "That he was not at all ſurpriſed to ſee him break the peace upon frivolous pretences, ſince he therein only imitated the inſincerity of his anceſtors and progenitors. Then he upbraided him, that whilſt he knew him to be in England, he never ſhewed, either by letter or embaſſador, that he intended to eſpouſe the king of France's quarrel, but waited for his departure to execute his unjuſt deſigns. He added, that knowing him perfectly, he had foreſeen his breach of faith, and for that reaſon, before he paſſed into France, had taken ſuch a courſe, and ſo well provided for the defence of his kingdom, that he did not queſtion by God's help to fruſtrate all the endeavours of ſchiſmaticks, excommunicated by the pope and council of Lateran. That beſides he hoped to have it very ſoon in his power to requite him, and in the mean time would not fail to take the moſt effectual methods to deprive him and his poſterity of all hopes of ever inheriting the kingdom, he was going ſo perfidiouſly to invade. After that, he ſet before his eyes the example of the king of Navarre, who for taking part with France was diſpoſſeſſed of his kingdom, without hopes of being ever reſtored. As for the pretended grievancies alledged in his letter, he ſaid, they had been ſo often anſwered, that all further mention of them was entirely needleſs. But for the king of Scotland's ſummoning him to deſiſt from the war with France, he told him, he did not acknowledge him for competent judge in his affairs with Lewis XII. and notwithſtanding his threats would continue the war. He concluded with ſaying, that he might be aſſured he would omit no opportunity to be revenged, wherein he hoped to ſucceed with the help of God and St. George."

James ſtaid not for an anſwer to his letter to take the field. On the 22d of Auguſt, he entered Northumberland, and took ſeveral places, particularly Norham caſtle[s]. The Engliſh writers affirm his army to be ſixty thouſand ſtrong; nay, ſome mount the number to a hundred thouſand, which is hardly credible. It cannot however be doubted it was very numerous, conſidering the care Buchanan takes to ſhew it was extremely leſſened by deſertions, and by being kept unemployed for ſome time. The earl of Surrey was then in Yorkſhire[t] with twenty-ſix thouſand men. But at the firſt news of the Scots entering England, he marched directly towards them, and the 4th of September came near enough to ſend and offer them battle by a herald, who reported that the king of Scotland accepted it for the Friday following. James was then encamped on the edge of mount Cheviot, where it was difficult to attack him[u]. And therefore the earl of Surrey, ſeeing the Scots would fight only in ſo advantageous a poſt, reſolved to ſtay till they deſcended on the plain. The Engliſh not appearing on the day appointed, an old Scotch lord[w] took occaſion to repreſent to the king, that he had done enough to ſave his honour: that it was not prudent to fight the Engliſh in their own country, but the beſt way would be to retire with his booty into Scotland, where it would be in his power to fight or avoid a battle as he pleaſed: that as he had taken up arms only to make a diverſion in favour of France, he no leſs employed the Engliſh forces without fighting, than by hazarding a battle: that upon this occaſion he ought not to liſten to the intereſted counſels of the French embaſſador, who only wanted to hazard ſome great action at another's expence, in order to free the king his maſter from his preſent ſtreights: but in ſerving France, Scotland was likewiſe to be regarded. This advice ſeemed too cautious to the king. As he had determined to give battle, he fiercely anſwered, he would fight the Engliſh were they a hundred thouſand. Mean while, the earl of Surrey, to draw him from his poſt, marched along a river[x] which parted the two armies, as if he intended to enter Scotland through Carliſle, the road to which place he ſeemed to take. James having notice of it, ſet fire to his camp, and marched along the ſame river on the oppoſite ſide. But unhappily for him, the ſmoke of his own camp hindered him from ſeeing the Engliſh, who forded the river unperceived. Then James halting about Floddon drew up his army. Here it was the earl of Surrey attacked him, having paſſed with difficulty a ſort of moraſs between the two armies. The particulars of this battle are ſo variouſly related by the hiſtorians of both nations, that the one cannot be followed without departing from the other. But as to the ſucceſs it is not the ſame. They all agree, the Scots loſt the day after valiantly fighting till night, which parted the combatants. The two armies retiring, the Engliſh knew not they were victorious till the morning, when they ſaw, their enemies had quitted the field of battle with all their artillery. The Engliſh own, they loſt five thouſand men in the battle, which was fought the 9th of September. But they ſay the Scots loſt ten thouſand[y]. The Scots pretend, there were but five thouſand ſlain on each ſide, but confeſs their loſs was very conſiderable, by the great number of lords and officers of their nation killed in the battle, whereas the Engliſh loſt not one perſon of diſtinction[z]. King James was never more ſeen after the battle. The Engliſh imagined they found his body wounded in two places. and ordered it to be put into a leaden coffin, without daring however to bury it, becauſe he died excommunicate. But the Scots affirmed it was not the body of their king. They ſaid that before the battle, he had cauſed five men of his own ſtature to wear the ſame arms with himſelf, and that the body which the Engliſh took for the king's was one Elphinſtone's, who greatly reſembled him. However, they could not tell what was become of the king. One ſaid indeed, he ſaw him ride over the Tweed after the battle. But as the fight laſted till night, this evidence is not much to be relied on. It was however the foundation of the report of his not being dead. Some ſuſpected, he was killed in retiring out of the battle by the lord Alexander Hume, or his vaſſals. But this fact was never well proved. However this be, it was never known for certain, whether the body found by the Engliſh on the field of battle, was the king's or not[a]. Mean while, Henry ſuppoſing it to be the very corps of James IV. wrote to the pope for a diſpenſation to enter it in St. Paul's church[b]. Leo X. anſwered by a brief, ſignifying, "That it was ſet forth to him from the king of England, that in a treaty concluded between the late king of Scotland, and Henry VII. and renewed by Henry VIII. the firſt had ſubmitted to an excommunication in caſe he acted in breach of it, and yet had broken the peace: that therefore he had been pronounced excommunicate by the cardinal archbiſhop of York, by virtue of a power granted by Julius II. that he died in a battle without having been abſolved; but in conſideration of his royal dignity and nearneſs of blood, the king of England deſired permiſſion to bury him in conſecrated ground. Upon theſe accounts, the pope was pleaſed to grant his requeſt, conſidering, as he was told and ought to believe, James in his laſt moments ſhewed ſome ſigns of contrition, ſuch as his circumſtances would admit. That therefore he appointed the biſhop of London, or any other biſhop the king ſhould pleaſe to nominate, to enquire into the matter; and if it was found, James had ſhewn any ſigns of repentance before his death, he gave him power to abſolve him: that however, the abſolution ſhould ſerve for no other purpoſe than his interment in holy ground. Moreover, he ordered the biſhop to enjoin the king of England to undergo ſome convenient or ſuitable penance in the name of the deceaſed king."

Among many remarks that might be made on this brief, I ſhall confine myſelf to this one. There was no declaration of war between James and Henry before James's letter, dated the 16th of July, and received the 12th of Auguſt, nor any hoſtility committed before the 22d of Auguſt, when James entered England. So the king of Scotland cannot be ſaid to have violated the truce till that time. Now he died the 9th of September, excommunicated by the cardinal of York, who was then embaſſador at Rome. Hence I think it may be inferred, that the cardinal had excommunicated James without knowing the cauſe, or hearing his reaſons, and probably upon a bare letter ſent him by Henry, that the king of Scotland intended to break the peace; I ſay, he only intended to break the peace, ſince there is no likelihood that from the 22d of Auguſt, when James entered England, to the 9th of September, the day of his death, the cardinal, who was at Rome, could have been informed of the actual rupture, and proceeded to an excommunication. I ſay nothing of the ſuppoſition that James, ſlain in the field, ſhewed any ſigns of contrition, eſpecially as it was even uncertain whether the body they would have enterred, was the king of Scotland's. I paſs over likewiſe the limitation ſet to the abſolution, that it ſhould ſerve only for burying the dead prince in holy ground, and the penance enjoined a living perſon in the name of a dead one. Every reader may make what reflections he thinks proper on theſe things.

Such being the ſituation of the affairs of Europe, at the end of the year 1513, it is not ſurprizing that the deſigns and intereſts of the princes ſhould be different from what they were in the beginning of the ſame year. It is therefore neceſſary, before we enter upon the recital of the events of the year 1514, to mention how the chief ſovereigns ſtood affected.

Lewis XII. burned with deſire to recover Genoa and Milan. But he perceived, that to ſucceed in that deſign, the allies muſt be divided, otherwiſe their was not even a poſſibility of undertaking it. The pope, emperor, king of Arragon, and Switzers, were equally concerned to oppoſe it. And yet, as they had alſo their ſeparate intereſts, he thought it would not be impoſſible to divide them, by offering to each apart, or at leaſt to ſome of them, advantages as great as thoſe they could natually expect from their union. Beſides, he hoped in treating with each in particular, to breed jealouſies and ſuſpicions among them, which would induce them to make haſte and treat with him for fear of being deſerted. He had the more hopes of ſucceeding this way, as moſt of the princes with whom he was in war, were not over ſcrupulous, but rather very ready to ſacrifice their allies to their own private intereſt. To this artifice therefore Lewis recured to free himſelf from his preſent embarraſment. At the beginning of the year 1514, he took care to renew the negotiation concerning the marriage of the princeſs René his ſecond daughter with Charles, archduke of Auſtria, knowing Maximilian and Ferdinand were equally deſirous of it, eſpecially upon terms propoſed by themſelves. He ſtarted however difficulties capable of continuing the negotiation without entirely breaking it off. The pope could not look upon this project without uneaſineſs. He was as much afraid of Milan's being in the hands of a grandſon of the emperor, and of the king of Arragon, as of ſeeing the French king reſtored. His intereſt required that Milan ſhould remain in the family of the Sforzas. The Switzers paſſionately wiſhed it alſo. The Venetians too would have therein found a great advantage, if another intereſt had not prevailed. And that was, to oblige the emperor to make peace with them on reaſonable terms. But this they could not hope without the aſſiſtance of France, and this aſſiſtance could not be obtained without aiding Lewis XII. to recover the Milaneſe.

Maximilian found his account in his war with Venice, becauſe it coſt him little. Since the league of Cambray, he had always been powerfully aided by France or Spain, or rather, had never made war but at another's expence. His allies were neceſſarily obliged to find him men or money, otherwiſe they might be ſure he would quickly change ſides. Since he had left France, the Spaniſh troops had done all in the war with Venice, and the king of Arragon, with all his policy, was not able to diſpence with acting for him. It is not therefore ſurpriſing that he was ſo difficult, when a peace was on foot, or uſed his endeavours to inflame the diviſions among the princes.

As for king Ferdinand, ſince he was become maſter of Navarre, it was his intereſt to embroil affairs, and cheriſh in Italy the hopes and fears of the ſeveral parties, to make himſelf neceſſary, and that a peace might not be concluded without him. He thereby tried to hinder Lewis from thinking of Navarre, and hoped at laſt to come to a treaty which ſhould leave him in quiet poſſeſſion of his conqueſt. For that reaſon, he acted all ſorts of parts, in order to attain his ends. One while he aſſiſted the emperor againſt the Venetians, [y] Hall ſays, there were fifteen hundred Engliſh, and twelve thouſand Scots ſlain, fol. 43. According to Buchanan, there fell above five thouſand Scots.

[z] In this battle the vanguard was led by the lord Thomas Howard, who had with him the lords Clifford, Conyers, Latimer, Scrope of Upſale, Lumley, Ogle; ſir Nicholas Appleyard, ſir William Sidney, ſir William Gaſcoyne, ſir Stephen Bull, ſir Henry Shirburne, &c. The right wing was commanded by ſir Edmond Howard, and the left by ſir Marmaduke Conſtable. The rear was brought up by the earl of Surrey himſelf, who was attended by the lord Scrope of Bolton, ſir Philip Tilney, ſir George Darcy, ſir Thomas Barkley, ſir John Stanley, ſir John Willoughby, &c. the lord Dacres, and ſir Edward Stanley, with their horſe, being appointed as a reſerve. On the Scotch ſide there fell one archbiſhop, two biſhops, four abbots, twelve earls, and ſeventeen barons, with eight or ten thouſand common ſoldiers. See a deſcription of the battle in my lord Herbert, p. 18. Hall, fol. 38. &c. Stow, p. 492.

[a] Hall affirms that it was found by the lord Dacres, and ſhewed to ſir William Scot, king James's chancellor, and to ſir John Forman, his ſerjeant porter, who knew him at firſt ſight, fol. 43.

[b] Stow ſays, it was conveyed to Shene monaſtery in Surrey; and further adds, that he had ſeen it there, after the diſſolution of that monaſtery, wrapped in lead, thrown into a large room, amongſt old timber, ſtone, lead, and other rubbiſh, 494.

In

another while he ſollicited him in their favour. Sometimes he excited the pope and Switzers not to ſuffer the king of France to become maſter of Milan; and ſometimes he offered to aſſiſt the ſame prince to conquer that duchy. This was only deceit and artifice to preſerve a diſſention ſo advantageous to him. However, his policy began to fail him. He had ſo forfeited his reputation with reſpect to ſincerity, that he was no longer truſted. It was merely out of neceſſity, or from a deſire to breed ſuſpicion in their enemies, that the reſt of the ſovereigns made any treaties with him, which, they were ſenſible, they could not rely on.

Henry VIII. had with glory got clear of his firſt campaign, but plainly ſaw himſelf indebted for his good ſucceſs to Lewis's paſſion, who had neglected the defence of his own kingdom, by ſending his beſt troops to recover Milan. The truth is, Henry depending upon the treaty of Mechlin, and the diverſions, his allies were to make in ſeveral provinces of France, had led into that kingdom not above five and twenty thouſand men, too weak an army to give him hopes of great advantages, had he been to deal with all the forces of his enemy. Forſaken as he was by the pope, the emperor, the king of Arragon, how would he have diſengaged himſelf, if Lewis XII. had reſolved to defer the Milan expedition to another time, and march all his troops into Picardy? Thus Henry would have conſidered, and in effect did conſider, that he was more indebted for the victory of Guinegaſte, and the taking of Terouenne and Tournay, to the circumſtance, of the time than to his prudence or valour. He was therefore inclined to get clear of an affair, he had indiſcreetly embarked in, without flattering himſelf any longer with the imaginary aſſiſtance of his allies. It was neceſſary however to conceal his inclination, in order to draw from France advantageous conditions in a treaty. Such was the poſture of affairs in the beginning of the year 1514. But before I ſpeak of thoſe of England in particular, it is requiſite to ſhew what ſteps were taken by the princes concerned in the troubles of Italy, becauſe that was then the chief point, on which all the other affairs did depend.

Leo X. being alarmed at the negotiation, Lewis XII. had renewed with the emperor, concerning the marriage of René his ſecond daughter uſed all poſſible endeavours to reconcile the Switzers to France, that Lewis might be leſs inclined to treat with the emperor and the king of Arragon. But he wiſhed that Lewis would ratify the capitulation of Dijon, as to what concerned the duchy of Milan, and on the other hand, exhorted the Switzers to be ſatisfied with a leſs ſum than was promiſed by la Trimouille. This was the plan he had formed for that reconciliation. In ſhort, he had ſo far gained his point, that the king of France had offered a truce for three years, without however departing from his pretenſions to Milan, and many of the principal Switzers were ſatisfied with it. But it was not poſſible to perſuade that people to abate any thing of the capitulation of Dijon. They even debated whether they ſhould make a ſecond incurſion into France to revenge the breach of that treaty. Thus the pope's pains were fruitleſs, and the Switzers ſtill remained mortal enemies to France.

Ferdinand having advice of what was tranſacting in Switzerland, was afraid of being deſerted, whether Lewis gave up his claim to Milan, or the Switzers accepted the truce he offered them. So, without communicating any thing to his allies, he ſpeedily ſent Quintana, his ſecretary, to Paris, who renewed for a year the truce with France upon the ſame foot with the former. Only by a ſecret article, Lewis promiſed not to invade the Milaneſe this year. In the publication of the truce in France, there was no mention of Milan. But Ferdinand publiſhed it in Spain with that article, ſo that the world was at a loſe to know what to think of the matter. Lewis made no ſcruple to prolong the truce, becauſe he could not undertake to invade Milan and Navarre, before he had made a peace with England. Beſides, he was very glad the world ſhould think, the truce he had prolonged with the king of Arragon, would be followed by a peace.

This was a very natural conſequence, and probably, it inclined Henry ſeriouſly to think of a peace. But on the other hand, Lewis was going to receive a great prejudice by it, in that the pope to break his meaſures with reſpect to Milan, laboured with all his power to procure a peace between the emperor and the Venetians. He deſired above all things, for the good of his ſee, of all Italy, and of himſelf, that the French ſhould never more ſet foot in Italy. Whilſt the French were in poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe, Italy had never been free from troubles, the popes had been leſs regarded than before, and the Florentines had preſerved their liberty. Theſe were ſufficient reaſons to make the pope wiſh, they might never return. Beſides, he had formed projects for raiſing his family, which their neighbourhood might obſtruct. One great means to attain his ends, was to deprive Lewis XII. of the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, which would infallibly happen, if it was poſſible to find ſome expedient to make their peace with the emperor. The laſt year the Venetians, preſſed by the Spaniſh army, had agreed to make the pope umpire, and the emperor had accepted him. But the affair had lain dormant ever ſince Preſently after Ferdinand's renewing of the truce with Lewis XII. the pope fearing a peace would be concluded betwen the two monarchs, at the expence of the duchy of Milan, ſtrove to renew the negotiation between the emperor and the Venetians. He new if it ſucceeded, the king of France would in vain expect the aſſiſtance of the republic to conquer Milan. In ſhort, with much ſollicitation, he obtained from both parties an engagement to ſtand to his arbitration, and to give him power to ſettle the terms of the peace as he ſhould think fit. However by a writing under his own hand, he promiſed not to pronounce ſentence without both their conſents.

It was very difficult to make this peace becauſe the war ſtill continuing in the ſtate of Venice and Friuli, the leaſt ſucceſs was ſufficient to cauſe the parties to riſe or fall in their demands. When the Venetians found themſelves preſſed, they very willingly agreed, that the emperor ſhould keep Verona; but then Maximilian would have alſo Vicenza, Padua, and Treviſo. When his affairs were not proſperous, he was ready to leave them theſe three places, but then they could not think of making peace without Verona. Thus the pope, finding the various ſucceſs of the war was a perpetual obſtacle to his projected agreements, paſſed a proviſional ſentence ordering that both parties ſhould lay down their arms; what the emperor would depoſit in his hands, Vicenza, and whatever was poſſeſſed by the Spaniards in the trritories of Padua, and Treviſo: that the Venetians ſhould do the like with regard to Crema, and pay down to the emperor fifty thouſand ducats: that this proviſional agreement ſhould be deemed void, if the two parties ſhould not think proper to ratify it; but in caſe they approved of it, he promiſed to pronounce a definitive ſentence within a year. The Venetians did not think proper to ratify the ſentence being perſuaded that in their preſent circumſtances, a truce was much more prejudicial than the continuation of the war. Thus the pope's pains were ineffectual. Such was the ſituation of the affairs of Italy, during the year 1514. We muſt ſee now what paſſed in England.

Henry at his return from his glorious campaign, thought only of mirth ad diverſions. The parliament however met the 3d of January, but there was nothing done of any moment with reſpect to the public affairs [c]. Before the end of the ſeſſion, the king gave the earl of Surrey, the title of duke of Norfolk, which his father had enjoyed, and laſt with his life at Boſworth field, fighting for Richard III [d]. By this charge, Thomas Howard, ſon and heir of the new duke, became earl of Surrey. Charles Brandon, viſcount Liſle, one of the king's favourites, was alſo created duke of Suffolk, and Charles Somerſet, earl of Worceſter. Margaret of York, daughter of the duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV. obtained likewiſe the title of counteſs of Sarum, as heir to the earl of Warwick, her brother, beheaded by Henry VII [e].

Thomas Wolſey had now been ſome months prime-miniſter, without receiving other particular marks of his maſter's favour. But Wolſey was not forgetful of himſelf. The biſhopric of Lincoln being vacant he ſo ordered that the king demanded it for him of the pope, who had engroſſed the callations of all the ſeas, by anticipated reſervations. Shortly after, Lewis Guillard, biſhop of Tournay, neglecting to repair to his biſhopric, ſince the city was in the hands of the king of England, the pope readily ſuppoſed he had quitted his ſee, and gave the adminiſtration thereof to Thomas Wolſey, both in temporals and ſpirituals. This was ſuddenly and almoſt at once a great addition to the new favourite's income. Leo X. not expecting much, either from the emperor, or the king of Arragon, eaſily perceived, he might want the king of England. In order to gain his protection, he had diſpoſed of the ſees of Lincoln and Tournay, in favour of Wolſey, to win him to his intereſt, by preſents which coſt him nothing. But after having ſatisfied the favourite, he muſt teſtify by ſome mark of diſtinction, his eſteem for the maſter. To that purpoſe he ſent him a ſword and a hat, conſecrated on Chriſtmas-day, which the popes were wont to preſent to princes or generals who had obtained ſome ſignal victory over the enemies of the church.

Whilſt the pope, emperor, and king of Arragon, were labouring to accompliſh their projects, Lewis XII. was not unmindful of his own affairs[f]. Among all his enemies, none gave him ſo much uneaſineſs as the king of England, chiefly for two reaſons. Firſt, Henry was young, greedy of glory, rich in ready money, and moreover always ſure of ſupplies from his parliament, eſpecially in caſe of a war with France. Secondly, the diverſion he could and did make in Picardy, by means of Calais, rendered all Lewis's projects in Italy fruitleſs. He thereby kept the forces of France ſo divided, that it was almoſt impoſſible to aſſiſt one another in caſe of accident. Thus, it was the king of France's great intereſt to remove this thorn from his ſide, otherwiſe he could not undertake to recover Genoa and Milan. Accordingly, he had been very ſeriouſly endeavouring it, ever ſince the end of the laſt campaign, by the means of Lewis of Orleans, duke of Longueville, taken priſoner at the battle of Guinegaſte. It was this private embaſſador who, in his frequent converſations with Henry, laboured by degrees to open his eyes, by ſhewing him how little he could depend upon his allies, and by clearly diſcovering their artifices to draw him into their ſnares. Henry was convinced, but in all appearance, was told many things which he knew not before. However this be, theſe converſations had ſuch an effect, that Henry told the duke he was inclined to peace, provided it was upon reaſonable terms. Lewis XII. having notice thereof, ordered the duke of Longueville privately to negotiate the affair, and try to diſcover the king of England's real intentions. Probably, Henry inſiſted ſome time upon his claim to the whole kingdom of France, and particularly to Guienne and Normandy, which made the duke apprehenſive, his negotiation would not be ſucceſsful. However, to induce Henry to abate ſomething of his pretenſions, the duke had orders to demand the princeſs Mary his ſiſter, for the king his maſter, who had loſt Anne of Bretagne, his queen, the beginning of the year. This private negotiation, to which only Thomas Wolſey, biſhop of Lincoln, was admitted, continued ſome time without making ſome progreſs, by reaſon of Henry's exceſſive commands. At laſt, at a ſecret conference which the king himſelf had with the duke of Longueville, he ſuddenly deſiſted from the hardeſt of his demands, and plainly told him, on what conditions the peace might be concluded, adding, he was fully reſolved to reſt there. Here is a letter from the king to Wolſey, under his own hand, after the conference, wherein appears what was his laſt reſolution. [g].

"MY lorde of Lynkecolne, I recommande me unto yow. And lette yow wyte that I have ſpokyne with the duke; whych in the begynnynge was as yll afrayde as ever he was in his lyffe leſt no good effecte ſhulde comme to pas. "On truſt hereon we woll that yow begyne to penne the reſodue off the artycylles as ſoone as you can;

"And thus fare yow well.

"Wryttyn with the hande off your lovying maſter, HENRY R."

Though this letter has no date, it may by ſeveral circumſtances be conjectured to be written in June 1514.

Lewis XII. being informed of the king of England's laſt reſolution, entertained great hopes of a peace. There were however two articles which troubled him. The firſt was to pay annually a hundred thouſand crowns, as a compenſation for Henry's claim to the kingdom of France. This was in ſome meaſure to own the juſtice of his title, and pay him a ſort of tribute, which he could not reſolve. The other article, related to Tournay, which he deſired to recover, and which however was not mentioned in the king's propoſals. But as to this article, there was an obſtacle which was not eaſily to be ſurmounted, and that was, Wolſey was concerned. It was not ſufficient to gain Henry by flatteries, or by giving him a ſum of money in lieu of Tournay; the favourite muſt alſo be made amends for the loſs of a ſee which brought him a conſiderable income. To endeavour therefore to agree upon theſe two articles, Lewis ſent embaſſadors to England. He choſe for that purpoſe, Lewis d'Orleans duke of Longueville, John de Salve firſt preſident of Roan, and Thomas Bohier, to whom du Bellai gives the title of general of Normandy, and the king in his commiſſion that of chevalier general of France. Mean while, the two kings agreed upon a ceſſation of arms during the treaty.

It was eaſier for the French embaſſadors to cauſe Henry to alter his laſt reſolution concerning the firſt article than to obtain the reſtitution of Tournay. The reaſon is evident. In the firſt article, the king alone was concerned, whereas in the ſecond, the miniſter's intereſt was properly in queſtion. Mean while, ſince Henry was determined to make peace with France, Tournay could be of no farther uſe, and a ſum of money would have been doubtleſs more advantageous than the preſervation of that place. But Wolſey perceived when Tournay ſhould be in the hands of the king of France, he would infallibly loſe the adminiſtration of the ſee. So, the negotiation of the embaſſadors upon that article was entirely fruitleſs. It was not the ſame with reſpect to the penſion of the hundred thouſand crowns demanded by Henry. They found means to perſuade him to be ſatisfied with a million of crowns, in which were included the ſeven hundred and forty-five thouſand contained in the treaty of Eſtaples, but whereof, indeed, an inconſiderable part had been paid. The Spaniſh embaſſador reſiding at London, uſed all poſſible endeavours to intervene in the negotiation. But Henry would never ſuffer him, well knowing, he only intended to obſtruct it. The commiſſioners of the two kings[h] having ſettled all the articles, the treaties were ſigned the 7th of Auguſt.

There were three ſeparate treaties. The firſt concerned only the renewing of the alliance between France and England. The ſecond was about the marriage of the princeſs Mary with Lewis XII. The third, related to the payment of the million of crowns. As theſe treaties ſerved for foundation to many others hereafter concluded, it is neceſſary to inſert the ſubſtance, at leaſt of the moſt material articles.

I. TREATY,

Of Peace and Amity between Lewis XII. and Henry VIII. concluded at London, Auguſt 7, 1514.

THAT the amity between the two kings ſhould laſt till a year after the death of the ſhorteſt liver. That the ſucceſſor of him that died firſt, ſhould give notice within the year to the other, whether he would prolong this or make a new treaty.

That all impoſitions laid, within fifty-two years laſt paſt, by one king on the ſubjects of the other, ſhould be aboliſhed.

That the peace ſhould not be deemed violated by the outrages committed on either ſide.

That neither of the two kings ſhould afford protection or refuge to the rebels of the other.

By the 14th, 15th, and 16th articles, the two kings bound themſelves to mutual aſſiſtance in three caſes: 1. For defence of one another's dominions: 2. For recovery of the territories with-held by other princes: 3. In caſe one of the two kings ſhould be attacked on account of the preſent treaty, and affirmed upon his honour, it was for that cauſe. In each of theſe caſes the conditions were different[i]. But in the laſt, they promiſed mutual aid, though the aſſailant ſhould be relation, friend, or ally of one only, or of both.

Lewis included in the treaty as his allies, the pope, the Switzers, and the king of Scotland[k]. On Henry's part were named the pope, Bologna, all the towns of St. Peter's patrimony, the archduke of Auſtria, and the Switzers[l].

Scotland was included in the treaty, but on condition that the Scots ſhould commit no hoſtilities againſt England after the 25th of November.

That the treaty ſhould be ratified and ſworn by the two kings, and confirmed by the parliament of England, and the ſtates of France.

That each of the two kings ſhould endeavour to obtain of the pope a ſentence of excommunication againſt the infractor of the peace.

II. TREATY,

Concerning the Marriage of Lewis XII. with the Princeſs Mary.

THAT matrimony ſhould be contracted by proxies, and per verba de præſenti within ten days after the date of this treaty.

That the king of England [within two months after the contract] ſhould convey, at his own charge, the princeſs his ſiſter to Abbeville, where within four days after her arrival the king of France ſhould ſolemnly marry her.

That Mary ſhould have in dower four hundred thouſand crowns, two hundred thouſand whereof ſhould be reckoned for jewels, &c. and in caſe of recovery, Lewis ſhould be obliged to reſtore only the jewels, &c. which ſhould be valued at the ſum of two hundred thouſand crowns.

That the other half, amounting to two hundred thouſand crowns, Henry ſhould pay, by deducting the ſum out of the million the king of France was bound to pay by a late treaty.

That the future queen's jointure ſhould be as great as that aſſigned to Anne of Bretagne, or any other queen of France.

That in caſe of Lewis's death, Mary ſhould enjoy her dower and jointure during life, whether ſhe reſided in France or England.

III. TREATY,

For the Payment of a Million of Crowns.

BY this treaty Lewis XII. acknowledged, that by the treaty of Eſtaples, Charles VIII. was bound to pay Henry VII. or his ſucceſſors the ſum of 745,000 crowns, and that himſelf was obliged to pay the arrears of the ſame.

Moreover, that Charles duke of Orleans his father, by an obligation dated March the 7th, 1444, had owned himſelf debtor in a certain ſum to Margaret of Somerſet, grandmother of Henry VIII.

That theſe two ſums not being yet paid, Lewis bound himſelf to pay to the king of England, or his ſucceſſors, a million of crowns, as well for the arrears of the ſaid two ſums, as on account of the good affection he bore him, and to the end their amity might be the more laſting.

That this million ſhould be paid by Lewis to the king of England by half yearly payments of fifty thouſand livres Tournois, till the whole was diſcharged.

Thus the war, which had been undertaken on pretence of religion, and for the glory of God, ended in a treaty, which mentions neither religion, nor the pope, nor the church.

On the other hand, though the princeſs Mary had been ſolemnly affianced to Charles of Auſtria, Lewis XII. and Henry VIII. made no difficulty concerning this ſecond marriage, neither did they ſo much as vouchſafe to demand the pope's diſpenſation to abſolve Mary from her firſt contract. Only a few days before the ſigning of the treaty, Mary declared in the preſence of a notary public and other witneſſes, that ſhe had been forced to plight her faith to the prince of Caſtile, archduke of Auſtria. That moreover the archduke having promiſed to eſpouſe her by proxy, and per verba de præſenti, as ſoon as he was fourteen years of age, had broken his word. She added further, that ſhe was creditably informed, the counſellors and confidents of the prince of Caſtile were inſtilling into him, to the utmoſt of their power, an averſion for the king of England her brother. Upon theſe allegations, the two kings, making themſelves judges in a cauſe which doubtleſs belonged to the pope's cognizance, thought fit the marriage ſhould be conſummated.

I have ſtill to remark upon the third treaty, That though Henry had declared to the duke of Longueville, as appears in his letter to Wolſey, that he could not make peace unleſs the king of France would pay him a yearly penſion of a hundred thouſand crowns, as a compenſation for the inheritance he with-held from him, an expedient was found to ſatisfy him with much leſs. The whole was reduced to Lewis's bond to pay him a million of crowns, two thirds of which were already due before the treaty. Beſides, that this bond might not be conſidered as a compenſation of the king of England's title to France, according to Henry's intentions, it was expreſly ſaid in the treaty to be in payment of the arrears of the ſeven hundred forty-five thouſand crowns, due to the king of England by the treaty of Eſtaples, of another ſum due from the late duke of Orleans to Margaret, the king's grandmother, and laſtly, for Lewis's good affection to Henry. Hereby was ſunk the principal foundation, on which Henry had built his demand of a penſion of a hundred thouſand crowns, a demand conſidered by him as the baſis of the treaty according to his letter to Wolſey. It may therefore be affirmed, that Henry was no leſs over-reached by the king of France in the treaty of peace, than he had been by the pope, the emperor, and the king of Arragon, in that which had engaged him in the war. This proceeded not from his miſunderſtanding his own intereſts, ſince it appears in his letter, that he was very ſenſible of the conſequence of his demand. To what then can his uneaſineſs be aſcribed but to the inſinuations of his prime miniſter, who certainly erred not out of ignorance? Probably Lewis XII. found means to make Wolſey his friend. We ſhall ſee ſtill more plainly hereafter, that this miniſter was much more mindful of his own than his maſter's advantages when they came in competition, and that he loſt no opportunity of enriching himſelf.

In the ſecond, Lewis was to lend Henry ſix hundred lances only, and Henry him but five thouſand archers, with the ſame ſea forces on both ſides as before mentioned. In the third, one was to aid the other at his charge that was invaded.

Whilſt Wolſey was employed with the French embaſſadors in negotiating the peace, cardinal Bambridge, archbiſhop of York died at Rome the 14th of July, [m]. The ſame day cardinal Julius de Medici, afterwards pope, by the name of Clement VII. ſent the king notice of his death, acquainting him withal that he had prevailed with the pope not to diſpoſe of the ſee of York before his pleaſure was known. Whereupon the king demanded the archbiſhopric for Thomas Wolſey, which was immediately granted. This miniſter was then in ſo great favour, that he abſolutely directed all the king's affairs, who had for him a very great eſteem and affection. It may be preſumed that he was now doing Lewis XII. ſome good ſervices, ſince there are in the Collection of the Public Acts, ſeveral letters from that monarch to him, beginning with theſe kind words, "My lord of York, and very good friend."

Auguſt and September were ſpent in preparations for the new queen of France's journey, in the celebration of the marriage by proxies in France and England, and in the ratifications of the treaties. After which, Mary was conducted to Abbeville with a numerous train of lords and ladies, where the marriage was conſummated the 9th of October [n].

Whilſt the peace between France and England was treating at London, the pope, emperor, and king of Arragon, omitted nothing that they imagined would obſtruct it. They plainly perceived, it could not but turn to their prejudice, and that the burthen of the war would fall upon them. They were even afraid, that Henry would join againſt them with France. Leo X. had ſent to Henry to perſuade him to a peace, and yet, when he ſaw it upon the point of concluſion, would have been glad his exhortations had not been regarded. So, to croſs the negotiation at London as much as he could, he propoſed a new league with the king of France, imagining it would be a means to abate his eagerneſs for a peace with England. But as Lewis took a fortnight to give him his anſwer, he was afraid of being left alone, and for that reaſon, made haſte and concluded a defenſive league with the king of Arragon for a year only.

On the other hand, Ferdinand fearing Lewis, after making a peace with England, would invade Navarre, offered him his aſſiſtance to conquer Milan. But Lewis knew him too well to put any confidence in him. In ſhort, the emperor and Ferdinand, deſiring at any rate to hinder him from concluding with England, ſent him their conſent in form for the marriage of René his ſecond daughter with Charles of Auſtria their grandſon. At the ſame time Maximilian ratified the one years truce made by Ferdinand with France, but all would not do. They had even the mortification to hear, that they were neither of them included in the treaty of London; a clear evidence how little Henry valued their friendſhip. Notwithſtanding all this, they both feigned to be extremely pleaſed with the peace, though in their hearts they were exceedingly vexed.

It was expected, that the king of France being freed from the war with England, would infallibly recover Genoa and Milan. The pope was ſo perſuaded of it, that he writ to exhort him to that expedition, though at the ſame time he uſed all his endeavours to break his meaſures by an agreement between the emperor and the Venetians. He even diſpatched to Venice Peter Bembo, afterwards cardinal, to incline the Venetians to peace. But they fearing the pope was laying a ſnare for them, to take off the king from their alliance, gave him immediate information, and thereby rendered him very jealous of his holineſs.

Leo X. was forming at that time grand projects in favour of Julian de Medici his brother. His deſign was to become maſter of Ferrara and Urbino, and to join theſe two ſtates to Parma, Placentia, Reggio, and the city of Modena, lately purchaſed of the emperor, in order to caſt them into one ſtate for his brother, of whom he had a mind to make a great prince. Nay, it is ſaid, he intended to add the kingdom of Naples; and, to make that conqueſt, had joined in a league with the Venetians. But as he ſaw the king of France would quickly invade the Milaneſe, he ſhewed great regard for him, leſt he ſhould make an enemy of a prince, who, if he came to be poſſeſſed of Milan, would have it in his power to obſtruct his deſigns. Mean while, Lewis not being pleaſed with the pope, preſſed him to declare himſelf, reſolving to know for certain, whether he was to conſider him as a friend, or an enemy. Leo, who perceived his intent, amuſed him with fair words, without, however, being determined, becauſe his purpoſe was to regulate his conduct by the events of the war, he foreſaw. This did not hinder Lewis from vigorouſly continuing the neceſſary preparations for his expedition into Italy, where he intended to go in perſon the next ſpring. But whilſt he was thinking of means to relieve the Lanthorn Tower, which he ſtill held at Genoa, and by the help whereof, hoped to become maſter of the city, he received the news that it was ſurrendered by capitulation, and immediately razed by the Genoeſe. However, this was not capable to deter him from his deſigns upon Italy.

Before I cloſe the year 1514, it will not be unſerviceable briefly to relate what paſſed in Scotland this year. James IV. left two ſons, of whom the eldeſt, called after his own name, was not yet full two years old. By a will, made before he took the field, he left the regency of the kingdom after his death to the queen, ſiſter of Henry VIII. during her widowhood. The ſtates being met the beginning of the year 1514, immediately acknowledged for king, James V. ſon and heir to the deceaſed. As for the regency, there would doubtleſs have been great debates, if the loſs of the battle of Floddon had not made the Scots apprehenſive, that the king of England would improve the advantage he had over them. There had never been in Scotland a queen regent, and that would have been ſufficient to reject the clauſe of the late king's will. But it was hoped, the queen would prevail with the king her brother, to leave in peace a country whereof ſhe had the government. This expectation was not diſappointed. The queen being declared regent, and writing to the king her brother, to intreat him not to diſturb the minority of the young king his nephew, Henry generouſly anſwered, he was equally inclined to peace or war, and left it to the Scots to chuſe which they pleaſed.

After this declaration, probably, Scotland would have remained in quiet under the regency of the queen, if that princeſs had not married again ſome months after. She choſe for her conſort Archibald Douglaſs, earl of Angus, one of the greateſt lords in Scotland, and by this ſecond marriage filled the kingdom with confuſion and trouble. As by the late king's will ſhe was to be regent only during her widowhood, the queſtion was to appoint another in her room. Douglaſs, her huſband, uſed all his endeavours to have her continued in the regency. He affirmed, there was no other way to preſerve peace with England; and beſides, Henry would be obliged to ſupport the queen his ſiſter, in caſe any one ſhould pretend to diſturb her. But this laſt conſideration had a quite contrary effect to what the earl expected, upon thoſe who dreaded his too great advancement. They knew that being huſband to the regent, he would always be countenanced by the king of England, and by his aſſiſtance, enabled to engroſs more authority than they wiſhed him. Alexander Hume, governor of all the country north of the Frith, was the head of thoſe that oppoſed the queen's regency. He was a proud and haughty man, who could not endure a ſuperior. During the late king's life, he had been preſident of the marches bordering upon England, where he had committed ſuch outrages, that as ſome ſay, for fear of being called to an account, he killed, or cauſed to be killed, James IV. when he was retiring out of the battle of Floddon. However that be, Hume uſed all his intereſt to break Douglaſs's and the queen's meaſures, and propoſed John Stewart, duke of Albany, for regent. This duke was ſon of Alexander duke of Albany, brother of James III. who to avoid the perſecutions of the king his brother, was forced

The other perſons of note that attended her, were, Thomas Grey, marquis of Dorſet, Thomas biſhop of Durham, Thomas Howard, earl of Surrey, and admiral Charles Somerſet, earl of Worceſter, Thomas Docwra, prior of St. John's of Jeruſalem, Dr. Nicholas Weſt, dean of Windſor; the lords Delaware, Barners, Monteagle, ſir Maurice Barkley, ſir John Peache, ſir William Sandes, ſir Thomas Bulleyn, &c. Burnet's Ref. tom. I. p. 43, 44. Before the coronation was over, there were ſolemn juſts and tournaments held at Paris, by Francis de Valois, heir to the crown, at which the duke of Suffolk, and the marquis of Dorſet came off with honour. The king and queen of France were ſpectators; but the king was ſo old and infirm, that he lay on a couch. The duke of Valois, out of envy, cauſed, it ſeems, a German of prodigious ſtrength and ſize, to be privately introduced into the field, in order to oppoſe the duke of Suffolk, who, though with great difficulty, got the better of the German. Lewis to fly into France, where he died. He left there this ſon, who being married, and adhering to the ſervice of Lewis XII. [o] had received many favours from that monarch, and acquired a great reputation. Though he had never been in Scotland, he was however the young king's neareſt relation, and Hume had intereſt enough to have him declared regent. Whereupon the ſtates ſent deputies to offer him the regency, and to pray him to come inſtantly and govern the realm in the king's name. Lewis XII. dying during theſe tranſactions, Francis I. his ſucceſſor, having great reaſons not to diſpleaſe the king of England, would not ſuffer the duke of Albany to depart till he had finiſhed his affairs with Henry. For this cauſe the regent arrived not in Scotland before May 1515. During this interval, Scotland being without a governor, the diſſentions among the great men much increaſed, every one having time to form his cabals againſt the regent's arrival.

[1515] The firſt day of the year was the laſt of Lewis XIIth's life [p]. But the death of that prince made no alteration in the ſituation of the affairs of the kingdom. The duke of Valois, who ſucceeded him by the name of Francis I. plainly diſcovered, by adding the title of duke of Milan to that of king of France, that he intended to purſue his predeceſſor's deſigns. Mean while, he did not think fit openly to declare his intentions, till he had ſettled his affairs both abroad and at home.

By the death of Lewis XII. queen Mary, his widow, was at liberty to diſpoſe of herſelf, and to follow her own inclinations rather than the politic views of the king her brother. Before her marriage, ſhe had conceived an affection for Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, a moſt accompliſhed lord. It is even ſaid the king had promiſed to marry her to him. But as her marriage with Lewis XII. was to be the band of the peace between France and England, ſhe was under a neceſſity to ſacrifice her love to the good of both kingdoms. The duke of Suffolk, however, waited upon her into France, though he was not of the number of thoſe who were appointed to conduct her. Mezerai ſays, the duke of Valois, preſumptive heir to the crown of France, cauſed that Engliſh lord to be narrowly watched, for fear he ſhould give the king a ſucceſſor. This ſhews that the queen's inclination was no ſecret. The death of Lewis XII. happening within three months after his marriage, the queen dowager was not willing to run a ſecond hazard of being given to another huſband not of her own chuſing. Henry ſuſpecting her deſign, writ to her the beginning of February, deſiring her not to marry again without his conſent. But the queen believed it would be eaſier to obtain the king's pardon when the thing was done, than his permiſſion to do it. [q]. So, in March, about two months after the death of Lewis XII. ſhe was privately married to the duke of Suffolk. The next day ſhe ſent word of it in a letter to the king, her brother, and taking the whole blame upon herſelf, intimated to him, that ſhe had in ſome meaſure forced the duke to this raſh action. Henry ſeemed diſpleaſed at firſt, but his anger was ſoon over. Their peace being made, they returned to Henry, and were very well received [r].

The parliament was then ſitting [s], and as England was in profound tranquillity, the houſes were only employed in domeſtic affairs, which are of little or no conſequence to foreigners. There were, however, three ſtatutes paſſed this ſeſſion which deſerve notice. It was provided by the firſt, that unwrought wool ſhould not be exported out of the kingdom, for the encouragement of the woolen manufactury. This act has been often revived by reaſon of its importance, and yet, even now, an effectual means is wanting to prevent the clandeſtine exportation of wool. The ſecond ſtatute declared all the king's ſecond letters patents to be void, unleſs mention was made of the firſt. This was to prevent the king from being ſurpriſed. The third was no leſs neceſſary. It frequently happened, that towards the end of a ſeſſion, ſeveral members went home, imagining there was nothing more of moment to be done. Then the factious took advantage of their abſence, to propoſe and paſs ſuch bills as probably would have been thrown out, had the houſe been more numerous. It was therefore enacted, that the members who abſented themſelves before the end of the ſeſſion, without the ſpeaker's and commons leave, to be entered in the clerk of the parliament's books ſhould loſe their wages [t]. I muſt now interrupt for ſome time the recital of domeſtic, to ſpeak of foreign affairs, which are to ſerve for foundation to what will hereafter be ſaid with reſpect to England.

Francis I. was too much concerned to renew the alliance between France and England, to fail of performing the article of the treaty, whereby the ſucceſſor of him that died firſt, was to acquaint the other whether he deſigned to prolong the time of the alliance. As he intended to paſs into Italy to recover the duchy of Milan, it was abſolutely neceſſary to ſecure the king of England. To that purpoſe, about the middle of March, he ſent to the firſt preſident of Roan, his embaſſador at London, a commiſſion to renew the alliance with Henry, as well as the bond for the payment of the million, to which Lewis XII. was obliged. This was done by a new treaty, ſigned the 5th of April, and exactly like the former.

After all the frauds uſed by the king of Arragon to Henry, there was no room to hope for a perfect friendſhip between them. However, Ferdinand, who was not eaſily diſcouraged, ſent to the king his ſon-in-law, a new embaſſador, to propoſe the renewing of their alliance. It is likely, he did not believe Henry had ſo ſoon forgot his deceits, but it was for his intereſt that he ſhould be known to have an embaſſador in England. The embaſſador arrived in May, but was ſuffered to wait in vain till October, without being diſpatched: nay, very probably he would never have ſucceeded in his negotiation, if Wolſey's intereſt had not cauſed the king to alter his reſolution never to have any thing to do with the king his father-in-law. I ſhall ſpeak more fully of this affair in another place.

Whilſt the Spaniſh embaſſador was waiting in vain at London, Henry had two at Bruſſels, who made no greater progreſs. He had not dealt very gallantly with the young archduke, in giving the princeſs his bride to Lewis XII. without any ceremony. Indeed, Charles had not repaired to Calais the 5th of May the laſt year, as he was bound by the treaty of Liſle: but it could not thence be inferred, he had renounced his marriage, at leaſt before he was aſked whether he intended to conſummate it. Henry was afraid therefore, the archduke having lately aſſumed the government of the Low-Countries, and made a treaty with France, would think of revenging the affront. So, in order to ſound him, or prevent the effects of his reſentment, he ſent two embaſſadors [u] to propoſe the renewing of the former alliance between Henry VIII. and Philip I. their fathers. But the embaſſadors were ſuffered to wait a good while at Bruſſels, without being much regarded, or receiving any anſwer.

The affairs of Europe were then in a ſituation, which would not allow the young archduke to engage in any party. It was neceſſary, in order to take juſt meaſures, to wait the ſucceſs of the war, which Francis I. was preparing to carry into Italy. In all appearance, it would produce events capable of altering the intereſts and projects of moſt of the ſovereigns. Since Francis's acceſſion to the crown, he had plainly ſhewn, that he intended not to ſuffer Maximilian Sforza peaceably to enjoy the duchy of Milan. On the other hand, the king

They arrived the ſecond of May, and were publicly married on the thirteenth at Greenwich. The queen (ſay the French) carried with her in jewels, plate, and tapeſtry, of Lewis XII. to the value of two hundred thouſand crowns; amongſt which was a great diamond, called le miroir de Naples, which Francis would fain have redeemed at a great price. [t] Theſe wages were levied by the ſheriffs, and the moſt ancient writs for knights wages extant, are thoſe of 28, 29, 32 of Edward I. The firſt ſtatute concerning them is, that of 12 Richard II. namely, that the levying of the expences of kights ſhall be, as hath been uſed before this time. The wages in this reign were four ſhillings a day for knights of the ſhire, and two ſhillings at leaſt for burgeſſes, beſides the charges of going and coming, and fees for writs, &c. In this parliament there was alſo another ſtatute made, importing, that whereas divers felons and murderers did, upon feigned and untrue ſurmiſes, get themſelves removed into the King's Bench, and could not by order of law be remitted and ſent down to the juſtices of gaol-delivery: that therefore for the future, the juſtices of the King's Bench ſhall have full power and authority, to remit and ſend down the bodies or indictments of all felons and murderers, into the counties where the murders or felonies were committed. The of Arragon was under apprehenſions for Naples and Navarre. Francis I. was a young prince, full of courage and ambition, and it could not be doubted that he had formed great projects. So the eyes of all were upon him, to ſee in what manner he would begin his reign. He was making preparations, which diſcovered he had ſome great deſign in his thoughts, and did not take much pains to conceal that he had Milan in view. Mean while, he uſed for pretence of his armament, the invaſion Burgundy was threatened with by the Switzers. But the league he had lately renewed with Venice, and his offer to Ferdinand to prolong the truce, provided the ſecret article concerning the Milaneſe was annulled, were plain indications of his deſigns.

All this was not ſufficient to make Ferdinand perfectly eaſy. He was afraid of being deceived by Francis, and that his preparations were intended for Navarre. To prevent this danger, he rejected Francis's offer, and withal made uſe of it to induce the emperor and Switzers to join with him for the defence of the Milaneſe, intimating there was no room to queſtion, that the king of France would turn his arms that way. As for the emperor, he did not want much ſolicitation. He readily entered into all ſorts of leagues, becauſe he always found means to thrive at another's expence. There was more difficulty with regard to the Switzers, becauſe Francis had among them adherents, who endeavoured to diſſuade them from the league. But his enemies prevailed in the end[w], and the league was concluded between the emperor, the king of Arragon, the duke of Milan, and the Switzers. Ferdinand played one of his uſual artifices upon this occaſion. He perſuaded the Switzers, that to defend the Milaneſe, the ſhorteſt way was to attack the king of France in his own kingdom. For that purpoſe, he engaged to make a powerful diverſion on the ſide of Fontarabia, whilſt the Switzers ſhould invade Burgundy, and the emperor, by continuing the war in the ſtate of Venice, hinder the Venetians from aſſiſting the common enemy. His chief aim was to defend Navarre, in caſe Francis I. had thoughts of turning his arms that way, and then to hinder that prince from becoming maſter of the duchy of Milan. His league with the Switzers was equally ſubſervient to both theſe ends. For if Francis I. invaded Navarre, the Switzers would divert him from his purpoſe, by making an inroad into Burgundy. But if he really intended to conquer Milan, the Switzers, as next neighbours, and moſt concerned, could not diſpenſe with aſſiſting that duchy. What Ferdinand had foreſeen, came to paſs. Francis having ordered his forces to file off towards the Alps, the Switzers ſent their troops into Italy, where they ſeized the two paſſes, through which only it was thought poſſible to enter the Milaneſe. When Ferdinand was aſſured the king of France was marching towards Milan, he diſbanded the army levied for the defence of Navarre, leaving the Milaneſe to be taken care of by the Switzers. The very army Ferdinand had in Italy, under the command of the viceroy of Naples, made no motion to join them. The emperor remained without acting at Inſpruck. Leo X. who had alſo entered into the league, gave them no ſort of aſſiſtance. Thus the whole burthen of the war fell upon the Switzers, without even the other allies ſending a penny of the money that was promiſed them. But this was no wonder. The Switzers were no more exempted than the king of England, and ſo many other princes, whom Maximilian and Ferdinand had ſerved in the ſame manner.

Mean while, Francis I. having found means to march his army through a place which ſeemed impracticable[x], the Switzers who guarded the paſſes retired to Milan, and Francis advanced alſo towards the ſame city. When he approached, he offered the Switzers a ſum of money to return home. This negotiation was now in great forwardneſs, when they received a ſupply of fifteen thouſand men of their nation. This aid rendering them more ſtout, they reſolved by the ſuggeſtions of the cardinal of Sion, immediately to attack Francis, who lay encamped at Marigano, little expecting their coming. They were defeated, and ten thouſand ſlain on the ſpot. After which, they retired into their country, leaving Francis maſter of all the Milaneſe. Maximilian Sforza, who had ſhut himſelf up in the caſtle of Milan, ſurrendered it by capitulation, and was ſent into France, to live as a private perſon.

Before Francis I. began his expedition, Octavian Fregoſa had brought Genoa under the dominion of France, and inſtead of Doge, ſtiled himſelf governor for the king.

Leo X. had been in hopes that Francis would never be able to enter Italy. He had joined in the league againſt him, but ſo privately, that Francis knew nothing of it till he came to Verceil. During the time between the king's arrival in Italy, and the battle of Marignano, the pope was under great perplexities. He had ſent an army into Lombardy, to ſupport the duke of Milan. But when he heard Francis had ſurmounted the difficulties of the paſſage, he ſent orders to Lorenzo de Medici, who commanded his army, to commit no hoſtilities againſt the French. At the ſame time, he told the king, his army was there only to guard Parma and Placentia. Mean while, as the affair of Milan was not yet decided, he durſt not make too many advances to the king, for fear of diſpleaſing the allies, who would have it in their power to be revenged, if the king happened to be vanquiſhed. But, after the battle of Marignano, he was immediately reconciled with him, and though he had grievouſly offended him, obtained, however, advantages which he could ſcarce have expected, had he taken his part from the beginning. The popes make leagues, and undertake wars as temporal princes, and when their affairs do not proſper, diſintangle themſelves as heads of the church, and vicars of Jeſus Chriſt. Though Leo X's behaviour to Francis was ſuch, that he deſerved no favour from that victorious prince, he obtained however whatever he pleaſed, and among other things, the abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction, which the popes, his predeceſſors, had hitherto in vain demanded of the kings of France[y].

Though Henry had not been able entirely to avoid the ſnares laid by the pope, the emperor, and the king of Arragon, he had happily got clear, but with a firm reſolution never more to be thus over-reached. His affecting not to mention them in his treaty with France, plainly ſhewed he did not much value their friendſhip. But he was not ſo fortunate as to perſiſt in this reſolution, ſince it was his own fault that he engaged in a freſh war with France, not ſo much for his own, as the intereſt of others. His change may be aſcribed to three ſeveral cauſes. The firſt is, his jealouſy of the glorious ſucceſs of Francis's arms in Italy. The ſecond, to prevent the growing power of that neighbour. The third and principal, Wolſey his favourite's intereſt, who thinking he had reaſon to complain of the king of France, had a mind to be revenged. The two firſt need no farther explanation. It is well known, that princes are ſubject to paſſions like other men, and that jealouſy may induce them to run counter to their intereſt. It is known likewiſe, that policy is as the hinge on which almoſt all their actions turn. But on this occaſion, Henry proceeded upon a very wrong policy, ſince nothing was more capable of ſecuring the peace of England, than the king of France's acquiſitions in Italy. The third cauſe requires a more particular explanation.

Thomas Wolſey, archbiſhop of York, was prime miniſter, and chief favourite. But this does not fully expreſs the thing. It muſt be added, that he ſo abſolutely governed the king, that he turned him which way he pleaſed. But he managed ſo artfully, that the king always fancied he took his own courſe, when he only followed the ſuggeſtions of his miniſter. Wolſey had great talents for a perſon of his birth, but he had alſo great failings. He was exceſſively revengeful, greedy of poſſeſſions and honours, and intolerably proud. He no ſooner ſaw himſelf fixed in his maſter's favour, but he ſought means to remove from court all thoſe that gave him any jealouſy by the king's eſteem for them. Richard Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, who had been moſt in favour, received ſo many mortifications from this imperious prelate, that at length they quitted the court, not to be expoſed to his inſults. Fox withdrew to his dioceſe the beginning of this year[z]. The two dukes quickly followed[a], and Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, retired alſo at the end of the ſame year. [y] The decrees of the council of Baſil were by them reduced into the form of an edict, and publiſhed under the title of the Pragmatic Sanction; which Charles VII. king of France, declared he would have to be inviolably obſerved. It was abrogated by Lewis XI. which was oppoſed by the parliament. Charles VIII. re-eſtabliſhed it, but it was again annulled by Lewis XII. See a full account of theſe tranſactions in biſhop Burnet's Hiſt. Ref. tom. III. p. 8, &c.

thus removed, Wolſey became ſtill more abſolute over the king, who had only him to adviſe with in his moſt important affairs, the reſt of the privy-council were all the favourite's creatures. The hiſtorians unanimouſly agree, that Wolſey's intereſt was the ſole rule of the counſels he gave the king, and as this intereſt anſwered his reigning paſſions, revenge, greedineſs, ambition, and pride, the reader muſt not be ſurpriſed, when he ſees him hereafter inducing the king to make ſo many falſe ſteps.

Ever ſince Francis I. came to the crown, he had been thinking of recovering Tournay out of the hands of the Engliſh. There had even paſſed in the beginning of the year, a treaty upon that ſubject, but to no purpoſe, becauſe Henry demanded in exchange for Tournay, ſome places in the neighbourhood of Calais [b], which Francis did not think proper to grant him [c]. But the greateſt difficulty came from Wolſey, who was far from adviſing the king his maſter to reſign Tournay, becauſe himſelf would have loſt the adminiſtration of that biſhopirc and the abbey of St. Amand, which brought him a great revenue. On the contrary, he had been very urgent with Francis I. to beſtow ſome good benefice on Lewis Guillard, biſhop of Tournay, that he might ſuffer him peaceably to enjoy his adminiſtration. Francis had promiſed him, but without intending to perform his word. Inſtead of aſſiſting him to keep the adminiſtration, he ſecretly perſuaded the biſhop to ſue to the pope for his reſtoration, and ſeconded his petition to the utmoſt of his power. He was of opinion, that when Wolſey ceaſed to be adminiſtrator, the reſtitution of Tournay would become much eaſier.

Whilſt Francis was ſtill in France, employed in preparing for his Italian expedition, the pope, yet uncertain of the ſucceſs of that enterprize, did not much regard the biſhop's ſolicitations. But when he ſaw that prince maſter of Genoa, and entered the Milaneſe at the head of a powerful army, he readily granted a bull to Guillard, reſtoring to him his biſhopric, and even allowed him to make uſe of the ſecular arm to obtain poſſeſſion. This bull, which ſacrificed the king of England's and his miniſter's intereſt, to thoſe of the French king and the biſhop of Tournay, would ſeem very ſtrange, if the conſideration of the time and circumſtances did not make the wonder ceaſe. Leo X. had given juſt cauſe to Francis, to complain of his conduct, and ſaw that monarch ready to take poſſeſſion again of the Milaneſe, and conclude a treaty with the Switzers, in order to ſend them back into their own country. It was therefore his intereſt to appeaſe him, by granting a favour he ſo earneſtly deſired. Mean while, Henry was extremely offended at the bull, which reſtored to the biſhopric of Tournay, a prelate, who refuſed to ſwear fealty to him, and on which the king of France, and the biſhop of Tournay, might proceed, to raiſe a ſedition in the city. He therefore gave orders to his embaſſador at Rome, to expoſtulate with the pope, and repreſent to him the conſequences of his partiality. Leo X. could not help owning it. But at that very time, Francis gaining the battle of Marignano, and preparing to make him feel the effects of his reſentment, it was no proper ſeaſon to incenſe him farther by revoking the bull. This convinced Wolſey, that Francis was the real author of the biſhop's reſtoration. Mean while, the pope, being embarraſſed, choſe, upon the king of England's oppoſition, to leave the affair undecided, by referring it to the examination of two cardinals, who, probably, were ordered not to haſten the concluſion. In the mean time, Wolſey was uncertain whether he ſhould keep the biſhopric of Tournay. And that was preciſely what the king of France wanted, that this uncertainty might induce the ſelfiſh miniſter to find ſome expedient to make himſelf amends, after which it was apparent, he would no longer oppoſe the reſtitution of Tournay. At the ſame time, to preſerve his friendſhip, which was very neceſſary, by reaſon his credit with the king his maſter, he promiſed to aſſiſt him in procuring a cardinal's cap. Wolſey was extremely ambitious of that dignity. After the death of cardinal Bambridge, he was in hopes of ſucceeding him in the cardinalate, as well as in the archbiſhopric of York. He had even employed to ſolicit it in his name, cardinal Adrian, de Corneto [d], the pope's collector in England, under whom Polydore Virgil, ſerved as ſub-collector. But cardinal Adrian, inſtead of ſerving him as he had promiſed, had done him ill offices. Wolſey being informed of it, was ſo incenſed, that on ſome ſlight pretence he committed Polydore to the Tower. Then he cauſed the king to write to the pope with his own hand, to deſire him to appoint anothor collector in cardinal Adrian's room. The king's letter was ſo ſtrong and paſſionate, that the pope thought fit to comply with his requeſt. However, in his brief of advice, he told him, he knew very well his anger againſt cardinal Adrian, was inſtilled into him by Wolſey. Mean while Polydore Virgil continued in the Tower, till at length cardinal Julius de Medici, and the pope himſelf, interceded for him, by letters of Auguſt the 30th, and September the 3d. As this was at the very time that Francis was ſoliciting a cardinal's cap for Wolſey, Wolſey did not think proper to refuſe the pope a thing of ſo little conſequence. So Polydore came out of the Tower, where he had been about a year. This ill treatment was, doubtleſs, one of the reaſons that induced him to remember all the ill qualities of cardinal Wolſey, in his hiſtory of England.

Wolſey having at length obtained a cardinal's cap, was tranſported with joy when he received the news by an expreſs ſent by the king of France [e]. But though he was highly obliged to that monarch, his gratitude for the favour, did not equal his reſentment for the injury done him, as he ſuppoſed, in the affair of Tournay. He reſolved therefore, in order to be revenged, to endeavour to ſet the king, his maſter, at variance with Francis, and cauſe him to enter into a new league againſt France. Herein he gratified three of his predominant paſſions, his pride, in letting Europe ſee that ſovereigns themſelves offended him not with impunity: his revenge, in creating Francis great troubles; and his own intereſt, in ſecuring the adminiſtration of the biſhopric of Tournay. Indeed, a rupture between the two kings was an effectual means to hinder Guillard's reſtoration of his ſee. This is obſerved by hiſtorians as the principal cauſe of the alteration we are going to behold in Henry's conduct. Jealouſy and policy may have had ſome influence too, but leſs as true cauſes, than as motives uſed by Wolſey to inflame the king's mind. Probably, under colour that his honour was concerned, he repreſented to him the neceſſity of humbling the pride of the French king, and inſinuated, how dangerous it was for England that France ſhould grow too powerful. When he had prepared Henry, he privately ſent word to the emperor, that it would not be impoſſible to diſengage the king his maſter, from the intereſts of France. It may eaſily be gueſſed, Maximilian received the overture with joy. Beſides that, being without aid and allies, he ſaw himſelf little able to preſerve his conqueſt in Italy, he knew, which way ſoever he was treated with, he ſhould always be furniſhed with money. Whilſt Wolſey was projecting to negotiate with the emperor, the Spaniſh embaſſador, who had heavily paſſed ſome months at London, was looked upon at court with a more favourable eye. Nay, a treaty was begun with him about renewing the alliance between England and Spain, which being ended the 19th of October, contained however only a confirmation of the ancient treaties of amity.

Mean while, the emperor, willing to improve the preſent opportunity, ſent to the king a Milaneſe embaſſador, to deſire aid in the name of Franceſco Sforza, who was in Germany, and had aſſumed the title of duke of Milan, ever ſince Maximilian his brother had reſigned his right to the king of France. Though Wolſey had taken care to diſpoſe Henry to a rupture with France, he was not, it ſeems, fully determined. Franceſco Sforza's requeſt, or rather the emperor's, ſeemed to him ſo important, that he deſired to have the opinions of the biſhop of Wincheſter, and the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, who to that intent were ſent for to court. The council being met to debate upon the affair, cardinal Wolſey ſpeaking firſt, made a long ſpeech full of reſentment againſt France, labouring to demonſtrate how much it was for the intereſt of England to oppoſe her growing power [f]. The biſhop of Durham and all the new councellors ſtrenuouſly ſupported the cardinal's opinion. But the old ones endeavoured to diſſuade the king from breaking the peace lately concluded with France, ſince the new king had given him no cauſe, and adviſed him rather to turn his arms againſt Scotland. Henry, who was already prepoſſeſſed, took a middle way, insinuated, doubtless, by his minister: and that was privately to assist the emperor and Francesco Sforza [g]. Whereupon, he sent orders to Pace [h], his embassador to Maximilian, to treat with them, and to promote the treaty, returned him large sums of money [i]. Thus was he gradually engaged, without foreseeing that these secret proceedings must necessarily end in an open war, as Wolsey desired.

There is in the Collection of the Public Acts, a paper, shewing that the cardinal did not forget himself in his negotiations. It is a promise from the duke of Milan's secretary, who, by virtue of an express power from the duke his master, engaged to pay the cardinal a yearly pension of ten thousand ducats, to commence from the day of his master's restoration. It is true, this paper being neither dated nor signed, may be considered only as a draught of the contract; but it is however a proof of the cardinal's selfish temper. The emperor no sooner heard that Henry was inclined to assist him against France, than he dispatched to England, Matthew Skinner, cardinal of Sion, to negotiate a league with him. This is the same prelate, who, a little before, had encouraged the Switzers to give battle to Francis I.

The parliament met again the 12th of November. But as it was not yet time to lay before the houses the king's resolution with regard to France, there was no mention of war, or any foreign affair. The clergy in a synod held at the same time, returned an answer to the pope concerning his demand of an extraordinary subsidy, on pretence of an apparent war with the Turks. They alledged, that they were so exhausted by the late war with France, undertaken at the instance of Julius II. for the defence of the church, that they were not in condition to grant a new subsidy: that besides, by a decree of the council of Constance, the pope could lay no imposition on the clergy without the consent of a general council.

Whilst the English were thus endeavouring to screen themselves from the oppressions of the court of Rome, they beheld one rising in their own body, like a new pope, whom they foresaw, it would be more difficult to resist than him at Rome, because he was supported by the king: I mean Wolsey. Since that prelate was promoted to the cardinalate, he was grown more vain, proud, and imperious than ever. He never stirred without a prince's retinue, always attended by a croud of domestics, causing the cardinal's hat to be carried before him like a sort of trophy, and to be placed on the alter when he went to the king's chapel [k]. He was the first clergyman in England that wore silk in his vestments, and used gold in his saddles. In a word, he devised all sorts of ways to distinguish himself. Every one took such offence at his pride, that it was incessently talked of with indignation. But no man durst open his mouth before the king, since the old bishop of Winchester, for only glancing upon it, was so ill received, that shortly after he withdrew to his diocese. The archbishop of Canterbury was no less offended, than the rest, to see the archbishop of York affect thus so great a distinction. But what gave him most offence was, to see the cross of York carried before the cardinal, though he was in the province of Canterbury. I have spoken elsewhere of this contest between the two archbishops, which after having caused violent quarrels, could not be decided, but by the king's express commands to the archbishops of York, not to have the cross carried before them in the other province. But Wolsey, who thought himself much above his predecessors, prepared to revive the contest in contempt of these prohibitions. Wardham, who was of a peaceable temper, easily perceived, that though he should attempt to hinder it, he would not succeed, because Wolsey had an absolute sway over the king. So, not to have continually this object before his eyes, he desired the king's leave to resign his chancellorship, and retire to his palace. His request was immediately granted, and the same day the king gave the seal, to cardinal Wolsey. In all appearance, he had created Warham so many mortifications only to oblige him to quit his office, with which he desired to be invested himself. To support the splendor of his dignity with more state than any other before him, the king loaded him every day with fresh favours, prebends, wardships, and the like, which continually increased his revenues. Besides the archbishopric of York, and the chancellorship, he had in farm upon easy terms, the bishoprics of Bath, Worcester, and Hereford [l], held by Italians residing at Rome. But this was not sufficient to satisfy him. I must now, before I close the year 1515, briefly mention the affairs of Scotland, the knowlege whereof is requisite for the better understanding the events related hereafter.

John duke of Albany, who had been declared regent in 1513, arrived not in Scotland till May 1515. He found the kingdom full of factions and divisions, which made him sensible, the administration committed to him would prove very troublesome. But what gave him most uneasiness was, that the king of England was but too much concerned in what passed in Scotland, and fomented these dissentions to the utmost of his power. Under colour that Scotland had been some time without a regent, Henry VIII. as uncle of the young king, had taken the title of protector of Scotland, and by virtue thereof his embassadors at Rome demanded of the pope the ecclesiastical preferments of that kingdom, which he bestowed on his creatures. But as soon as the duke of Albany was arrived, he wrote to the pope in the young king's name, sharply complaining of the king of England's incroachments, and the court of Rome's condescension. He even threatened the pope in his letter not to apply to him for the future upon any account whatsoever, if this grievance were not speedily redressed [m].

The duke of Albany, though of Scotch extraction, was a stranger to Scotland [n], from whence the duke, his father, had retired in 1483. As he desired in the beginning of his regency to be informed of the state of the kingdom, he unhappily applied to Hepburne, bishop of Murray, a hot and revengeful man, who took this occasion to be revenged on his enemies. The bishop, being prior of St. Andrews, had been elected archbishop of that church in the beginning of the present reign. But he was forced to resign the archbishopric to Forman, bishop of Murray, who was armed with the pope's bull. However, Forman would never have ventured to use the bull, had he not been supported by Alexander Hume, a potent lord before mentioned. By his credit and authority, Forman was installed in St. Andrew's, having resigned the bishopric of Murray to Hepburne, and promised to pay him a certain pension. Hepburne finding he had a fair opportunity to be revenged, gave the regent such a character of Hume, that when he came to court he was looked upon with a very ill eye. Hume being naturally very proud and haughty, resolving to let the regent see no man should slight him with impunity, went over to the queen-dowager and persuading her that the king her son was in danger, advised her to carry him into England. The regent hearing of this plot suddenly went to Sterling-castle, and secured the young king's person. But to hinder his enemies from putting an ill construction on this action he renewed his oath of allegiance to the king, and committed the care of his education to three persons of great credit.

Alexander Hume, and his brother William, seeing their plot was discovered, fled immediately into England, and were quickly followed by the queen and her spouse, the earl of Angus. Whereupon the regent sent embassadors to Henry, to justify his conduct, and at the same time so artfully treated with the fugitives, that he prevailed with them to return into Scotland. But the queen being big with child, was forced to stay at Harbottle-castle in Northumberland, where she was delivered [o] of a daughter called Margaret [p]. The sequel of this affair shall be related in another place.

She

all Europe in a war with France. Thus, notwithſtanding he cardinal's projects, Henry was forced to remain in peace, becauſe the intereſts of the reſt of the princes were not agreeable to his, or rather to the paſſions of his miniſter. But though Europe was peaceable for ſome time, it will be however neceſſary to relate in each year of this peace, the ſituation of the affairs of the principal ſtates, in order to ſhew the occaſion of the following wars.

Nothing remarkable paſſed in England in the beginning of the year 1516, except the birth of a princeſs, whom the queen brought into the world the eighteenth of February, and called Mary[r]. Cardinal Wolſey, commonly called the cardinal of York, ever mindful of what could procure him any advantage, cauſed thoſe who had managed the king's money to be called to a ſtrict account. The moſt part however were ſpared. But thoſe were ſeverely puniſhed who had not the addreſs to make the miniſter their friend[s].

After Ferdinand's deceaſe, the kingdom of Arragon came of courſe to Joanna his eldeſt daughter, already queen of Caſtile. But that princeſs was incapable of governing her dominions by reaſon of her defect of underſtanding, which had obliged the king her father to keep her confined. So the adminiſtration of theſe two kingdoms, with all their dependencies, could not be diſputed with Charles of Auſtria, Joanna's eldeſt ſon, and ſovereign of the Low-Countries. But as that prince lived in Flanders, Ferdinand had left by his will the regency of Arragon to Alphonſo, his natural ſon, biſhop of Saragoſſa, and that of Caſtile to cardinal Ximenes, till Charles ſhould come himſelf and aſſume the government. Mean while, when Ximenes would have taken poſſeſſion of the regency of Caſtile, Adrian Florentio, doctor in divinity, who managed the prince of Auſtria's affairs in Spain, produced letters patents from his maſter, conſtituting him regent of that kingdom. But Ximenes refuſed to acknowledge him as ſuch, pretending that Charles had not power to appoint a regent before he was received for governor. The conteſt was however adjuſted by this expedient, that the orders ſhould be ſigned by both. But the cardinal left the doctor the bare name of regent only, and diſcharged all the functions himſelf. Mean while Charles took the title of king of Caſtile, with the conſent of the ſtates of that realm. But the Arragonians, more jealous of their privileges than the Caſtilians, refuſed to give him the title of king of Arragon, whilſt his mother Joanna was alive. Nay, there was a party in the kingdom who maintained, that Joanna herſelf could not pretend to the crown of Arragon, becauſe the daughters were excluded by the laws of the realm, and therefore Charles could not derive from his mother a right ſhe never had. But others affirmed, that the excluſion of the females extended not to their male heirs. This was much the ſame caſe as happened formerly in France, in the diſpute between Edward III. and Philip of Valois. I ſhall enter no farther into the affairs of Spain. What I have ſaid is ſufficient to ſhew the neceſſity Charles was under of going thither, and how dangerous it would have been for him to engage in a war againſt France, in the beginning of ſo unſettled a reign. Accordingly he neglected nothing to renew the treaties of peace and alliance as well with France as England, but with liberty to take other meaſures when his affairs ſhould be in another ſituation. Juſt before the king of Arragon's death, he had, as ſovereign of the Low-Countries, renewed the alliance with England, by a new treaty concluded at Bruſſels the 24th of February this year[t]. About a month after, Henry, who was contriving to from a league againſt France, ordered his embaſſador to treat with Charles upon that head. But Ferdinand's death ſo changed the face of affairs, that Henry was forced to be ſatisfied with a bare defenſive league, which I ſhall preſently mention, having firſt related the ſucceſs of an expedition made by the emperor into Italy.

It was not without reaſon, that Maximilian had readily embraced the opportunity offered him by cardinal Wolſey of making war upon France. There was on more likelihood of his being able to keep his conqueſts in the ſtate of Venice, ſince Francis I. was become maſter of the Milaneſe, and had joined forces with the Venetians. Beſides, he could expect no farther aſſiſtance from the pope, who had lately agreed with Francis. As for the Spaniſh army, which was retired to Naples, it was not eaſy to cauſe them to return, ſince they were neceſſarily to march through the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. On the other hand, king Ferdinand's death had changed the poſture of affairs, and quite deſtroyed the emperor's hopes. So far was the new king of Caſtile from having any thoughts of a war with France, that it highly concerned him to keep peace with that kingdom, in order to have time to ſettle his affairs in Spain. Thus the emperor, contrary to his uſual method, was forced to act alone during this year, in the expectation of ſo embroiling affairs, that other potentates ſhould at length be conſtrained to join with him. He had already received ſome of the king of England's money and cardinal Wolſey put him in hopes of ſtill larger ſums. With this aid, he aſſembled an army of about twenty thouſand men, Germans and Switzers, and in March entered the ſtate of Venice, whilſt the Venetians, aſſiſted by a body of French troops, commanded by Lautrec, were beſieging Breſcia. Upon his approach, the French and Venetians raiſed the ſiege, and after making a ſhew of oppoſing his paſſages of the rivers, retired to Milan to avoid a battle. Thus the emperor approached Milan, without much difficulty.

The French were in ſo great conſternation, that they were like to abandon both the city and duchy, and retire into France. If the emperor had made all the haſte he could he would doubtleſs have forced them to execute that reſolution. But having ſpent two or three days to no purpoſe, by the time he came before Milan, the French had received news, that ten thouſand Switzers of the Cantons in alliance with France were coming to their aſſiſtance, and were within a day's march.

The arrival of the ten thouſand Switzers at Milan threw both ſides into an equal conſternation. The French, who conſidered theſe troops as a ſure aid, were ſtruck with aſtoniſhment, when they heard that they abſolutely refuſed to fight againſt the Switzers in the emperor's army. Theſe, on their part, demanded their pay with ſuch boldneſs, that Maximilian was afraid it was a pretence not to join battle with their countrymen newly arrived at Milan. He had no money for them, and was apprehenſive the French had but too much to corrupt them. So, when it was leaſt expected, he ſuddenly retired, after which, having no money to pay them, the army diſbanded of themſelves.

Having thus miſſed his aim, the emperor was forced upon new trials to engage the pope, the king of England, the young king of Caſtile, his grandſon in a league againſt France. But this project was not eaſy to be executed. The pope had his private views, which ſuffered him not to break openly with France. Charles's council were better adviſed than to agree, that their maſter ſhould engage to gratify his grandfather's paſſion at a time when he was neceſſarily obliged to go into Spain, and take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms. Thus the emperor's whole refuge lay in the aſſiſtance he could expect from England. But as there was no likelihood, that Henry would undertake a war of which he was to bear all the expence, Maximilian bethought himſelf of a device to preſerve his good diſpoſition towards him, or at leaſt to draw money from him, and that was, to declare to Robert Wingfield, the Engliſh embaſſador at his court, that he was tired with the burden of the empire, and having a particular eſteem for the king, his maſter, intended to reſign it to him. For that purpoſe, he charged him to write to the king, that if he would come to the Triers, he would call a diet and ſettle that grand affair, after which he offered to wait upon him to Rome, to ſee him receive the imperial crown. Moreover, he put him in hopes, he would reſign to him his right to the duchy of Milan, and aſſiſt him to conquer it. Henry eaſily perceived Maximilian's aim in making ſuch an offer, and therefore wrote to his embaſſador to thank the emperor for his good intention, deſiring him to defer the execution of the project to a more convenient ſeaſon, when the French ſhould be expelled out of Italy. Mean while, in return for his good will, he ſent him ſome money, excuſing the former defect of payment, with laying the blame on a Genoa banker[u].

Whilſt the emperor was endeavouring to embroil the French affairs Francis was forming new projects. He had good reaſon to be pleaſed with his glorious campaign, which in a ſhort time had regained him the duchy of Milan. Mean while, Ferdinand's death inſpiring him with freſh hopes, he formed the deſign of ſeizing the kingdom of Naples, imagining the new king of Spain would be unable to defend it, before he was thoroughly ſettled in his kingdoms. Beſides, he believed he had ſo attached the pope to his intereſt by the treaty of Bologna, that he did not doubt to find in him all the aſſiſtance neceſſary to his undertaking, looking upon him as his beſt friend. But he did not know Leo X. That pontiff did by no means deſire the French ſhould become more powerful in Italy, and if he teſtified to the king, that he was in his intereſts, it was only to prevent his oppoſing the projects he had himſelf formed in favour of his own houſe. The emperor's invaſion of the Milaneſe this year, interrupted the execution of Francis's deſign upon Naples, and what afterwards happened, cauſed him to lay aſide all thoughts of it. However, his deſire to conquer that kingdom occaſioned a defenſive league againſt him towards the end of the year, as will be related after a word or two more of the Italian affairs.

Leo X. was no ſooner reconciled with Francis I. than he deprived, upon a frivolous pretence, the duke of Urbino of his duchy, and inveſted Lorenzo de Medici, who aſſumed from thence forward the title of duke of Urbino, and the diſpoſſeſſed duke retired to Mantua.

It was in order to accompliſh this deſign, that the pope had flattered Francis with the hopes of aſſiſting him in the conqueſt of Naples. But after he was become maſter of Urbino by that monarch's connivance, inſtead of thanking him for it, he thought only how to drive the French out of the duchy of Milan. To that end, he held ſecret intelligence with the emperor, the king of England, and the new king of Spain, and uſed his utmoſt endeavours, by the help of his emiſſaries, to perſuade the Switzers to break their alliance with France. Though he acted with all poſſible precaution he could not treat ſo privately, but that his ſecret practices came to the king's knowledge, who pretended however to be ignorant of them. On the contrary, he did all that lay in his power to gain the pope in reality to his intereſt, otherwiſe he was ſenſible his attempt upon Naples would never ſucceed. Leo X. deſired nothing more than to amuſe him, whilſt he was ſecretly acting againſt him. But at length, Francis perceiving his inſincerity, dropped all thoughts of the conqueſt of Naples, and reſolved to treat with the king of Spain, who in the preſent ſituation of his affairs could not but wiſh to live in a good underſtanding with him. Thus the two kings being equally inclined to a peace, ſent their plenipotentiaries to Noyon to conclude it. The treaty was ſigned the 26th of Auguſt, the ſubſtance whereof was, That Charles ſhould eſpouſe Louiſa, Francis's daughter, then about a year old. That he ſhould have with her the king of France's pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples, and till the marriage ſhould be conſummated, he [w] ſhould give for the young prince's maintenance a hundred thouſand crowns a year. That within ſix months he ſhould reſign the kingdom of Navarre to Henry d'Albret, ſon of John d'Albert, and Catharine, king and queen of Navarre, who were diſpoſſeſſed by Ferdinand, and in caſe Charles ſhould not perform this article, Francis ſhould be allowed to aſſiſt the king of Navarre. Laſtly, That the emperor ſhould reſtore Verona to the Venetians, who in return ſhould pay him two hundred thouſand crowns, and give him a full diſcharge for the ſum of three hundred thouſand crowns lent him by king Lewis XII. to maintain the war againſt Venice. It is very viſible, that in a treaty ſo advantageous to France, Charles meant only to gain time, by granting him whatever he could deſire, for fear of being hindered from going to take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms. Accordingly, the treaty was afterwards very ill obſerved.

The peace of Noyon was directly contrary to the deſigns of the pope, the emperor, and the king of England. The pope was extremely deſirous the French ſhould be expelled out of Italy. Maximilian was wholly intent upon raiſing enemies to Francis, to hinder his aſſiſting the Venetians. He ſaw, he muſt reſolve either to ratify the treaty of Noyon, and conſequently reſtore Verona, or defend his conqueſt without the aſſiſtance of any ally. To avoid both theſe extremes, he tried all poſſible means to embroil affairs, and kindle a new war which might occaſion a league againſt France. He hoped thereby to be able to reject, without danger, the treaty of Noyon, which he believed very prejudicial to his intereſts. It is true, the reſtitution of Verona would be worth to him five hundred thouſand crowns. But out of that ſum were deducted the three hundred thouſand, he owed the king of France, but never intended to pay him. So, for the ſum of two hundred thouſand crowns, he was bound to reſtore Verona, that is to ſay, he was to be ſhut out of Italy, the only thing that made him conſiderable in the preſent ſituation of the affairs of Europe. Henry VIII. was no leſs deſirous of a war with France, being prompted thereto by cardinal Wolſey, or by his jealouſy of Francis. But it was not the ſame with the archduke, to whom a peace for ſome time was very advantageous.

This was the ſubject of the ſeveral negotiations, ſet on foot from the concluſion of the treaty of Noyon to the end of October. The chief end of the pope, the emperor, and the king of England, was to diſengage the eight Swiſs Cantons in alliance with France, from the intereſt of that crown, that their troops might ſerve to invade the Milaneſe. Mean while they were labouring to form a league, wherein they paſſionately deſired to engage the new king of Spain. But all they could obtain was, his conſent to a defenſive league, in caſe Francis attacked any of the confederates. Leo X. according to his uſual cuſtom, would not openly declare himſelf, but intimated, he would freely join in the league, when concluded, if a place was left for him. As to the Switzers, it was reſolved to include them, though they deſired it not, upon the hopes of engaging them by means of ſome of their nation, who had been gained.

This league was therefore concluded at London the 29th of October, about two months after the treaty of Noyon. It ran, that the emperor, the kings of England and Spain, engaged to defend one another againſt any prince that ſhould attack one of the three, and the number of troops each was to find, was ſettled [x]. That all princes, potentates, republics, and ſtates, which deſired to enter into the league, ſhould be admitted: that as the confederates had reaſon to hope the pope would be willing to be admitted, they declared him head of the league. Finally, that all the Swiſs Cantons ſhould be deemed included in the league, provided they ratified it, and to that end the penſions, which ſhould be agreed upon with them, ſhould be aſſigned them. By a private article, ſigned two days after, it was agreed what each of the allies was to pay towards the penſions, which ſhould be diſtributed to the Switzers, as well to the public as to private perſons [y], (which are the very words) in order to induce them to come into the league. This ſhews there was no certainty of gaining them, and that the chief reliance was upon the cabals of ſome private perſons of their nation.

To this league, ſo inconſiderable in itſelf, tended all the motions of the pope, the emperor, and the king of England, during the courſe of this year. The emperor had been in hopes of ſomething more; and though by the treaty the allies were, in ſome meaſure, bound to aſſiſt him, if the king of France continued to aid the Venetians, he ſoon diſreliſhed a league which procured him no money. Before the year was expired, he accepted and ratified the treaty of Noyon. At the ſame time, he concluded with the Venetians a truce for ſome months, and with one conſent they put the reſt of their differences to arbitration. The emperor's reſolution entirely changed the face of affairs, as will be ſeen the next year. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, that preſently after the league was ſigned, Henry ſent Richard Pace to the Switzers, to perſuade them to come into the league; but it was to no purpoſe. On the contrary, the emperor reſolving to make peace with the Venetians, agreed, that the five cantons who had refuſed to join with France ſhould come into the treaty made by the other eight with that crown.

Before I end the occurrences of the year 1516, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention what paſſed in Scotland. Henry having formed great projects againſt France, and knowing how much the duke of Albany had at heart the good of that kingdom, reſolved to compel the Scots to remove him from the regency. To that purpoſe, he deſired them to ſend embaſſadors, to whom he might impart certain matters advantageous to both kingdoms. This negotiation tended only to preſs the great men of Scotland to expel the duke of Albany. He even wrote to the parliament of Scotland, that the beſt way to preſerve peace between the two nations, was to ſend back the regent into France, under colour that it was dangerous to truſt the preſumptive heir to the crown, with the guardianſhip of the young king; intimating withal, that in caſe of refuſal, he ſhould be obliged to take care himſelf by proper methods, of the ſafety of the king his nephew. He alſo gave to underſtand, that he claimed the regency as uncle to the young king. But the parliament returned such an answer, as fully convinced him, the Scots were by no means inclined to comply with his will [z].

Whether Hume was concerned in the king of England's proceedings, or was only suspected, the parliament summoned him to come and answer the accusation against him. Hume not thinking fit to appear, was condemned for default. He looked upon the sentence as unjust, and in revenge committed hostilities upon some of his enemies. Whereupon the parliament granted to the viceroy a levy of ten thousand men to chastise the rebel. But his friends advising him to submit, he cast himself upon the regent's mercy, who sent him to Edinburgh, and committed him to the custody of James Hamilton [a] his brother-in-law. Shortly after, Hume persuaded the lord Hamilton to escape with him, and claim the regency, as son of James the third's sister [b], and consequently as nearly related to the king as the duke of Albany. He said, if the duke could alledge, he was descended from the male line, it might be objected, he was son of a fugitive born out of the kingdom, and hardly able to speak the country language. The regent hearing of their flight and contrivance marched against Hamilton castle and took it in a few days. Then Hume perceiving it was time to throw off the mask, raised troops, and taking Dunbar utterly destroyed the town.

Mean while, the embassadors sent by the regent into England in May, had concluded a truce the first of June. But as Henry had granted the truce only to promote the execution of his designs, he appeared little inclined to observe it, after receiving the forementioned answer. But to avoid a war which must have been fatal to Scotland, the regent sent him to Francis de la Fayette, certain articles desiring his approbation, for which he offered to come in person and pay him his respects. At that time the affairs of the rest of Europe having, as hath been said, taken a new turn, Henry agreed to prolong the truce to the end of the year 1517.

These are the most considerable events which passed in the several states of Europe during the year 1516. I shall only add a word concerning the council of Lateran, which still continued its sessions without having much to do. As the council meddled neither with the reformation of the church, though they seemed to be called for that very purpose, nor with the exterpation of heresy, they resolved, in order to keep themselves employed, to reform the calandar, which was become very faulty. To that end, the pope causing memorandums to be drawn, undertook to write to all the Christian princes, inviting them to send their best astronomers to Rome, or at least to order them to examine what had been proposed upon that subject. We find in the conclusion of the Public Acts, the brief addressed to Henry VIII. where the pope says he had adjourned the next session to December to give the mathematicians time to send in their opinions.

[1517] The emperor having ratified the treaty of Noyon, as far as it concerned him, restored Verona to the Venetians, the 15th of January this year, having received two hundred thousand crowns, and an acquittance for what he owed the king of France. Moreover, to give the arbitrators time to adjust the differences he still had with Venice, he agreed that the truce should be prolonged for five years, but on condition that, during the truce, the Venetians should pay him yearly twenty thousand crowns. It was almost impossible to make a treaty with him, and money not accrue to him from it. Thus ended at length a war which may be deemed a consequence of the league of Cambray. The Venetians were engaged in it from the beginning to the end, and expended no less than five millions of ducats of the public treasure, besides the infinite damages sustained by the subjects.

Maximilian, having thus desisted from his designs upon Italy, went into the Low-Countries to see his grandson, Charles, before he departed from Spain. During his stay there, he concluded with him and the king of France a league against the Turks, wherein a place was reserved for the king of England. The pope and the council of Lateran earnestly pressed all the princes of Christendom to join in the league, on pretence of the progress the Turks were making in Egypt against the Mamalucks [c], after which, he pretended, their design was to attack the Christians. But what followed shewed the pope's sole view was to heap up money for his own use, and to enrich his family.

Mean while, Charles, the new king of Spain, thought only of speedily going to take possession of his kingdoms. He had just made with Francis I. a peace so advantageous to France, that he did not fear that prince would break it, because it would not be for his interest. So when the English embassador pressed him to ratify the London league, he deferred it some time on divers pretences, because deeming it needless, he was afraid of offending the king of France. He ratified it however after some alterations, and at length in August departed for Spain, where his presence was absolutely necessary. Upon his arrival, he dismissed cardinal Ximanes, who died with grief. After that, he so gave himself up to the Flemings, whom he had brought with him, that the Spaniards conceived such a jealousy as carried them afterwards to great extremities.

The pope, as I have observed, continually amused Francis with the hopes of a strict alliance with him, at the very time he was raising him enemies on all sides, Francis was partly informed of his proceedings, but did not know all. So, in expectation of really attaching him in the end to his interests, he omitted nothing he thought capable of gaining him, even feigning to deem him his best friend, when he most suspected him. But as the pope knew in his conscience, he had not deserved Francis's friendship, he could not believe his advances sincere. Mean while, it was for his interest that Francis should publicly appear to be his friend, and therefore he kept very fair with him, and not without cause. In the beginning of the year 1517, la Rovere who had been dispossessed of the duchy of Urbino, prepared to recover his dominions. When by the truce concluded between the emperor and the Venetians, the Spanish troops in the state of Venice were become useless, la Rovere found means to gain and employ them in his service. With these supplies, he took Urbino, and carried terror into Tuscany and the ecclesiastical state. Lorenzo de Medici, the new duke of Urbino, or rather the pope, his uncle, being then unable to recover that duchy, he was forced to have recourse to the assistance of the Christian princes, under colour that the church was grievously oppressed, the interests of the house of the Medici being then the same with those of the church. Francis I. who had the gaining of the pope ever in view, made use of this opportunity to do him a signal service, in sending him a good body of troops, under the command of Lescun, brother of Lautrec. This war however lasted seven or eight months, during which the pope never ceased to press all the christian princes to contribute to the charges of a war, which according to him, ought to have affected all the world. Henry VIII. being solicited like the rest, refused to interpose. But the pope found means to engage his subjects, by levying a tenth upon the clergy, of which cardinal Wolsey was appointed collector. The war of Urbino ended in a way la Rovere did not expect. The pope bribed the Spaniards in his service, who came to an agreement for him which he was obliged to accept. Thus being once more constrained to relinquish his dominions, he retired to Mantua.

Whilst the pope was employed in the war of Urbino, he discovered a plot against his person, contrived by the cardinal of Sienna, who had bribed a surgeon to poison him. The cardinal being absent from Rome when the discovery was made, the pope, who passionately desired to have him in his power scrupled not to use fraud to compass his ends. He sent him a safe conduct, and moreover, promised the Spanish embassador that he would do him no hurt. The cardinal being ſo weak as to come to Rome upon the faith of the ſafe conduct, was immediately confined in the caſtle of St. Angelo, and afterwards ſtrangled in priſon. The Spaniſh embaſſador complained of his breach of faith, but was told by the pope, a ſafe conduct was never reckoned to extend to high treaſon, without expreſs mention of the caſe. Some other cardinals accuſed or ſuſpected of being concerned in the plot, were depoſed, impriſoned, or ſeverely fined.

[c] The word Mamaluck signifies Syriac, a hired soldier, Jovius says they were Circassian slaves sold by the Tartars, and Podolians, to the merchants, and being trained up at Cairo, in military exercises, were picked out for the Soldan's guard, and preferred to the high posts, who, in 1255, resolved to obtain the kingdom of Egypt for themselves. The government was elective, and the son could claim no inheritance but his father's personal estate. Every Mamaluck, whose number in all was about sixteen or eighteen thousand, had a vote in the election, and required a gold ducat of the Soldan as soon as chosen. There were in all of this race sixteen kings, from the year before mentioned, to the present year 1517, when Tonombeius II. their last king, was conquered in the first year of his reign, by Selimus I. Thus Egypt became a province of the Turkish empire, as it still continues. Heylin, &c. Guicciard.

Francis I. never ceaſed courting the pope to gain his friendſhip, fearing that by his ſecret practices he would rekindle the war, to deprive him of Milan. He imagined to have found at laſt an infallible means to attach him to his intereſts, in procuring Lorenzo de Medici a very advantageous marriage, with Magdalen heireſs of the houſe of Boulogne. This propoſal was gladly accepted, and Lorenzo repairing to Paris for that purpoſe, ſtood godfather in the pope's name, to the French dauphin, born the beginning of this year. In acknowledgment for the king's favour to Lorenzo, the pope granted him tenths upon the clergy, under colour of the war to be waged with the Turks. But he took care to aſſign fifty thouſand livres for the charges of the wedding, which was to be ſolemnized at Paris.

The pretended war Chriſtendom was to undertake againſt the Turks, ſeemed to the pope to be a fair opportunity to inrich himſelf by the contributions of the Chriſtians. To that end, he granted plenary indulgences to all that would contribute, and cauſed them to be publicly ſold at ſo moderate a price, that a man muſt have been very careleſs of his ſalvation not to purchaſe them. But it was this that made the pope expect to reap an immenſe profit, for probably, there would not be a Chriſtian without them. Mean while, that the money ariſing from the ſale might be regularly collected, all Chriſtendom was parted into ſo many diviſions, and in each were appointed collectors to receive the money, and preachers to extol the benefit of indulgences[d]. But, by an accident, which at firſt ſeemed of no conſequence, the archbiſhop of Mentz, who was commiſſioned to appoint the preachers in Germany, happened to aſſign Saxony to the Jacobins, whereas in the former cruſades, the Auguſtines had been employed in that office. The injury done to theſe laſt, rouſed their jealouſy. They narrowly examined the behaviour of the preachers as well as collectors, ridiculed them, and afterwards publicly complained of them. At length, Martin Luther, an Auguſtine fryar and profeſſor in divinity in the new univerſity of Wertemberg, publiſhed ſome writings againſt them, not without ſatirical remarks upon the indulgences themſelves. This boldneſs drew upon him enemies, who by their oppoſition, obliged him by degrees to inquire more carefully into the grounds of thoſe indulgences. In ſhort, he was convinced, they had no foundation in the holy ſcriptures. From thence forward, he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to undeceive the public concerning the hitherto received opinion of the papal power. Hence ſprung the reformation which ſpread itſelf afterwards through Germany, and ſeveral other ſtates of Europe.

The pope at firſt did not much regard Luther's repreſentations. He never imagined that the papal power, which ſeemed to ſtand upon unmoveable foundations, could be prejudiced by a ſingle fryar. So deſpiſing this inconſiderable oppoſition, he continued without interruption to ſell his indulgences. He every where publiſhed, that a powerful effort was going to be made upon the infidels, and exhorted all Chriſtians to contribute, according to their abilities, towards ſo neceſſary a war, which would procure them, beſides many temporal advantages, deliverance from the pains of purgatory provided they would qualify themſelves for the indulgences. There was however one thing which very much cooled the zeal of many Chriſtians for the cruſade. It was diſcovered that the pope had beforehand diſpoſed, for his temporal concerns, of the money which was to ariſe from the ſale of the indulgences. For inſtance, he had aſſigned to Magdalen de Medici, his ſiſter, wife to Franciſco Cibo, natural ſon of Innocent VIII. part of the money to be raiſed in Germany. Mean while, he continued his ſolicitations in all the ſtates of Europe. He forgot not to write to Henry VIII. exhorting him to join his forces with thoſe of the other Chriſtian princes, and to excite him to this good work, by great commendations of his conſtant zeal for the defence of the holy ſee, and exaltation of the faith. All theſe encomiums ended in demanding two hundred thouſand ducats for the pretended war againſt the infidels. But it does not appear, the king complied with his requeſt. The Turks were then employed in Egypt and Perſia, and the cruſade was founded only upon a bare conjecture that after ending theſe wars, they would invade Chriſtendom. A man muſt have wilfully ſhut his eyes, not to ſee, it was but a pretence to fill the pope's coffers. Beſides, in the preſent ſituation of the affairs of Europe, Henry had no great occaſion for the pope.

Mean time, cardinal Wolſey perceiving, the league of London would come to nothing, becauſe Francis was not diſpoſed to commence a new war with any of the confederates, dreaded his uſing this time of peace to move the affair of the biſhopric of Tournay. On the other hand, he plainly ſaw by the time paſſed ſince that buſineſs had been put into the hands of the commiſſioners, that he was greatly regarded, as having an abſolute ſway over the king his maſter. Indeed, nothing could be expected from the king but through his means, and for that reaſon all the princes ſtudiouſly made their court to him, to gain him to their intereſts. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, that Charles, king of Spain, aſſigned him this year an annual penſion of three thouſand livres, though he had yet received no ſervices from him. And therefore it was for thoſe he hoped to receive for the future. Mean while, Wolſey was uneaſy about Tournay. As the pope and the king of France regarded him only for the ſake of what he could do for them, he was in danger of loſing that regard in caſe they ſhould come not to want him. He began therefore privately to intimate to Francis I. that it would not be impoſſible to perſuade Henry to reſtore Tournay for a ſum which ſhould be agreed upon, provided he himſelf was recompenſed for the adminiſtration of the biſhopric. I ſhall relate the next year the ſucceſs of this negotiation.

Henry enjoying this year great tranquillity, reſolved to ſee what the emperor intended with reſpect to the reſignation of the empire, which he had cauſed to be mentioned to him. Maximilian being in Flanders with the king of Caſtile, his grandſon, Henry ſent the biſhop of Wincheſter, with doctor Cuthbert Tunſtal, to renew the negotiation with him, acquainting him withal, if he would appoint a convenient place, he would come and confer with him in perſon. The emperor, who had never intended to reſign the empire to him, and ſtill leſs at that time, very civilly anſwered, that to ſave the king the trouble of croſſing the ſea, he would come himſelf and confer with him in England. But when the embaſſadors preſſed him upon the affairs they were charged with, they found he ſought only to evade his own offer. One while he ſaid, he would reſign the empire to Henry, but firſt would try to obtain of the diet, that himſelf and poſterity might preſerve the title of king of the Romans. Another while, he talked of making Charles, his grandſon, emperor, Henry, king of the Romans, Ferdinand, brother to Charles, king of Auſtria, and himſelf only marſhal of the empire. Theſe variations convinced the embaſſadors, nothing was to be expected from the negotiation, and acquainting the king therewith, he was ſatisfied Maximilian had no other deſign than to draw money from him.

There was this year an inſurrection of the London apprentices againſt the foreign merchants, wherein ſome perſons loſt their lives. But it was appeaſed by the puniſhment of ſome of the ſeditious, who were hanged in the principal ſtreets of the city[e].

This ſame year the ſweating ſickneſs made great ravages in the kingdom, and eſpecially at London. Moſt of thoſe that were ſeized with it, died within three hours, and no

[d] It had been ſtill taught and believed for a good while, that the pope, out of the inexhauſtible treaſure of the church, ariſing from the merits of Chriſt, and works of ſupererogation of the ſaints, had a power of diſtributing indulgences on certain conditions preſcribed by him, to the the greateſt and moſt profligate of ſinners, for a plenary remiſſion of ſin, (as it is practiſed at this day, in Portugal, &c.) Theſe indulgences are ſuppoſed at firſt to reach only to relaxation of penances or eccleſiaſtical diſcipline. Urban II. in the beginning of the XIth century, was the firſt that granted a full remiſſion of all ſins, to thoſe who ſhould take up arms for the recovery of the Holy Land from the infidels. Which cuſtom was kept up by his ſucceſſors, ſome of whom extended the benefit of their indulgences to ſuch perſons who being unwilling or unable to go, maintained a ſoldier in their room. At length theſe ſpiritual favours were diſtributed to thoſe who took the field againſt the enemies of holy church or heretics. Great ſums were raiſed by this means, but ſeldom applied to the ends for which they were intended. Leo X. reſolving to follow ſo good precedents, opened a general mart for indulgences, the benefit whereof was to extend even to the dead, whoſe ſouls, upon payment of ſo much money, were immediately redeemed out of purgatory. People had likewiſe the liberty of eating eggs and white meats on faſt days, and of chuſing their confeſſor, and the like. Guicciardini ſays, that the powers for releaſing ſouls out of purgatory were openly played for in taverns. B. 13.

[e] The chief author of this inſurrection (which began April 21) was one John Lincoln, a broker. He drew up a Paper full of complaints againſt the foreign merchants, which he got doctor Bele, a noted preacher, to read in his pulpit on Eaſter Tueſday; whereupon the mob aſſembled, and committed ſeveral outrages. The reader may ſee a full account of this inſurrection in Hall, fol. 59—63. Hollingſh. p. 840, &c.

This

cure could be found. As this diſtemper was peculiar to England, it was called ſudor Anglicus, or the Engliſh ſweat [f].

The affairs of Scotland were ſtill in great diſorder, by reaſon of the factions in the kingdom. Alexander Hume, and his brother William, after ſeveral pardons, were at laſt beheaded [g]. After the death of the two brothers, the duke of Albany, hoping Scotland would be in perfect tranquillity, reſolved to take a journey to France, promiſing to return in a few months. But being detained there longer than he expected, by accidents mentioned hereafter, the affairs of Scotland fell into great confuſion, becauſe of the diſſenſions of the nobles, which were inflamed by thoſe who deſigned to take advantage of them.

[1518] Mean while, the pope earneſtly puſhed the affair of the pretended war, contriving with the embaſſadors reſiding at his court, projects which would have required more zeal than princes uſually have, as well as more union among them. To execute his deſigns, it was neceſſary to raiſe immenſe ſums of money, and that was the ſecret intent of the league propoſed by the pope, of which he was to be the head and director. To that end, he exhauſted, if I may ſo ſay, the church's treaſures, to encourage the faithful to exchange their periſhing riches for everlaſting advantages. This affair was carried ſo far, that he ſent legates to all the courts, to excite the ſovereigns to join their forces together, for the deſtruction of the infidels. There was not one but what outwardly ſhewed an exreme deſire to apply himſelf to ſo holy a work, provided he could be ſecured from being diſturbed by his neighbours. But that was the thing which rendered the execution of the project very difficult, becauſe they had no confidence in one another. They had no more for the pope himſelf, who, ſince the beginning of his pontificate, had but too plainly diſcovered, that the concerns of religion were not what affected him moſt. So, in ſeeing him act with that zeal, they could not help ſuſpecting, that the deſire of inriching himſelf by the voluntary contributions of Chriſtians, by the ſale of the indulgences, by the tenths of the clergy, and by the bounties of the ſovereigns, was what moſt fired his zeal. Nevertheleſs, not one of them ſhewed any averſion to the deſign, leſt he ſhould be taxed with not having a due regard for religion. But they gave only words, whereas the pope wanted deeds. Hence the pope's project of an univerſal league had not, as will hereafter be ſeen, the ſucceſs he expected. However, the project, though chimerical, ſerved for a cloak to many other deſigns. The emperor, deſiring to have one of his grandſons choſen king of the Romans, uſed the pretence of the imaginary Turkiſh invaſion of Chriſtendom, to ſhew the neceſſity of continuing the imperial dignity in the houſe of Auſtria, there being no other in Germany, able by its own ſtrength to withſtand their arms. Charles king of Spain made uſe of the ſame pretence for the ſame purpoſe. Beſides that, as he wanted ſome years of peace, he ſtrenuouſly inſiſted upon the project of a general truce, that the Chriſtian princes might be free to unite their forces againſt the Turks. Francis I. plainly ſaw, by the defenſive league made againſt him, that a pretence was only ſought to invade him, and take away the duchy of Milan. So, a general truce could not but be advantageous to him in his preſent circumſtances. Beſides, he had in view the recovery of Tournay, which could not be accompliſhed but during a peace. Henry VIII. knowing that the pope, the emperor, and the kings of France and Spain, had joined in a league againſt the Turks, was apprehenſive that league covered ſome deſign againſt him. For that reaſon, he would not refuſe to enter into the ſame engagement, for fear of giving them a pretence. Thus the chief potentates of Europe, being concerned to promote the cruſade, or at leaſt not to reject it, the leſſer powers were alſo obliged to follow the torrent. This gave the pope great hopes he ſhould at laſt effect his deſigns. But as in truth, not one of the princes thought the thing practicable, the project was ſtill very far from being executed.

Whilſt Leo X. fed himſelf with theſe hopes, Francis was thinking much more ſeriouſly of means to recover Tournay, than of the affairs of the cruſade. On the other hand, cardinal Wolſey was afraid of loſing the adminiſtration of the biſhopric, becauſe he ſaw no likelihood of ſowing diſcord between France and England, at a time when all the princes of Europe expreſſed a deſire to live in peace. He could not therefore keep the adminiſtration, if Guillard the true biſhop, would take the oath to the king, to which he ſeemed inclined. This made him embrace the ſecret offers of Francis, to make him amends, if he could induce the king his maſter to reſtore that place to France. Francis was very ſenſible, that before all things the cardinal was to be ſatisfied, not only in order to recover Tournay, but to procure it as cheap as poſſible. This was the ſubject of a private negotiation between them, before Henry was informed of it. To ſucceed, Francis ſpared neither flatteries or promiſes, nor preſents. If Polydore Virgil may be credited, theſe preſents were very conſiderable. But however, it was agreed between them, that the cardinal ſhould be recompenſed for the loſs of the adminiſtration, with an annual penſion. That the king of France ſhould give Henry ſix hundred thouſand crowns for Tournay. But as this ſum was a little too large, an expedient, mentioned hereafter, was found to reduce it to a much leſs. Upon theſe two conditions, the cardinal undertook to obtain his maſter's conſent to the king of France's deſires. One of leſs aſſurance than the cardinal, and not ſo ſecure of the king's confidence, would doubtleſs have been greatly embarraſſed, ſince the buſineſs was to convince the king of the contrary, to what hitherto he had been endeavouring to make him believe, namely, that Tournay was no longer neceſſary. When Francis I. would have treated of the reſtitution of Tournay, Wolſey had repreſented to the king, that both for his own and England's intereſt, it was of very great conſequence to keep that place, which was moreover a perpetual monument of his victories, whilſt it ſhould be in his hands Now altering his tone, he undertakes to perſuade, and indeed does perſuade him, that the place is of no uſe, and the maintenance of the garriſon far outweighs all the advantages he can receive from thence. That it was better to yield it to the king of France, who earneſtly ſued for it, and, to obtain it, ſcrupled not to condeſcend to make preſents to a miniſter. That nothing could be more honourable for the king, than to ſee that monarch make the firſt advances to procure his friendſhip, and render it perpetual, by the marriage of the dauphin with the princeſs Mary, which alſo he propoſed. That therefore the preſent opportunity ſhould be improved to receive a good ſum of money in lieu of Tournay, which being ſo remote from Calais, would infallibly be loſt upon the firſt rupture between the two crowns. That hereby the king of France would be obliged to be his friend, and this union would render them umpires of Europe. That their union was the more neceſſary, as it was time to think of oppoſing the growing power of the houſe of Auſtria, who poſſeſſing the empire, Spain, the Low-Countries, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, were infallibly going to render themſelves very formidable to all the ſovereigns. The ſtrength of theſe reaſons was too manifeſt for Henry to reſiſt them. All he could think ſtrange was, that the cardinal had not ſooner propoſed them, but till then had rather uſed arguments, to hinder the reſtitution of Tournay. But, as it has been remarked, Wolſey had ſuch an aſcendent over him, that he could perſuade him pro and con as he pleaſed [h].

Henry having agreed to what the cardinal propoſed, the next thing was to treat upon the matter. As ſoon as Francis I. was informed of it, he ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to England, conſiſting of admiral Bonnivet, Stephen Poncher, biſhop of Paris, and M. de Villeroy, ſecretary of ſtate [i]. For form's ſake, ſome time muſt be ſpent in the negotiation, though the king of France, and the cardinal, had already agreed upon the chief articles, by the mediation of Villeroy, who had been in London ever ſince the beginning of July, whereas his colleagues arrived not till two months after. The French embaſſadors had full powers to treat of the renewing of friendſhip between the two kings, of a league with the pope and all Chriſtian princes who deſire to be included in it, for the defence of religion and the church, of a marriage between the dauphin and the princeſs Mary, daughter of Henry, of the reſtitution of Tournay, St. Amand, and Mortagne, and of an interview of the two kings. Moreover, they brought Francis's letters patents, whereby he promiſed to pay to his good friend the cardinal of York, an annual penſion of twelve thouſand livres, in conſideration of his relinquiſhing the adminiſtration of the biſhopric of Tournay. As the treaties concluded upon theſe articles were not ready till the beginning of October, I ſhall briefly mention another affair, tranſacted about the ſame time.

[f] This diſtemper continued from July till the middle of December. Many knights, gentlemen, and officers of the king's court died thereof, as the lord Clinton, lord Grey, of Wilton, and of the common ſort of people, ſo many, as in ſome towns it ſwept away half in others a third of the inhabitants. Hall, fol. 63. Herbert, p. 28. There was alſo ſo great a drought this year, that it did not rain from the beginning of September, till the May following. And the froſt was ſo hard in the winter, that horſes and carts could paſs over the Thames on the ice between Weſtminſter and Lambeth. Stow, p. 505.

[h] Polydore Virgil obſerves, how artfully the cardinal managed this affair: he began with making the king a preſent of ſome part of what Francis had given him, that he might thereby incline the king to accept of the friendly overtures of the French king. Having thus prepared the way, he uſed the arguments above-mentioned for the reſtitution of Tournay. Whereupon the king ſaid, he ſaw plainly now, Wolſey would govern both himſelf, and the king of France. Pol. Virg.

The pope was ever intent upon the affairs of the cruſade, from whence he hoped to draw great ſums. He writ laſt year to all Chriſtian princes, to notify the victory of Selim, emperor of the Turks, over the Mamalucks of Egypt, whoſe empire he had utterly deſtroyed. The beginning of this year, he cauſed the college of cardinals to ſend a letter to Henry, repreſenting to him, the danger Chriſtendom was in, after the victory by the Ottoman emperor, over the Soldan of Egypt, who, according to the beſt advices, was ſlain in battle. The cardinals exhorted the king to undertake the defence of religion jointly with all the other Chriſtian ſovereigns, with the pope and ſacred college, who were ready to ſacrifice to that end, their own, as well as the church's treaſure. The plain meaning of all this was, that the king ought to contribute largely towards the cruſade, his country being too remote from Turkey to ſend forces thither.

Some time after, the pope ſent legates a latere [k] to ſeveral courts [l], with orders to exhort the ſovereigns to accept and preſerve a five years truce, enjoined by his apoſtolic power. They were likewiſe to uſe their endeavours to perſuade them to unite all their forces, and make war upon the Turks. Cardinal Laurentius Campejus was appointed for England, and was already departed from Rome in the beginning of May, to go and execute his commiſſion. But Wolſey deemed it a very great affront, that the pope had not thought of him for the legateſhip. So, whilſt Campejus was on the road, he ſent a truſty meſſenger to Rome, to repreſent to the pope, that by ſhewing ſo little regard for a cardinal, actually in England, and the king's prime miniſter, he put it out of his power to do him any ſervice: that whatever he ſhould ſay to ſupport what the pope required, would be of no weight, ſince he ſhould be conſidered as one whom the court of Rome duſt not truſt with the legateſhip: that it was rather the pope's intereſt to make uſe of him to obtain his deſires, conſidering the confidence the king honoured him with, and that, without his aſſiſtance, the preſent affair would be in danger of miſcarrying. Leo X. eaſily perceived by this repreſentation, that Wolſey muſt be contented. So by a bull of the 17th of May, he joined him with Campejus in the ſame commiſſion [m], giving them both an equal authority, knowing (ſays he, in the bull directed to Wolſey) your great credit with the king, and how eaſily you can perſuade or diſſuade him. Mean while, Campejus arriving at Boulogne, Wolſey found means to detain him there till he had received the pope's anſwer. For which reaſon it was the 29th of July before the Italian legate made his entry into London. As he had but a very poor train, Wolſey ſent him twelve mules with coffers richly covered. But ſome of theſe coffers happening to fall, during the proceſſion, and being overturned and broken, were found to be empty [n], to the great ſport and laughter of the people, who derided this external pageantry. There is in the Collection of the Public Acts, a bull of Leo X. with extraordinary powers to the two legates, authorizing them to grant a plenary indulgence to the faithful of both ſexes, who ſhould be preſent at the maſs, which either of the legates ſhould celebrate in the preſence of the king and queen, or at leaſt at the benediction, provided they confeſſed their ſins, or deſired to confeſs, and were penitent.

The legates commiſſion conſiſted of two points. The firſt was, to try to obtain of the clergy an aid of money for the war againſt the Turks. But the clergy withſtood all their attempts. The ſecond was, to perſuade Henry to join in the projected league with all the chriſtian princes for the defence of religion and the church. The pope's deſign was not to undertake a war againſt the Turks, but only to heap up money on that pretence. Thus the league he was meditating was ſolely to make the world believe he really intended to war againſt the infidels. After which, he had a very plauſible excuſe to lay impoſitions upon all the clergy, and draw money from the ſovereigns and their ſubjects, to bear the charges of the pretended war. With this league therefore he was to begin, and upon that the legates were commiſſioned to treat with the king, who ſeemed inclined to agree to it, though he might eaſily foreſee the league would ſignify nothing.

As cardinal Wolſey's credit increaſed in England, it became likewiſe greater at the court of Rome. He had cauſed, as was before obſerved, cardinal Adrian de Corneto to be removed from the office of the pope's collector in England. But this ſlight puniſhment not ſufficing to ſatisfy his revenge, he had ſo ordered it, that the king writ to the pope, deſiring him to deprive Adrian of the cardinalate, and of the biſhopric of Bath and Wells, which had been conferred on him. Leo X. could not help thinking it very ſtrange, that the king ſhould make ſuch a requeſt, without alledging any reaſon. However, without giving him a poſitive denial, he contented himſelf with ſaying, he would give him ſatisfaction at a more proper ſeaſon. In 1517, there was a conſpiracy againſt the pope, wherein cardinal Adrian being concerned was committed to priſon. Guicciardini affirms, he was never more heard of, and that it is not known what became of him [o]. But there is in the Collection of the Public Acts, a letter of cardinal Julius de Medici, dated the 5th of July, 1518, notifying to the king, that in a conſiſtory held that day, cardinal Adrian was depoſed and ſtript of all his preferments, intimating withal to the king, that it was on his account. But it is more probable that he was puniſhed for his crime againſt the pope. However, a few days after, the pope gave cardinal Wolſey the adminiſtration of the biſhopric of Bath and Wells, ſuppoſing he wanted it to maintain the dignity of cardinal.

The negotiation of the two cardinals proceeded very ſlowly, ſince it was not ſufficient to incline Henry to the league, but the reſt of the ſovereigns were alſo to give their conſent. Accordingly, the pope ſollicited to the utmoſt of his power all the potentates, magnifying the danger to which the Chriſtian religion was going to be infallibly expoſed. In ſhort, every prince returning him the ſame anſwer, namely, that it was neceſſary all the ſovereigns ſhould unite in the affair, he ſent a bull to his legates in England, empowering them to conclude between the emperor and the kings of France and Spain a league againſt the Turk. His intent was, that the league ſhould be offenſive, elſe it would be of no advantage to him, unleſs the Turk really intended to invade Chriſtendom, which was hitherto thought to be very uncertain. But Leo was too well known for the princes to be thus taken in a ſnare which tended only to render the pope maſter of their own and their people's money. So, pretending zealouſly to enter into his project, they contented themſelves with concluding together a defenſive league for the protection of the pope, the holy ſee, and their reſpective dominions, againſt all invaders, and particularly againſt the emperor of the Turks [p]. The pope was declared head of the league, provided he ratified it within ſuch a time. But the treaty made no mention of what each of the allies was to furniſh. All which ſhews, this league, according to the intention of the parties, was only to caſt a miſt before people's eyes, to give the pope ſome ſatisfaction, and perhaps to frighten the Turks.

This was not what the pope deſired. He could have wiſhed, all the princes of Chriſtendom had joined together in an offenſive league againſt the Turks, and engaged to ſend their forces to Conſtantinople, to attack the Ottoman emperor in his metropolis. In that caſe, he knew, the moſt remote would have been eaſily induced to furniſh their quota in money. Since the frantic zeal for cruſades was over, the popes had loſt no opportunity to rekindle the ſame zeal, which had formerly procured ſo many advantages to their predeceſſors. But the people as well as the princes were entirely diſcouraged, becauſe it was too viſible that the cruſades had been profitable to none but the popes. So, for once, the Chriſtian princes were contented to make a defenſive league, to ſhew only, they were ready to defend Chriſtendom againſt the attacks of the infidels, deferring to take other meaſures till they ſhould be obliged. Leo X. ſeeing he could obtain no more, approved and ratified the league the 31ſt of December, after which it was never more mentioned. All the terrible preparations of the Turks againſt the Chriſtians entirely vaniſhed, as ſoon as the pope found his artifices could not produce the deſired effect.

[k] There are four ſorts of legates. 1. They whom the pope ſends to preſide at general councils. 2. The pope's perpetual vicars in countries remote from Rome; thus before the reformation, the archbiſhop of Canterbury was legatus natus apoſtolicæ ſedis. 3. They who for a certain time, and in certain places, are delegated to convene ſynods for reſtoring church diſcipline and other emergencies. 4. The name of legate is given to the pope's extraordinary embaſſadors, to emperors, and kings, who are called legati a latere. At preſent none but cardinals have this character.

[p] Lord Herbert ſays, this treaty is ſingular in its kind, and an excellent precedent for peace to future ages; and therefore recites it more at large, becauſe (as he ſays) it ſeems to have been the rule by which Henry framed his actions many years after. See p. 31, of the Comp. Hiſt. vol. II.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, cardinal Wolſey, jointly with the French embaſſadors, was employed in preparing the treaties they had agreed upon, to be ſigned.

The firſt related to the marriage between the princeſs Mary and the dauphin, which was to be ſolemnized as ſoon as the young prince ſhould be full fourteen years old, each of the two kings promiſing to pay five hundred thouſand crowns, in caſe it was his fault that the marriage was not compleated. Mary's dower was to be three hundred thirty-three thouſand crowns of gold, one half to be paid on the day of marriage, and the other within a year after. The jointure was to be as great as had ever been aſſigned to any queen of France, and particularly to Anne of Bretagne, and Mary of England, wives to Lewis XII.

The ſecond treaty was upon the reſtitution of Tournay, for which Francis I. engaged to pay Henry ſix hundred thouſand crowns of thirty-five pence Tournois each, beſides fifty thouſand livres Tournois due to him from the inhabitants [q]. But out of theſe two ſums Francis was to keep back the princeſs Mary's dower. As to the payments, he obliged himſelf to pay fifty thouſand livres upon taking poſſeſſion of the place, and then twenty-five thouſand livres every ſix months, till the whole was paid [r].

The third treaty concerned the outrages which might be committed for the future againſt the peace by the ſubjects of either king, and contained certain regulations to procure ſpeedy reparation.

By the fourth, the two monarchs agreed upon an interview in the village of Sandinfelt, between Ardres and Guiſnes.

Theſe treaties being ſigned the 14th of October, the French embaſſadors gave cardinal Wolſey their maſter's letters patents, whereby he bound himſelf to pay him an annual penſion of twelve thouſand livres Tournois, to ſatisfy him for the loſs of the biſhopric of Tournay.

As ſoon as the two kings had ratified the treaties, and ſolemnly ſwore to the peace at London and Paris, the king and queen of France, acting in the name of the dauphin their ſon, affianced the princeſs Mary, repreſented to the earl of Worceſter [s] her proxy. This ceremony was performed at Paris the 21ſt of December [t].

[1519] Europe enjoyed then a profound tranquillity. But upon the death of the emperor Maximilian [u], the twelfth of January 1519, new troubles aroſe. By his death France, Spain, Italy, Germany, England, Scotland, the Low Countries, were engaged in wars no leſs fatal to them than the former. As ſoon as Maximilian was in his grave, the kings of France and Spain openly declared themſelves candidates for the empire, and began to cabal among the electors to obtain their deſires. This threw the electors into great perplexity. On which ſide ſoever they turned, they ſaw for themſelves, for Germany, for all Europe, advantages and inconveniences which deſerved their whole attention. It would have been the intereſt of Germany to keep the balance even between the two monarchs who aſpired to the imperial dignity, and to reject both. But by chooſing one of the competitors, ſuch ſuperiority would be given him as could not but be fatal to all Europe, and particularly to Germany. I ſhall not farther inſiſt upon the reaſons which the electors had to chooſe one or reject both. It is well known, on theſe occaſions, the public good does not always ſerve for rule and foundation, to form deciſions of this nature. Leo X. wiſhed, as it was indeed his intereſt, the electors would agree to chooſe one of their own body. Charles being poſſeſſed of the kingdom of Naples, and Francis of the duchy of Milan, the election of one of theſe monarchs could not but one day diſturb the peace of Italy, and prove deſtructive to the papal power. Accordingly, the pope uſed his utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the electors to take that courſe. But however he was forced, to act privately for fear of making the two candidates his enemies, by openly declaring againſt them.

Whilſt the reſolution of the electors was impatiently expected, Lorenzo de Medici, the pope's nephew, was ſeized with a diſtemper that laid him in his grave. By this unexpected accident, that branch of the family of Medici was reduced to the perſon of the pope, ſole lawful deſcendant of Coſmo the Great, who firſt acquired the ſovereignty of Florence. Some endeavours were uſed to perſude the pope to reſtore his country to liberty, but he did not love the Florentines well enough to ſuffer them to enjoy ſo valuable a bleſſing, of which he had taken ſo much pains to deprive them. Reſolving therefore to keep that ſtate, he ſent cardinal Julius de Medici, natural ſon of Julian his uncle, to govern in his name. Shortly after, he annexed the duchy of Urbino to the church, and razed the walls of the capital, for fear la Rovere ſhould think of recovering it.

The electors being aſſembled to proceed to the election of an emperor, Francis and Charles ſent embaſſadors to the aſſembly to manage their concerns. The pope would have a nuntio there too, who had orders privately to endeavour to cauſe them both to be rejected, but however, to conform themſelves outwardly to the diſpoſitions of the electors. Henry VIII. perceiving the difficulties which would occur in the choice of either of the candidates, ſent Richard Pace to the diet to try whether there was any thing to be expected for him. But as he thought of it too late, his embaſſador found the affair ſo advanced, that he did not think fit to expoſe the king's honour. He writ to him therefore, that indeed ſome of the electors [w] ſhewed an inclination to favour him: that the pope would have likewiſe ſupported him to the utmoſt of his power, had he declared ſooner; but that matters were ſo ordered, that the election would infallibly be over before proper meaſures could be taken to accompliſh his project. And indeed, a few days after, on the 28th of June, Charles, king of Spain, was declared emperor by the name of Charles V. or rather of Charles Quint, as he was then, and ſtill is called to this day [x].

The election of Charles was a terrible mortification to Francis I. All the world immediately thought, the jealouſy between theſe two potent princes would infallibly occaſion bloody wars, and this opinion was but too well confirmed by experience. Beſides the king of France's jealouſy, which was doubtleſs one of the chief cauſes of the following rupture, there were differences between them of very great importance, and extremely difficult to adjuſt. Francis I. had pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples. Moreover, by the treaty of Noyon, Charles was bound to reſtore Navarre to Henry d'Albret, within four months after ſigning the treaty, and this article was yet unperformed. On the other hand, Charles, as heir of the houſe of Burgundy, believed he had a right to the duchy of that name. He pretended that after the death of the laſt duke, his great grandfather, Lewis XI. had unjuſtly ſeized it upon a bare allegation that it was a male fee, though the contrary was evident. He had ſuffered his title to lie dormant during his minority. But after he was of age he had thoughts of reviving it, and the imperial dignity lately obtained helped very much to confirm him in that reſolution. The duchy of Milan was another cauſe of diſpute, which would naturally produce a war between the two monarchs. It could not be denied that it was a fief of the empire, and yet Lewis XII. had ſeized it, and Francis I. reconquered it, and was now in poſſeſſion, without either's be[t] This year was inſtituted the college of phyſicians, in London. King Henry's charter for that purpoſe bears date October 23. By the appointment in this corporation, or college, are included the phyſicians in London, and ſeven miles round that city. The phyſicians named in the charter, are John Chamber, Thomas Linacre, Fernand de Victoria, Nicholas Halſewell, John Francis, and Robert Yaxley. Rymer's Fœd. tom. xiii. p. 654.

[u] He was king of the Romans, and called emperor, though never crowned by that title. Some ſay, the reaſon was, becauſe he declined the charge and hazard of going into Italy, to receive the imperial crown at the pope's hands. He ſpent his leiſure hours in poetry, writing the hiſtory of his life, in Dutch verſe. As knight of the garter, his obſequy was ſolemnly kept in St. Paul's, by our king and the knights of that order. Herbert, p. 34.

[w] The electors of Mentz, Cologne, and Triers, ſtood ſo affected, that Pace thought if our king had put in ſooner, he would have carried it. Herbert, p. 33.

[x] Inſtead of ſpending his money in bribing the electors, as Francis did, particularly the marquis of Bradenburgh, he laid it out in raiſing numerous forces, which he brought to Francfort. Whereupon the majority of the electors (viz. the archbiſhops of Mentz and Cologne, the count Palatin, and the duke of Saxony) being thereby terrified and over-awed, agreed to chooſe him. There were then but ſeven electors, which, together with the four juſt now mentioned, were the archbiſhop of Treves or Triers, the marquis of Bradenburgh, and the king of Bohemia. See Guiccard, l. 13. The electorate of Bavaria was appointed in 1648, and that of Brunſwick-Lunenberg-Hanover, in 1693.

ing inveſted by the emperor Maximilian, or ſo much as deſiring it. Charles therefore could alledge it was his duty to maintain the rights of the empire, and endeavour to diſpoſſeſs the king of France of that duchy. The duke of Gueldres afforded another occaſion of quarrel between theſe two monarchs. He was a profeſſed enemy to the emperor, and France protected him openly. Finally, the treaty of Noyon gave Charles another cauſe of complaint. He pretended, Francis had extorted from him ſo diſadvantageous a treaty, by threatening war when his affairs neceſſarily required his preſence in Spain, to take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms: that therefore the reſignation of the kingdom of Navarre, and the penſion of a hundred thouſand crowns, to which he had been engaged under the ſpecious pretence of a maintenance for the princeſs his future ſpouſe, were nothing elſe but the price of a peace he had been made to purchaſe.

But though the two monarchs looked upon each other with a jealous and envious eye, and wanted not pretences for a war, neither of them durſt, however, begin before he had ſounded the reſt of the ſovereigns. And how they ſtood affected will alſo be neceſſary to know, for the better underſtanding the ſequel, the intereſts of princes giving to hiſtory a light, which without that aſſiſtance is ſought for in vain.

Leo X. was equally afraid of the two monarchs, being ſenſible to which ſide ſoever the balance inclined, Italy muſt be in danger. If he could have ſet them at variance without making Italy the ſeat of the war, he would freely have done it. But that was not poſſible. Much leſs was it in his power to ſtand neuter. The reaſon is, becauſe he could not hinder the conteſts about Naples and Milan from being decided by arms, and therefore could not avoid interpoſing in a quarrel, which would ſo nearly concern him. He took therefore the courſe which beſt agreed with his temper, and that was to be reſerved, and manage both the monarchs, till he found it his intereſt to declare himſelf. But through all his diſguiſes he diſcovered however ſome partiality to the emperor, in the grant of a diſpenſation to hold the empire with the kingdom of Naples, though that was directly contrary to the terms on which he had given him the inveſtiture of that kingdom. Francis complained of it, but the pope excuſed it, as he could not refuſe, without involving himſelf in troubles from which it would not have been eaſy to be delivered.

As for Henry VIII. the poſture of affairs between Charles and Francis might have rendered his reign very glorious, had he not entirely given himſelf up to the intereſted counſels of cardinal Wolſey. He had it in his power to preſerve the peace of Europe, by keeping the balance even between the two rivals, without ſuffering it to incline too much to either ſide. This was his grand intereſt as well as the kingdom's, and accordingly this was his reſolution. Hence it was that he frequently engaged in one or other ſide, but not always as the intereſt of Europe, the welfare of his realm, and his own glory required. Thus whilſt he thought to follow the maxims of good policy, he helped without perceiving it to gratify the paſſions of his miniſter, as will be ſeen hereafter.

Charles and Francis were ſo convinced of the advantages to be reaped from the king of England's friendſhip, that they neglected nothing which they thought would procure it. The beſt or rather the only means to that end was to gain cardinal Wolſey to their intereſts. And therefore, they ſpared neither flatteries nor promiſes, nor preſents to make him their friend. They took occaſion ſometimes to write to him, on purpoſe to ſtile him their friend, their father. In their letters they extolled his virtue, his prudence, his capacity, in ſuch affecting terms, that he muſt have been blind not to ſee, they had farther views than to expreſs their eſteem for him. Wolſey made good uſe of theſe teſtimonies of their friendſhip, to obſerve to his maſter how formidable he was to theſe monarchs, ſince they did not diſdain even to careſs his miniſter. But withal, it ſerved him to inſinuate how far his own merit excelled that of other miniſters, ſince it was univerſally known. All this produced the effect he expected. Henry deemed himſelf the arbiter of Europe, and remained ſo perſuaded of his favourite's capacity, that he no longer ſaw but with his eyes, nor acted but by his advice.

Thus Wolſey was then at the top of the wheel. He was favourite, prime miniſter, lord chancellor, adminiſtrator of the biſhopric of Bath and Wells, archbiſhop of York, ſole legate a latere, Campejus his colleague being recalled. He had a penſion from the emperor and the king of France, and received an immenſe profit from his chancellorſhip, by the privileges annexed thereto by the king. Beſides this, the king never ceaſed making him preſents, and giving him continual occaſions of increaſing his incomes. On the other hand, the pope, the emperor, the king of France, and the republic of Venice, ſtrove with emulation to gain his goodwill, and ſeemed, as I may ſay, to glory in their dependence upon him. The beginning of the year, Francis I. ſent him letters patents, whereby he conſented, that he ſhould alone regulate the ceremonies of this interview with Henry, giving him thereby an authentic teſtimony of his confidence in his probity, upon a point of which kings are commonly very jealous. Mean while, the advances ſuch great princes made the cardinal, did not argue ſo much their eſteem for him, as their fear of loſing the friendſhip of the king his maſter. Francis I. to give Henry a freſh mark of his reſpect, deſired him to ſtand godfather to his ſecond ſon, afterwards king of France, by the name of Henry II. Theſe things demonſtrate Henry's happy ſituation, and how glorious his reign might have been, had he wiſely improved theſe advantages. But unfortunately for him, inſtead of acting for himſelf and his own glory, he laboured in effect for his favourite's intereſts.

It would have been hard to conceive to what height the cardinal's pride was carried, if all the hiſtorians had not taken care to deſcribe it, and all in the ſame colours. The legateſhip of Campejus ſetting that cardinal upon a level with him, he could not long bear that equality. By his creadit at Rome, he cauſed him to be recalled [y], and himſelf appointed ſole legate, with power to viſit the monaſteries, and all the reſt of the clergy [z]. To obtain this commiſſion, he had taken care to defame to the pope all the clergy of the kingdom, intimating, how neceſſary it was to commit the reforming of them to his care [a]. But this was only to increaſe his authority, and ſubject the whole church of England to his orders. When he ſaw himſelf inveſted alone with the dignity of legate, he let looſe, if I may ſo ſay, the reins to his vanity. He ſaid maſs after the manner of the pope himſelf, not only biſhops ſerving him therein, but earls and dukes giving him water and the towel. When he walked into the city, two croſſes were carried before him by two of the talleſt prieſts that could be found, mounted on the higheſt horſes. One of theſe croſſes was that of legate, and the other that of York. At firſt theſe things ſerved only for diverſion to the people, who paſſed their jeſts upon this external pomp [b]. But preſently after, were felt much more grievous effects of the power aſſembled by the legate. A new court of juſtice was erected, called the legate's court, the juriſdiction whereof extended to all actions relating to conſcience, that is, properly ſpeaking, to all the actions of life, ſince there is ſcarce any but where conſcious may be ſome where concerned. John Allen, doctor of law, being made judge of this new court, committed numberleſs rapines and extortions, under colour of reforming the manners of the people, though he was himſelf a perſon of an infamous character [c]. Strict enquiry was made into the life and manners of every body, which gave occaſion to the new judge to oppreſs all that obſtinately refuſed to compound with him. Particularly, he pretended that this juriſdiction reached to all ſuits ariſing from wills or marriage contracts, and drew to his court numberleſs cauſes, without the king's judges daring to oppoſe it [d]. On the other hand, the legate treated the clergy with inconceivable rigour, and conferred all the benefices of the kingdom on his creatures, without troubling himſelf about the rights of the churches, the monaſteries, or the pa-

He might ſuperintend and correct what he thought irregular within their juriſdictions, appoint all officers in the ſpiritual courts, and preſent to all eccleſiaſtical benefices; conſtitute maſters of faculties; and maſters of ceremonies, to advance his dignity, and exerciſe a viſitorial power over monaſteries and colleges, and all the clergy, exempt and not exempt; and this for one whole year, from the date of this bull. trons. This is what had ever occaſioned violent quarrels between the kings of England and the court of Rome, and given birth to the famous ſtatute of præmunire, daily violated by the legate, the king ſuffering in him things which he would not doubtleſs have allowed in the pope himſelf, and being informed no farther than the cardinal pleaſed. At laſt, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſeeing ſo many oppreſſions, thought it his duty to acquaint the king, who ſeemed ſurpriſed, and charged the archbiſhop to tell the cardinal, that it was his pleaſure he ſhould amend whatever was amiſs[e]. The effect of this remonſtrance was, that the cardinal ſtill more hated the archbiſhop for whom he had already conceived an averſion, for ſubſcribing himſelf in one of his letters, your brother of Canterbury[f]. But ſhortly after, John London, a prieſt[g], boldly accuſing the judge of the legate's court, it was not poſſible to hinder the affair from coming to the king's knowledge. As the judge was convicted of numberleſs miſdemeanours, the king ſo reprimanded the cardinal, that from thenceforward he became, if not better, yet more wary at laſt.

The grandeur, riches, power, and authority enjoyed by Wolſey in England, were not capable of ſatisfying his ambition, whilſt there was ſtill one ſtep higher to which a churchman could aſcend. He had begun ſometime ſince to take meaſures to become pope, when the ſee ſhould be vacant, and the king of France had now offered him the votes of fourteen cardinals. But ſince Charles was elected emperor. Wolſey thought him more capable to procure him the papacy, and probably, continued a private negotiation with him. For that purpoſe, he gradually diſengaged the king his maſter from the intereſt of France, to turn him to the emperor. Mean while, he believed he could not, without too much diſcovering himſelf, hinder the interview of Francis and Henry, which had been deferred till the year 1520[h]. But he well knew how to prevent the ill effects this interview might produce againſt the emperor his new friend. Beſides he could not think of loſing the pleaſure of appearing before the court of France with a magnificence little inferior to that of a king, and of ſeeing himſelf in the preſence of the Engliſh, honoured and careſſed by the king of France, and his whole court, as he would probably be. This was an opportunity which a perſon ſo fond of pageantry and oſtentation could not neglect.

The emperor had reaſon to careſs cardinal Wolſey. He had met in Spain with unexpected difficulties. The Caſtilians and Arragonians were bent to preſerve their privileges, which were continually attacked by the emperor's Flemiſh counſellors. On the other hand, the emperor, on pretence of the cruſade publiſhed by the pope, having demanded a tenth of the clergy, that demand had cauſed throughout Spain troubles which very much embarraſſed that prince. There had been alſo an inſurrection in Auſtria, which was not appeaſed without difficulty. In ſhort the king of France was privately labouring to raiſe the emperor troubles in Naples, Sicily, Navarre, and to withdraw his allies from him. All this made Henry's friendſhip ſo neceſſary to him, that it is no wonder he ſhould endeavour to win the cardinal to his ſide, ſince the miniſter's credit was the only way to gain the maſter. The king of France uſed the ſame method, which greatly increaſed the cardinal's pride; who ſeeing himſelf courted by theſe two monarchs, had it in his power, if I may ſo ſay, to ſet what price he pleaſed upon his ſervices.

Whilſt all the world was impatiently expecting the effect of the jealouſy between the emperor and king of France, the affairs of Scotland ſtill remained in the ſame ſituation, that is, in extreme diſorder becauſe of the regent's abſence. When he went from Scotland, he hoped to return in a few months, but was not ſuffered to follow his inclination. Francis I. foreſeeing the want he might have of England, had made a private treaty with Henry, promiſing to detain the duke of Albany in France. Thus Henry obtained by another way, what the parliament of Scotland had plainly refuſed him. It was very eaſy to conceive, why he oppoſed the duke of Albany's return. His deſign was to throw Scotland into trouble and confuſion, to have an opportunity to interpoſe in the affairs of that kingdom, under colour of ſupporting the intereſts of the young king his nephew. He could not therefore execute it better, than by fomenting diſcord among the nobility, which the regent's preſence might have remedied. But the war which afterwards broke out between Charles and Francis, and wherein he was but too much concerned, prevented the proſecution of his deſigns againſt Scotland. Probably this ſaved the kingdom, which otherwiſe was in great danger of being conquered by the Engliſh.

Before I cloſe the year 1519, I muſt not forget to remark, that this year the emperor received the news of the diſcovery, and beginning of the conqueſt of Mexico, and New-Spain. The mention of this particular is the more neceſſary, though it ſeems foreign to our hiſtory, as it was the gold and ſilver wherewith the new world furniſhed Spain, that contributed moſt to render Charles V. ſo powerful as he will hereafter appear. Beſides, money growing more plenty, by the trade carried on by other countries with Spain, the reader muſt not be ſurpriſed to find hereafter more numerous armies, greater magnificence in princes courts, and the dowries of princeſſes much larger than before. But Spain firſt improved the gold and ſilver of the new world, and was thereby enabled, in the reigns of Charles V. and Philip II. to aſpire to univerſal monarchy[i].

[1520] The confidence placed by Francis I. in cardinal Wolſey, in giving him power to regulate his interview with Henry, would have been very honourable for that miniſter, if, on the other hand, this proceeding had not ſhewn his little eſteem for him, as believing him liable to corruption. Be this as it will, Wolſey, by virtue of powers received from the two kings, made the 12th of March 1520, a regulation, importing among other things, "That the interview ſhould be on the 4th of June[k], between Ardres and Guiſnes; that the king of England ſhould go towards Ardres, as far as conveniently he could[l], without paſſing however the Engliſh pale, and the king of France ſhould meet him at the place where he ſhould ſtop." Hence, he ſo ordered it, that Francis paid the firſt viſit to Henry. But he aſſigned for reaſon, that the king his maſter having croſſed the ſeas, on purpoſe to do his friend honour, it was very juſt, Francis ſhould in ſome meaſure make him amends, by advancing, to receive him, a little beyond the limits of his own territories in ſome open place appointed by deputies on either ſide. The reſt of the regulation concerned the ſafety of the two monarchs, their queens, the queen dowager of France, ſiſter of Henry, Louiſa of Savoy, ducheſs of Angulême, mother to Francis I. the train of the princes and princeſſes who were to aſſiſt at the interview, the place where the two kings were to meet and confer together, and laſtly, the diverſions which the two courts were to take.

During the time between the regulation and the interview, Francis cauſed the cardinal to be ſounded, to know whether, by his means, he could not prevail with Henry to reſtore Calais for a ſum of money. This propoſal was, doubtleſs, attended with ſecret promiſes to the cardinal, anſwerable to ſo great a ſervice, ſince he did not think fit to reject it. He durſt not however ſpeak of it directly to the king, but tried ſo to manage, that others ſhould inſpire him with the thought that in caſe the king adviſed with him upon it, he might give him his opinion more freely. To that end, in his converſation, he would frequently turn the diſcourſe upon Calais, and ſay, as it were accidentally, What have we to do with this Calais, that lies on the continent, and coſts us ſo much? It were to be wiſhed we were honeſtly rid of it! This artifice failing, he never ventured to make the king ſo extraordinary a propoſal, and the other, as being reſolved to engage with the emperor, he was not ſo deſirous to oblige the king of France.

The time of the interview approaching, Henry[m] came to Canterbury the 25th of May, in order to paſs his Whitſuntide there, and then proceed to Calais. But the next day news was brought him, that the emperor was landed at Dover. This arrival ſurpriſed the whole court, and perhaps the king himſelf. But the cardinal had no reaſon to be ſurpriſed, ſince the emperor had the 29th of March promiſed, by letters patents, dated from Compoſtella, to give or cauſe to be given him by the pope, the biſhopric of Badajos[n], within two months after the conference he was to have in perſon with the king of England, as appears in the Collection of the Public Acts. Hence it is plain, the emperor's journey to England had been reſolved ever ſince March, at leaſt between the emperor and the cardinal. But it was uncertain whether the king was informed of it. However, the cardinal was commiſſioned to go and welcome the emperor to Dover, where the king came alſo on the morrow. Then the two monarchs went together to Canterbury, where Henry ſent for his queen, who was extremely glad to ſee her nephew, the emperor having never ſeen him before[o]. The emperor's aim in this viſit was to diſſuade the king from the interview with Francis, but he could not ſucceed, Henry making him ſenſible, he could not recede with honour. But very likely he had alſo in view, the ſecuring of cardinal Wolſey, in order to gain, by his means, the king to his intereſt. It is the common opinion, his journey was not fruitleſs, but that he could obtain the cardinal's favour, only by promiſing to uſe all his credit to raiſe him to the papacity, in caſe Leo X. died before him. Though the emperor had not obtained all his deſires, he departed however very well ſatisfied with his viſit, Henry having promiſed not to enter into any engagement with the king of France to his prejudice[p]. On the 30th of May, Charles proceeded to Flanders, and Henry to Calais[q].

I ſhall not ſtay to deſcribe the interview of the two monarchs between Ardres and Guiſnes, as regulated by the cardinal. Whilſt it laſted, there was nothing but entertainments, tournaments, balls, maſquerades, and other diverſions, wherein the two courts mixed to their mutual ſatisfaction. Every thing on both ſides was ſo magnificent, that the aſſembly was called the camp of the cloth of gold[r]. But amidſt all the pleaſures which the two courts took together, the affairs however was not neglected. The following articles were agreed upon by the two kings at their conferences: that after Francis ſhould have paid the million of crowns, according to the late treaty, he ſhould give Henry an annual penſion for life of an hundred thouſand livers Tournois[s], that in caſe the dauphin ſhould become king of England by this marriage with the princeſs Mary, the penſion ſhould be continued to Mary and her heirs for ever; that the differences between the kings of England and Scotland, ſhould be referred to the arbitration of Louiſa of Savoy, the king of France's mother and the cardinal of York. The two kings parted not till the 24th of June, after paſſing about three weeks together in continual diverſions.

Henry being returned to Calais, was pleaſed, before he repaſſed into England, to repay the viſit received from the emperor at Canterbury. To that end he came to Graveling the 10th of July, and returned the ſame day to Calais. On the morrow, the emperor with the lady Margaret his aunt, governeſs of the Low Countries, came to ſee Henry at Calais, and ſtayed three days with him. Theſe mutual viſits made Francis extremely jealous, and not without reaſon. Probably, in theſe conferences were laid the firſt foundations of the alliance afterwards concluded between the emperor and Henry. In a few days after, Henry returned into England.

The greateſt princes very juſtly court cardinal Wolſey. He abſolutely governed his maſter, who, in the preſent ſituation of his affairs, could make the balance incline to which ſide he pleaſed. The ſenate of Venice foreſeeing that a war would ſoon break out in Italy, endeavoured beforehand to make Wolſey their friend, by ſhewing a great eſteem for him. There is in the Collection of the Public Acts, a letter from the doge to the cardinal, to congratulate him upon the interview of the two kings, as a work of his conſummate wiſdom[t].

But this was only words, whereas the pope, who found he ſhould quickly want the cardinal, thought he muſt gain him by ſomething more ſubſtantial. He granted him, as appears in the Collection, on the 29th of July, a penſion of two thouſand ducats upon the biſhopric of Placentia in Spain, and conſtituted him perpetual adminiſtrator of the ſee of Badajos, without prejudice to the benefices he had or ſhould have for the future. There is no doubt, this was done with the emperor's conſent, who endeavoured by degrees to gain ſo powerful a miniſter, whoſe credit was very neceſſary in the preſent ſituation of his affairs. He had left Spain full of troubles, occaſioned by the greedineſs of the Flemings, who only ſought to enrich themſelves at the expence of the Spaniards. This had even obliged him to depart with ſome precipitation, for fear of being embroiled in affairs which might have prevented his going to receive the imperial crown. He had left for governors in Spain, Adrian, Florentio, biſhop of Tortoſa, and the conſtable of Caſtile. But he was no ſooner gone, than ſeveral lords and ſome cities of Caſtile joined in a league for the defence of their liberties, and expulſion of the Flemings. This league was followed by an open rebellion, which very much embarraſſed the two governors. Mean while, having drawn together a body of troops, conſiſting partly of the garriſons left in Navarre, they formed a good army, and at length defeated and reduced the mal-contents to obedience.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Spain, the emperor was preparing for his coronation, which was ſolemnized the 21ſt of October[u].

Luther's defection made then great noiſe in Germany. Leo X. endeavoured to excite all the princes of the empire againſt the doctor, who had boldly appealed to a general council, notwithſtanding pope Pius the ſecond's bull. In ſhort, after fruitleſs trials to win him by promiſes, or frighten him by threats, he publiſhed a bull of excommunication againſt him and his followers. But Luther, regardleſs of theſe thunders, renewed his appeal to a council in very harſh terms. The pope, exaſperated that a ſingle monk ſhould thus dare to brave him, deſired the elector of Saxony, then at Cologne, to put him to death, or ſend him to Rome. The elector refuſing, the pope's nuncio ordered Luther's books to be publicly burnt at Cologne, and Luther, in revenge, cauſed the pope's bull and the decretals to be openly burnt at Wirtemberg, and publiſhed a manifeſto in defence of his proceedings. He found himſelf ſupported by the elector his ſovereign, who earneſtly deſired to ſee a reformation in the church.

Mean while the duke of Wirtemberg, who at the inſtance of Francis I. had forſaken the league of Swabia, was driven out of his dominions, and the emperor purchaſed them. As the king of France was not then in condition to protect him, he was forced to ſubmit to the emperor's terms, without hopes of being reſtored.

The troubles ſtill continued among the Scots, who were divided in two factions, whereof Andrew Hamilton, and George Douglas[w] earl of Arran were the heads. During

The parts of this great building were artificially framed in England, and afterwards taken aſunder and brought home. The model whereof, lord Herbert ſays, was at Greenwich in his time. The two kings met on the 7th of June, in the vale of Andren, and alighting, walked hand in hand to a tent of cloth of gold. On the 9th they came and viewed the camp or place of exerciſe, 300 yards long, and 106 broad, with ſcaffolds on the ſides for the beholders. There were alſo ſet up two artificial trees, with the arms of the two kings and their aſſiſtance, on which were affixed the articles of the juſts, &c. June 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, the two kings, with ſeven aſſiſtants each, encountered all comers, and came off with applauſe. June 16th was ſpent in feaſting and dancing with the queens, and other ladies. June 17th, being Sunday, and the 18th being foul weather, they repoſed. The 19th they continued their courſes. On the 20th, the Tournay began, where our king particularly got that honour, that a brave French nobleman, with whom he fought, preſented him with his horſe, as a gage of his being overcome. On the 21ſt the ſport was ſo rough, that four of the aſſiſtants were hurt. On the 22d, the barriars began. The 23d, our king, with his ſiſter, queen Mary, went in maſquing habits to ſee the French queen at Ardes, Francis likewiſe going to the Engliſh queen. But it ſeems that appellation was not then appropriated to kings. See Fiddes, p. 178.

the year 1520, the Hamiltonians found means to conſtrain Archibald Douglas earl of Angus, one of thoſe left by the regent to govern in his abſence, to relinquiſh his poſt. After which they would have taken away his life. But with foureſcore men he beat, in the ſtreet of Edinburgh, above a thouſand of his enemies, and drove them out of the city. All this ſerved only to exaſperate more and more the factions againſt one another, ſo that at laſt Douglas recieved into his party all the friends of the Humes, beheaded by the regent, in order with their aſſiſtance to withſtand his enemies. Theſe were the ſad effects cauſed by the regent's abſence, whom the king of England hindered from returning into Scotland. Mean while the truce between the two kingdoms was farther prolonged to the 9th of April this next year, by the king of France's mediation, and the council of Scotland poſitively promiſed to ſend an honourable embaſſy to the king of England to deſire a peace[x].

[1521] The poſture of affairs in the beginning of the year 1521, did not promiſe a long continuance of the peace of Europe. Four ſovereigns enjoyed almoſt the whole, and had a great influence upon the dominions they were not poſſeſſed of. They were all four young, able, and ambitious enough to form vaſt projects, which could not be executed without putting all Europe in combu ion.

Francis I. ſecretly envying Charles V. ſought occaſion to ſhew his concern at ſeeing him on the imperial throne, and was thinking to uſe the pretence of recovering the kingdom of Naples for himſelf, and Navarre for Henry d'Albret. But his deſign of attacking the emperor was founded upon another and more powerful motive, namely policy, which required his utmoſt endeavours to humble this formidable rival, otherwiſe France might be in great danger. To execute this grand project, it would have been neceſſary for him to be wholly intent upon his affairs, and to be a good œconomiſt, in order to ſupport the expence in which he was going to engage. But unhappily for him, he was too much addicted to his pleaſures, and very often applied to other uſes, the money deſigned for the war. Moreover, he was too eaſily governed by his miniſters, and ſtill more by the ducheſs of Augouléme his mother, whoſe intereſts were often contrary to his. However, he fancied his affair in ſuch a poſture, as promiſed a happy ſucceſs of his undertakings. Spain was diſaffected and agitated with inteſtine troubles, which probably would greatly embarraſs the emperor. On the other hand, the Turks threatened Hungary, which the emperor could not abandon without indangering his Auſtrian dominions. In the next place, Francis flattered himſelf with having in the king of England a faithfull friend, who would not forſake him, and who ſeemed to be almoſt equally concerned, to prevent the too great advancement of the houſe of Auſtria. In a word, he imagined to have reaſon to expect that the pope, with whom he was in treaty for the conqueſt of Naples, inſtead of helping to increaſe the emperor's power, would uſe his utmoſt endeavours to humble a neighbour, who could not but be a terror to him. All this was ſtrengthened with Francis's alliance with the Venetians and Switzers, who joining with the pope and the king of England, would of courſe render him ſuperior to his enemy, whoſe kingdoms, remote from each other, were leſs capable of giving mutual aſſiſtance. Thus Francis, flattered by theſe appearances, formed extraordinary projects ſuitable to his ambition and age, being then but twenty-ſeven years old.

As for Charles V. he had not yet done any thing to give a very advantageous idea of him. His youth had been ſpent under the guardianſhip of the emperor Maximilian his grandfather, or of Margaret of Auſtria, his aunt; and ſince he had aſſumed the adminiſtration of the Low-Countries, his governor Chievres did all in the name of the prince. His firſt proceedings, after the death of king Ferdinand, begot no great opinion of him, for he had ſcarce ſet foot in Spain, before the country wa all in commotion. His advancement to the empire was owing, perhaps, to the little eſteem the world had for him. However, he was then the moſt potent prince in Europe. Beſides the imperial dignity, he poſſeſſed all Spain, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, the Low-Countries, the archduchy of Auſtria, and many other provinces and lordſhips in Germany. So, with his own forces alone, he was able to withſtand Francis I. aſſiſted by all his allies. Henry VIII. was the only ſovereign that had at firſt embarreſſed him, by reaſon of his union with France. But he had artfully drawn that thorn out of his ſide, by means of cardinal Wolſey. With this he began, as I may ſay, to diſcover his ability, which till then had been as it were concealed. After that he diligently applied himſelf to gain the pope, and ſucceeded to his wiſh. Thus, at the time I am now ſpeaking of, he was become very formidable, not only by his forces, but alſo by the proofs he had given of his capacity. As ſoon as he was raiſed to the empire, he rightly judged he ſhould find in Francis I. an enemy that would ſpare nothing to make him feel the effects of his envy. For that reaſon he thought early of means to ſcreen himſelf from his attempts, not only by a juſt defence, but even by attacking him firſt. He had two plauſible reaſons; one was, that the crown of France withheld from him the duchy of Burgundy, ſince the death of his great-grandfather Charles, the laſt duke of Burgundy. The other concerned the duchy of Miland, whereof Francis ought to have received the inveſtiture from the emperor, ſince it was a fief of the empire, and yet he had never vouchſafed to aſk it. He believed moreover to have cauſe of complaint for Francis's extorting from him the treaty of Noyon, as was before related.

In vain therefore do the hiſtorians of both ſides ſtrive to caſt the blame of the rupture upon one or other of the two monarchs. It is certain, both thought at the ſame time of making war, and took meaſures before hand to execute their deſigns, though each privately endeavoured to engage his rival in ſomething that ſhould make him be deemed the aggreſſor. So, as the beginning of a rupture is not to be judged of by the firſt act of hoſtility, but rather by the cauſe, one can hardly be miſtaken in affirming Charles V. and Francis I. to be equally authors of a war which ſet all Europe in a flame. Charles was not above one and twenty years of age, but of a very different character from that of his enemy. Francis was too much addicted to his pleaſures, whereas Charles was too intent upon his affairs, having been uſed to it from his youth. Francis was of a free and open temper, but Charles was much more reſerved. He maturely thought of what he had to ſay or do, and readily made uſe of artifice and evaſion to accompliſh his ends, framing his conduct by that of Maximilian and Ferdinand, his grandfathers.

Leo X. had reaſon to be ſatisfied with his lot, could he have reſolved to live in quiet. He was abſolute maſter of the whole eccleſiaſtical ſtate, to which he had lately added all la Romagna, Modena, Reggio, and the duchy of Urbino. His own, the church's, and all Italy's grand intereſt, was therefore to endeavour by all forts of means to keep the balance even between the emperor and the king of France, and to manage ſo, that neither of theſe two monarchs ſhould become too powerful in Italy. This was very practicable, ſince his dominions being ſituated between thoſe belonging to theſe two princes in Italy, they neceſſarily wanted him, in order to invade Naples or Milan. Thus, by keeping a ſtrict neutrality, he would have probably freed Italy from a war, and preſerved the papal power in its full luſtre. But he was of too active a ſpirit to remain in peace. As he had a great opinion of his addreſs, he ventured to engage in all ſorts of affairs, how difficult ſoever they appeared, becauſe, let what would be the event, he hoped to get clear by ſome artifice. Beſides, he had this in common with all the popes, his predeceſſors, that the reſpect for his character removed his fear of being reduced to extremities, in caſe his undertakings were not crowned with ſucceſs. As to the reſt, he was entirely addicted to his pleaſures, ſpending moſt of his time with muſicians and buffoons, and in ſome ſtill leſs innocent diverſions. This, added to his liberal temper, threw him into ſuch exceſſive expences, that he was poor amidſt his vaſt incomes, and always contriving means to procure money. Hence his extraordinary zeal to form a league againſt the Turks, becauſe it afforded him a pretence to levy tenths upon the clergy, and ſell his indulgences to the great ſcandal of all Chriſtendom[y].

Had this pope being of a more narrow genius, he would have doubtleſs maintained the tranquillity of Italy. But as he found himſelf capable of forming and executing great deſigns, he had a mind to render his pontificate illuſtrious by ſome ſignal actions. Unfortunately for him and his ſucceſſors, he reſolved to drive the French, Spaniards and Germans out of Italy, a project which may well be deemed extravagant. To accompliſh it, he was neceſſarily to make uſe of the one to ruin the others, and by thus cauſing the balance to incline all to one ſide, he could not but give maſters to himſelf and all Italy, which he would have avoided by ſtanding neuter. But what chiefly engaged him in this project, was his deſire to ſeize the duchy of Ferrara, and recover Parma and Placentia, which he could not hope to effect, whilſt the French were poſſeſſed of the duchy of Milan. On the other hand, he was a little uneaſy with reſpect to Florence. He could not help fearing that Francis would think of reſtoring the Florentines to their ancient liberty. He reſolved therefore to begin with the French, but took care not to diſcover his deſigns. On the contrary, he continued private negotiations with the king of France as well as with the emperor, and put both equally in hopes of his friendſhip. Mean while, as his intent was not always to remain in this ſituation, he ordered ſix thouſand men to be levied in Switzerland, and ſent for them into the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, having demanded a paſſage through the Milaneſe, under colour of providing for the defence of his towns.

Henry VIII. was then more advantageouſly ſituated than any king of England had ever been before him. He was at peace with all Europe except Scotland, which would have been glad to be left in quiet. Though he had now conſumed all the money found in the king his father's coffers, he was however aſſured of being always ſupplied, ſince he was in a good underſtanding with his parliament, and had the art of managing the two houſes with a very ſingular addreſs. Thus being able to raiſe numerous forces, and at liberty to turn them which way he pleaſed, it was doubtleſs in his power to render himſelf umpire of Europe. For that reaſon Charles and Francis with equal ardor courted his friendſhip, being ſenſible he could invincibly obſtruct their deſigns, and cauſe the balance to lean to the ſide he ſhould pleaſe to eſpouſe. It was his intereſt to keep always in this ſituation, till obliged to interpoſe in their differences, to hinder the one from riſing to the prejudice of the other. And indeed this was his aim and intention. But unfortunately for him, his weakneſs for his prime miniſter the cardinal was beyond all imagination. This favourite had ſuch an aſcendant over him, that he inclined him which way he pleaſed, always under the ſpacious colour of carrying his glory to a greater height, though in reality he had only his own intereſts in view. We have already ſeen ſenſible proofs of his great influence over his maſter, in what paſſed during and after the late war with France. He had perſuaded him to deliver to the emperor Maximilian, the city of Terouenne, which might have been of great ſervice to him, and to keep Tournay, which was of little or no advantage. Afterwards, when he was in poſſeſſion of the biſhopric of Tournay, he had artfully perſuaded him that the keeping of that place would be an everlaſting monument of his glory. But when he ſaw he was like to loſe the biſhopric, and had ample amends offered him, he found other reaſons to convince him that he ought to part with a place which was of no benefit to him. We ſhall ſee preſently that he led him alſo to make a very falſe ſtep in eſpouſing the emperor's part againſt France, whereas his true intereſt was to keep the ballance even between the two potentates. All this was done for the ſake of cardinal Wolſey, who having the ambition to aſpire to the popedom, thought to ſucceed by the emperor's means. The penſion procured him by Charles upon the biſhopric of Placentia in Caſtle, and the adminiſtration of the ſee of Badajos, at a time when he had not yet received any public ſervice from him, are inconteſtible proofs that the cardinal had engaged with him, as being ſure of governing his maſter as he pleaſed. Theſe things afforded no very advantageous idea of Henry's penetration.

Such were the characters, intereſts, and deſigns of the four principal ſovereigns concerned in the new war I am going to ſpeak of. The king of Scotland was yet too young to be reckoned among the directors of the affairs of Europe. The Venetians ſought only to live in peace, being, as I may ſay, exhauſted by the former war. However, they could not avoid entering into this alſo. As for the Switzers, they were ſatisfied with their penſions from France, and generally inclined to obſerve the articles of their alliance with that crown. But they were not entirely ſecured from the ſecret practices continued by the pope's and the emperor's agents with ſome of their magiſtrates, to try to perſuade them not to take part with France.

Francis I. having formed a deſign to make war upon the emperor, without incurring the blame of the rupture, reſolved to begin with what could not be imputed to him as a premeditated deſign to quarrel. By the treaty of Noyon, Charles was bound to reſign Navarre to Henry d'Albret within four months, in default whereof Francis was free to aſſiſt Henry to recover his kingdom. The affairs of Spain being extremely imbroiled ſince the emperor quitted that country, Francis believed it a fair opportunity to invade Navarre. He was the more inclined to this undertaking, as the two regents of Spain had been forced to draw troops from Pampelonia and other places of that kingdom, to reinforce the army which was to act againſt the fore-mentioned league. He ſent therefore into Navarre in the beginning of March an army under the command of Leſparre, of the houſe of Foix, elder brother of Lautrec and Leſcun. This general finding the kingdom without troops and almoſt deſerted, became maſter of it in the ſpace of a fortnight. Had he ſtopped there, perhaps Navarre would have been ſtill at this day annexed in deed, as it is in name only, to the crown of France, ſince the Spaniards were unable to expel Henry d'Albret, from whom the kings of France of the houſe of Bourbon are deſcended. But the deſire of acquiring fame, or procuring the king's advantage, carried Leſparre to enter the province of Guiſpuſcoa, and beſiege Logrogno. The regents of Spain had no thoughts of recovering Navarre. But when they ſaw the French invading Spain itſelf, they aſſembled their forces to ſtop their progreſs. The mal-contents themſelves lately vanquiſhed, accepting a general pardon, led all their troops to the regents. Leſparre ſeeing an army much ſtronger than his coming againſt him, would have retired, but was ſo cloſely purſued that he was forced to come to a battle, wherein he was defeated and taken priſoner. The loſs of this battle occaſioned the loſs of Navarre, which the Spaniards recovered in leſs time than the French had conquered it. Thus the king of France had the mortification to loſe his army to no purpoſe, and flagrantly diſcover to the emperor how he ſtood affected towards him.

The ſame time that he invaded Navarre, he raiſed Charles an enemy from another quarter, namely, Robert de la Mark, prince of Sedan and ſovereign of Bouillon, who believing to have cauſe to complain of the emperor, for a denial of juſtice to the young princes of Chimay[z], whoſe guardian he was, implored the king of France's protection. Very probably, Francis had offered it before it was deſired. However, Robert de la Mark, ſeeing himſelf ſupported by the king, was ſo bold as to ſend a defiance to the emperor, who was then at the diet of Worms. Shortly after, the earl of Fleuranges, eldeſt ſon of la Mark, put himſelf at the head of four or five thouſand men[a] levied in France, and beſieged Vireton, a place in Luxenburg belonging to the emperor.

Then it was that Charles, who had with reluctance agreed to the league of London, thought proper however to make uſe of it in ſummoning the king of England to aſſiſt him, as obliged by the treaty, ſince it was evident, the king of France had raiſed him this enemy. Henry, prepoſſeſſed by the cardinal, was glad of a pretence to caſt the blame of the rupture upon the French king. Mean while, to proceed according to the articles of the league, he ſent an embaſſador to require him to forbear all hoſtilities againſt the emperor, not only in Luxenburg, but alſo in Navarre. Francis replied, he was not author of the war between Robert de la Mark and the emperor, and all he could do was to forbid his ſubjects to ſerve or aſſiſt la Mark. As to Navarre, it would have been needleſs to anſwer, ſince it was now out of his power to re-enter it. He performed his promiſe with regard to the war of Luxenburg, and Fluranges diſbanded his army. Francis took care not openly to ſupport the duke of Bouillon, for fear of affording Henry, who had offered his mediation, a pretence to declare for the emperor. I ſhall purſue this affair, when I have ſpoken of thoſe of Italy, which are of no leſs importance.

In the beginning of this, or perhaps before the end of the laſt year, Leo X. concluded with the French embaſſador reſiding at Rome, a treaty, whereby he joined in a league with Francis for the conqueſt of Naples. The treaty ran, that all that part of the kingdom of Naples lying between the eccleſiaſtical ſtate and Gariglian ſhould remain to the pope: and the reſt ſhould be for Henry, the king's ſecond ſon; but during his minority, the kingdom ſhould be governed by the pope's legate, who ſhould reſide at the city of Naples. Whatever the pope's intention was in making this treaty, it may be almoſt affirmed, he acted with inſincerity, becauſe it muſt have been very diſadvantageous to him for the ſame prince to hold Milan and Naples. What may moſt probably be conjectured is, that his intention was to deal by Francis I. as Ferdinand, king of Arragon had done by Lewis XII. when he made much the ſame partition with that prince. At leaſt Francis, who had often experienced what the pope was capable of, could never believe he really intended to aſſiſt him in that conqueſt. Wherefore he delayed the ratification of the treaty, to gain time to conſider ſeriouſly of the affair.

Leo X. finding the time for ratifying the treaty was expired, ſuſpected the king of projecting with the emperor ſome agreement prejudicial to the holy ſee. They who act not ſincerely, are ready to think others like themſelves. However, the king of France's affected delays afforded the pope a motive or pretence to conclude another treaty with the emperor, to drive the French out of the Milaneſe, and reſtore the Sforzas. As he continued at once ſecret negotiations with the emperor and the king of France, it would be very difficult to know his real intent, if there was not a notable difference between the two treaties juſt mentioned. That with the French embaſſador concerned a chimerical project, the execution whereof was almoſt impracticable in the preſent juncture of affairs, and beſides, really contrary to his true intereſt, whereas the other was to his advantage, and agreeable to the projects he had formed. So, probably the firſt was made only to procure better terms from the emperor. Beſides, he had been ever wont to have, as they ſay, two ſtrings to his bow, which he conſidered as the grand myſtery of politics. His treaty with the emperor was no leſs advantageous, than that he would have made with the king of France. The chief articles were theſe:

That the pope and emperor ſhould join their forces to expel the French out of the Milaneſe, and reſtore Franceſco Sforza. That prince was then at Trent, having retired thither a little before his brother Maximilian, was diſpoſſeſſed of his dominions.

That Parma and Placentia ſhould be reſtored to the church.

That the inhabitants of the Milaneſe ſhould provide themſelves with ſalt only at Cervia, a town in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate.

That the emperor ſhould aid the pope to conquer Ferrara.

That the ſum the emperor gave the pope for the kingdom of Naples ſhould be augmented.

That the emperor ſhould protect the family of Medici.

That he ſhould grant to the cardinal de Medici a penſion of ten thouſand ducats, upon the archbiſhopric of Toledo.

That Alexander de Medici, natural ſon to Lorenzo, late duke of Urbino, ſhould have in the kingdom of Naples, lands to the value of ten thouſand ducats a year.

The treaty was kept ſo private that it came not to France's knowledge, till the two allies were going to invade the Milaneſe. Mean while they concerted proper meaſures to accompliſh their deſigns. The pope who had already ſix thouſand Lwitzers in his ſervice, took care to augment his forces on divers pretences. The emperor ordered the viceroy of Naples to keep the troops of that kingdom ready to march upon the firſt notice, and at the ſame time cauſed levies to be made in Germany to reinforce his army in Italy. Proſper Colonna was declared general of the league.

Whilſt Francis continued in a fatal ſecurity, and left the Milaneſe deſtitute of troops, never imagining he ſhould be attacked in Italy, becauſe he thought himſelf ſure of the pope, the two allies were contriving to ſeize at once, Milan, Genoa, and Como, before they proclaimed war againſt him. For the firſt of theſe projects they employed Hieronimo Morone ſenator of Milan, who being ſuſpected by the French, was baniſhed the city. Morone having aſſembled a great number of exiles [b] in the neighbourhood of Milan, Leſcun, who commanded in the abſence of his brother Lautrec, the governor, ſallied out of Milan with ſome troops, and purſued the exiles of Keggio, where they had retired, and even demanded of the governor to deliver them into his hands. The governor refuſing, Leſcun withdrew, and poſted himſelf about ten miles from Reggio, within the pope's territories, and lay encamped ten or twelve days. Then the pope, who only wanted a pretence to declare againſt France, called a conſiſtory, greatly aggravated Leſcun's affront, and declared that in revenge he was reſolved to join with the emperor. But he had already done ſo, and the affair of Reggio was a mere pretence to delude the cardinals.

Whilſt Leſcun was at Reggio, Adorno baniſhed from Genoa attempted to ſurpriſe that city with ſome gallies ſupplied by the pope and the viceroy of Naples, but could not ſucceed. A few days after, Leſcun diſcovered a plot to ſurpriſe Como, and was fully informed that the pope and the emperor were the authors. It is therefore evident, that in caſe they had ſucceeded in their deſigns, they would have made no ſcruple to appear the aggreſſors.

Leſcun no longer doubting that there was a deſign to invade the Milaneſe, acquainted the king, and withal ſent for the four thouſand Switzers, intended for Milan, who were ready to march. Francis ſurpriſed at the danger the Milaneſe was in, ſpeedily ordered a levy of twenty thouſand Switzers, and ſent Lautrec to Milan, promiſing he ſhould want for nothing. But this promiſe was but very ill performed.

Mean while, Proſper Colonna having aſſembled at Reggio, the army of the allies beſieged Parma, where Leſcun had now thrown in ſome troops. But before he could take the place, Lautrec having received the ſupplies he expected from Switzerland, forced him to raiſe the ſiege, and perſued him even beyond the borders of the Milaneſe. As he imagined Parma to be out of danger, he had drawn out Leſcun with the garriſon to ſtrengthen his army. But no ſooner was Leſcun out of the city, than the inhabitants declared for the pope, and erected the church's colours on the walls.

But this was not the only misfortune Lautrec was to be expoſed to during the campaign. Preſently after, he was deſerted by the twenty thouſand Switzers he had lately received, and conſtrained to retire to Milan, where Proſper Colonna purſued him in his turn with all poſſible diligence. Whereupon Lautrec deſpairing of defending Milan, quitted the town, after ſupplying the caſtle with ammunition, and withdrew to Como, where the four thouſand Switzers he ſtill had forſook him and returned home, becauſe he had no money to pay them. So Colonna, taking poſſeſſion of Milan, went from thence to make other conqueſts which Lautrec could not oppoſe. In a word, Francis loſt the whole duchy of Milan except a few places.

Probably, Lautrec would not have been able to ſupport himſelf long in Italy, had not the pope's death on the firſt of December afforded him ſome reſpite. Leo X. is ſaid to die with joy at the news of the good ſucceſs of the legate. Some however, affirm his death was haſtened by poiſon [c]. However this be, the news of the pope's death was no ſooner ſpread, but the troops he maintained diſbanded themſelves. Of the twelve thouſand Switzers he had in the army of the allies, but fifteen hundred remained, and the Florentines retired to their own country. Thus Proſper Colonna found himſelf in a few days in as ill a ſituation as Lautrec. The college of cardinals not knowing what courſe to take, gave no orders, but deferred every thing till the election of a new pope. Mean while, the duke of Ferrara recovered ſome of his towns in la Romagna, and Franceſco Maria della Royere took poſſeſſion again of the duchy of Urbino. If Lautrec had then been ſupplied with the men and money he was promiſed, he would have doubtleſs expelled the imperialiſts out of Milan. But Francis I. entirely neglecting the affairs of Italy, thought only of defending himſelf in Flanders and Picardy, where he was vigorouſly attacked. He ſtill held however in Italy, Genoa, Cremona, the caſtles of Milan and Novarra, with ſome ſmall places on the lake Gorda.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Italy, the war at length was begun in the Low Countries in a manner very diſadvantageous to France. The troops raiſed by Robert de la Mark to beſiege Vireton being diſbanded, Francis thought he had ſatisfied the emperor and the king of England. It was indeed ſufficient to take from Henry all pretence of declaring againſt him, ſince by the treaty of league, in caſe one of the allies was invaded, the reſt were not to declare againſt the aggreſſor, till being ſummoned to deſiſt from the war, he ſhould have refuſed. Francis was ſummoned and had deſiſted, conſequently Henry had no cauſe to complain. But it was otherwiſe with the emperor, who was not contented with ſo ſlight a ſatisfaction. He forbore however to complain to the king of France, but was reſolved to be revenged of Robert de la Mark, who had dared to ſend him a defence. Beſides, he conſidered, if France undertook to defend that prince, as it was very likely, he would incur the blame of the rupture, and this was what the emperor and cardinal Wolſey chiefly deſired, in order to uſe that inducement to perſuade Henry to declare againſt France. So, Charles having prepared an army, gave the command to Henry, count of Naſſau, who entering the territories of Robert de la Mark, took and razed ſeveral places. Francis was patient, chooſing rather to forſake his ally, than give the king of England a pretence to arm againſt him. Then Robert ſeeing himſelf without refuge, made his ſubmiſſion to the emperor, who granted him a truce for ſix weeks. Mean while, though the emperor had to deal only with a petty prince, unable to reſiſt him, and of whom he had been ſufficiently revenged, he continued to re-enforce his army. Francis ſeeing ſo many troops in the neighbourhood of Champagne, eaſily perceived, they were not ſolely deſigned againſt Robert de la Mark, and that he might be taken unprovided, unleſs he prepared for his defence. Mean while, he repreſented to the king of England, that he could not avoid taking up arms, in order to reſiſt the emperor, who was preparing to attack him. Henry anſwered, he would ſide with neither, but as a common friend, offered to be their umpire. Adding, if they would both ſend their plenipotentiaries to Calais the beginning of Auguſt, cardinal Wolſey ſhould be there to act in his name as mediator. Charles readily accepted ſo advantageous a propoſal, ſince he and the cardinal underſtood one another. As for Francis, he durſt not reject it, though he had no reaſon to be pleaſed with the king of England. But he did not yet know that Wolſey was wholly devoted to the emperor. It was therefore agreed, that the plenipotentiaries of the two monarchs, the pope's nuncio, and the cardinal mediator, ſhould meet at Calais the 4th of Auguſt.

Mean while, the lord of Liques[d] having levied an army at his own charge, as he affirmed, ſurpriſed Mortagne, and St. Amand, in the Tournaiſis, on pretence of ſome claim of his houſe. The emperor affected to conſider this as a private quarrel, in which he had no concern, though Liques's army was compoſed of his ſubjects. His aim was to oblige Francis to take ſome ſtep which might give occaſion to accuſe him of being the aggreſſor. Herein he only imitated that prince who had attacked him under the name of Robert de la Mark. But ſome time after, the governor of Flanders beſieging Tournay in form, it was not poſſible to put ſo favourable a conſtruction upon that ſiege, eſpecially as what paſſed then in Italy left the emperor no room to diſſemble any longer. It is certain, Francis had been ſurpriſed as well in Italy as in Champagne and Flanders. He had intended no doubt to attack the emperor, but did not expect to be invaded firſt. For that reaſon he wanted time to prepare his army. Mean while, the imperialiſts took and razed the town of Ardres.

The time appointed for the congreſs of Calais[e] being come, cardinal Wolſey repaired thither with a numerous retinue[f], and carried the great ſeal with him[g]. It appears in the Collection of the Public Acts, that he was furniſhed with ſeveral of the king's commiſſions, to be uſed as he ſhould think proper. By the firſt, he was conſtituted the king's lieutenant-general to adjuſt, as mediator, the differences between the emperor and the king of France. By a ſecond, he was impowered to treat and conclude with Francis I. a renewal of the alliance. But probably this was only to ſhew the French embaſſadors Henry's impartiality, and pretended deſign to join with that prince, who ſhould be found to be unjuſtly attacked. By a third, he had power to conclude a league between England and the emperor, the pope, the king of France, or any other potentate whatever. Thus Henry, without having yet examined on which ſide the blame lay, left it to his lieutenant to engage him in which party he pleaſed. But very probably, his reſolution was taken already, and the congreſs of Calais intended only to ſhew he was not reſolved, till after a ſtrict information, and to cauſe the blame of the rupture to be thrown on the king of France. All the proceedings of the cardinal mediator, diſcovered, that he meant not to procure a peace between the two monarchs, but only to find the king, his maſter, a pretence to declare for the emperor.

Whilſt theſe affairs were negotiating at Calais, the imperialiſts beſieged and took Mouzon, in Champagne. Then they ravaged the country, and plundered the little town of Aubanton, where the count of Naſſau ſuffered his ſoldiers to commit grievous outrages; after which he laid ſiege to Mezieres. Francis wanting time to aſſemble his army, could not be ready till the end of September: which however was ſoon enough to throw ſuccours into Mezieres, and thereby force the count of Naſſau to raiſe the ſiege. The earl of St. Pol recovered Mouzon ſhortly after, and the count of Naſſau retired into the earldom of Namur. Campagne being thus freed, Francis ordered his army to march into Flanders, where the imperialiſts ſtill continued the ſiege of Tournay. When his troops were drawn together, he aſſaulted Rapaume, Landrecy, Bouchin, and carried them. Afterwards hearing, the emperor, who had headed his army, was retiring towards Valenciennes, he reſolved to go and attack him, but loſt the opportunity by his own fault. It is ſaid, if he had been as ſpeedy as he might, and ought to have been, he would have infallibly defeated the emperor, who giving all over for loſt, was retired with a hundred horſe only, quitting his army, not to be a witneſs to their deſtruction. Upon this occaſion, Francis I. gave the duke of Bourbon, conſtable of France, great cauſe of diſguſt, by ſetting the duke of Alencon at the head of the vanguard, though that poſt properly belonged to the conſtable, when the king was in the army. It is ſaid, the king gave the conſtable that mortification, to oblige his mother the ducheſs of Angoulême, who hated him. But he had too much reaſon afterwards to repent his complaiſance to his mother.

At the very time Francis I. was attacked in Campagne, he ſent an army into Navarre, under the command of admiral Bonnivet, who arrived about the end of September, at St. John de Luz. At firſt, he pretended to march towards Pampelona. Then after ſeveral marches and countermarches, he ſuddenly approached, and beſieged Fontarabia. When the breach was made, he ordered the town to be furiouſly ſtormed, but however was bravely repulſed. But the garriſon, being little able to ſtand a ſecond aſſault, ſurrendered by capitulation. This conqueſt was of very great importance, Fontarabia being one of the keys of Spain.

Whilſt the war was vigorouſly continued in Italy, Champagne, Flanders, Picardy, Navarre, cardinal Wolſey was buſy at Calais in treating with the plenipotentiaries of the emperor and the king of France. The congreſs laſted ten weeks, and the parties could not be brought to agree. In all appearance, the mediator inſtead of cloſing, helped rather to widen the breach. It was long debated to know which had begun the war. This was the chief point with reſpect to Wolſey, who intended to throw the blame on the king of France. Afterwards, when the differences themſelves came to be conſidered, the propoſal of the emperor's plenipotentiaries ſhewed a peace was ſtill very remote. They demanded reſtitution of the duchy of Burgundy, and abolition of the homage due to the crown of France, for Flanders and Artois. The only reaſon they alledged to ſupport their laſt pretenſion was, that it was unbecoming for an emperor to do homage to a king. Theſe two propoſitions were of ſuch a nature, that Francis would hardly have accepted them, even after the loſs of many battles. On the other hand, the French embaſſadors having notice of what paſſed in Italy, earneſtly demanded reſtitution of Milan, and that the emperor ſhould withdraw his troops from before Tournay. They inſiſted moreover upon the reſtitution of Navarre, to which the emperor was bound by the treaty of Noyon. If the emperor had been afraid of Henry's joining with the king of France, he might have granted part of theſe demands without being forced to diſmember his dominions. But Francis could not reſign Burgundy, without letting the enemy into the heart of his kingdom, nor the homage of Flanders and Artois, without diſhonour. But as the emperor was ſecure of the king of England, he perſiſted in his demands, without any abatements.

After the mediator had long feigned to endeavour only to procure a peace, he declared he ſaw no way to ſucceed. Then he preſented to the plenipotentiaries a treaty to ſign, containing articles of little importance, namely, that the French and Flemings ſhould have liberty to fiſh for herrings till the end of January: that the two contending monarchs ſhould enjoin their ſubjects to purſue no veſſel into the ports or harbours belonging to the king of England, and commit no hoſtilities within the territories of the ſaid king during the war: that the pope's nuncio, and the plenipotentiaries at Calais, might freely retire with all their train, without receiving any injury from the troops of the two monarchs: that the king of England and the cardinal legate his lieutenant, ſhould be the conſervaters of theſe articles, to be ratified within ten days. We have here a very ſenſible proof of the cardinal's inſolence, who, in a treaty drawn by himſelf, preſumed thus to ſet himſelf upon a level with his maſter, by being declared conſervator with the king. Theſe conventions were ratified by the two monarchs the 2d and 11th of October, and there appears not in the Collection of the Public Acts, the leaſt trace of any other treaty made at Calais at that time.

Du Bellai [h], however, ſays in his memoirs, that the king of England having ſent embaſſadors to Francis I. during the congreſs at Calais, they laboured ſo effectually, that at length it was agreed, the emperor ſhould raiſe the ſiege of Tournay, and withdraw his troops out of the Milaneſe; that Francis ſhould retire into France with his army, and their differences be referred to the arbitration of the king of England. He adds, after theſe conventions, each thought the peace concluded, but that upon the emperor's receiving news of the taking of Fontarabia, he demanded before the treaty was ratified, the reſtitution of that place, and upon Francis's refuſal, the treaty remained unexecuted. But very probably, this illuſtrious author, who was better acquainted with the particulars of the war, than of the negotiations, was miſinformed. Firſt, becauſe the Collection of the Public Acts, mentions not this pretended treaty, though we ſee there another of much leſs conſequence, concluded at the ſame time. Secondly, we do not find in the Collection, any embaſſy from the king of England, either to the French king or the emperor, in the time which muſt have preceded this treaty. Thirdly, there is no likelihood that the emperor would have withdrawn his troops out of the Milaneſe, that is, would have reſtored Milan to France, and loſt the hopes of acquiring Tornay, which was now reduced to extremities, for the bare advantage of ſeeing Francis retire into his own kingdom. In ſhort, it may have been eaſily perceived, Henry was very far from the thoughts of forcing the emperor to yield to theſe terms, and it will ſtill be more plainly perceived by what follows. Add to all theſe conſiderations, that ſeeing the regard the emperor and the king of France had for cardinal Wolſey, it is not likely they ſhould conclude a treaty without his knowledge, and by the miniſtry of other embaſſadors, whilſt he was at Calais to do the office of a mediator. It may be, theſe propoſals were made to Francis, and he was ſo blind as to imagine they would take place, becauſe he was yet ignorant of the ſecret engagements of the king of England and his miniſter, with the emperor, and becauſe ſuch a report was ſpread in the court of France. Be this as it will, after the taking of Fontarabia, the war continued without intermiſſion, and with great animoſity. Francis I. became maſter of Heſdin about the beginning of November, and Tournay ſurrendered to the emperor by capitulation.

Mean while cardinal Wolſey ſtill remained at Calais, under colour of ſearching for ſome farther expedient to procure a peace between the two monarchs. He frequently ſent expreſſes to both, with propoſals which he knew they would not accept. At laſt, feigning a deſire to gain time, he went himſelf to the emperor at Bruges [i], where he was received with as much reſpect as if he had been king of England [k]. Here he concluded with the pope and the emperor a league againſt France, by virtue af the powers he had brought with him. By the treaty the pope engaged to thunder the church's cenſures againſt the king of France. Henry was to invade him with an army of forty thouſand men. The emperor and Henry obliged themſelves to break all their engagements with him. Moreover, Henry promiſed to give in marriage to the emperor the princeſs Mary, affianced to the dauphin. Theſe were the chief articles agreed upon by the emperor and the cardinal the 24th of November, 1521, which were to be ratified within three months. But they engaged to be ſecret till the time of performance. Thus was Henry perſuaded by his miniſter to oppreſs his ally the king of France, who had done him no injury. The only thing he could complain of, was, that Francis had lately permitted the duke of Albany to return into Scotland, doubtleſs becauſe he perceived the cardinal was meditating ſomething againſt him. It is vain to enquire what intereſt Henry had to declare againſt France, and cauſe the ballance to incline to the emperor's ſide: no other can be found but the cardinal's, who wanted to be pope at Francis's coſt. The death of Leo X. haſtened by poiſon, as ſeveral affirm, and happening during theſe tranſactions, has made ſome ſuſpect that Wolſey was concerned in it, and the more, becauſe he aſpired to be ſucceſſor to a pope much younger than himſelf; but no proof was ever produced. Certainly Henry would have acquired more glory in continuing umpire of the peace between the two contending monarchs, and in procuring tranquillity to all Europe, than by all the conqueſts his miniſter flattered him with [l].

Hitherto cardinal Wolſey had puſhed his fortune to ſuch a height, that it ſeemed difficult to make any addition to it. And yet all this was not capable to ſatisfy him. His legateſhip had been prolonged for two years, the beginning of this year. But he thought himſelf to be too much above all other legates, not to have a different commiſſion from theirs. In April he procured from Leo X. a bull, impowering him to make fifty knights, fifty count palatines, as many acolyths [m] and chaplains, forty notaries apoſtolic, who ſhould have the ſame privileges as thoſe made by the pope; to legitimate baſtards, to give degrees in arts, law, phyſic, and divinity, and grant all ſorts of diſpenſations. In a word not content with all the riches he poſſeſſed, or with the means he had to increaſe them inceſſantly, he cauſed alſo the rich abbey of St. Albans to be given him this year in commendam.

It is no wonder, if, being arrived to ſo high a degree of grandeur and riches, his pride increaſed in proportion. Though the king's blindneſs for him was inconceivable, it was not ſo with the courtiers, who ſaw but too plainly how groſly he miſled his maſter, who placed ſo great a confidence in him. But none dared to take notice of it, ſuch was the dread of his haughty and revengeful temper. The duke of Buckingham, ſon of the duke of the ſame name, who in the reign of Richard III. loſt his head on the ſcaffold, for endeavouring to procure the crown for Henry VII. ſadly experienced how dangerous it was to diſcover what was thought of that proud prelate. He happened one day to ſay, in the hearing of one who betrayed him [n], that in caſe the king died without iſſue, he thought he had a right to the crown, and if ever he aſcended the throne, his firſt care ſhould be to puniſh the cardinal according to his deſerts. The duke's title was not altogether groundleſs, ſince he was deſcended from Anne of Gloceſter, grandaughter to Edward III. Doctor Morton, afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, preſſed the duke his father to endeavour to ſeize the crown; but the duke choſe rather to act for the earl of Richmond, than for himſelf, as was ſhewn in the reign of Richard III. What the ſon had ſaid concerning his title, was therefore rather imprudent that criminal, ſince he pretended not to the crown unleſs the king died without heirs. Indeed, his title might be ill grounded; but he had done nothing to ſupport it. His crime then conſiſted only in what he had ſaid againſt the cardinal, who, for that reaſon, reſolved to diſpatch him. For that purpoſe, he gained ſome of his domeſtics, and learnt by their means that he conſulted a certain monk [o] who pretended to foretell things to come, and had conferred with him ſeveral times ſince April 1521. Probably, the duke, fond of his title, had enquired of the monk whether the king would die without children. And that was ſufficient to give the cardinal occaſion to miſconſtrue all his proceedings. When he believed he had ſufficient evidence againſt him, he began with depriving him of his two principal ſupports;

[h] Martin du Bellai, brother to cardinal John Bellai, was much eſteemed by Francis I. and employed by him in his wars, and in important embaſſies. He writ memoirs, containing the moſt memorable tranſactions under the reign of Francis I. to the reign of Henry II.

namely, Henry Piercy, earl of Nothumberland, his father-in-law, whom he ſent to the Tower on ſome pretence[p], and Thomas Howard earl of Surrey[q], his ſon in-law, on whom he conferred the government of Ireland, to remove him from London. Preſently after, the duke was apprehended[r], and accuſed of high treaſon. The ſubſtance of his impeachment was, that he had ſeveral times conſulted the monk concerning the ſucceſſion to the crown, and affected to make himſelf popular. The duke confeſſed he had talked ſometimes with the monk; but denied it to be with the intent he was charged with. However, he was condemned to die as a traitor, which he could not bear to hear when the ſentence was pronounced[s]. My lord of Norfolk, cried he, you have ſaid as a traitor ſhould be ſaid unto, but I was never one. My lords, continued he, addreſſing himſelf to the peers, his judges, I nothing maligne for what you have done to me, but the eternal God forgive you my death, and I do. I ſhall never ſue to the king for life, howbeit he is a gracious prince, and more grace may come from him than I deſire. My lords and all my fellows, I deſire you to pray for me. When he ſaid he would not ſue to the king for life, his meaning was, he thought it would be fruitleſs, knowing he was the cardinal's victim, who had an abſolute ſway over the king. Indeed, the miniſter had ſo ordered it, that though all the peers of the realm had a right to aſſiſt at the trial, there were preſent only one duke, one marquis, ſeven earls, and twelve barons[t]; and probably he had ſecured the majority. All the favour the duke received was to be beheaded, inſtead of dying the death of a traitor[u]. This execution was attended with loud murmurs among the people, and ſatyrical libels againſt the cardinal, wherein was ſaid, among other things, that it was not ſtrange the ſon of a butcher ſhould delight in ſhedding blood. But this was all the revenge that was taken for this injuſtice. He was too deeply rooted in the king's mind, to fear theſe murmurs, which beſides never reached the king's ears, all about him being either ſpies or creatures of the cardinal.

The king was then wholly intent upon one affair, namely, the war he had reſolved to make upon France, as if his glory and grandeur had depended upon the ruin of that kingdom, whereas his true intereſt was to ſupport France againſt the emperor, who was now grown too powerful. He was already formidable to all Europe, even without the aſſiſtance of England, how much more by his union with that kingdom? This was owing to cardinal Wolſey's ambition, whoſe counſels to his maſter were always ſelf-intereſted. Probably, France was going to be reduced to a very ſad condition, it being hardly poſſible for her to reſiſt ſo potent enemies, who were to invade her from ſeveral quarters. Francis I. imagined, however, he had ſtill one refuge by means of the Scots, who would make a conſiderable diverſion in England. The congreſs of Calais having plainly diſcovered Henry's partiality to the emperor, he made no doubt of its being an introduction to a rupture. In this belief, though he had engaged to detain the duke of Albany in France, he thought proper to keep him no longer, not thinking himſelf bound to perform a promiſe, the motive whereof is now no more, namely, the mutual friendſhip between him and Henry. He permitted therefore the duke of Albany to return into Scotland, or rather ſent him back, in hopes he would employ part of the Engliſh forces on the borders of the two kingdoms. He very juſtly expected this ſervice from a prince who was devoted to him, and looked upon his ſettlement in France as much more ſolid than that in Scotland, where his regency was to laſt but a few years. The duke therefore departed for Scotland, and arriving the 30th of October, 1521, after a four year's abſence, reſumed the regency. As he intended to ſerve France to the utmoſt of his power, his firſt care was to oblige the earl of Angus, the queen's ſpouſe, to quit the kingdom, deeming him one of the king of England's principal adherents, and yet the earl took refuge in France.

Whilſt the chriſtian princes were all employed in their temporal concerns, the reformation made great progreſs in Germany, by means of Luther's writings, which were read with great eagerneſs. Luther was ſatisfied at firſt with attacking the ſale of indulgences, than the indulgences themſelves, and the pope's power to grant them. This naturally led him to examine the grounds of the papal authoriy; and being perſuaded there was nothing to ſupport it in ſcripture, he writ upon that ſubject without any regard to the Roman pontiff. He attacked likewiſe in his writings the celibacy of prieſts, monaſtic vows, and private maſſes. Though at the time I am now ſpeaking of, namely, the beginning of the year 1521, he had preached and wrote againſt the pope but three years, he had gained many followers, and ſtill more enemies, not only by his novel opinions, but alſo by his ſharp and ſatyrical ſtile, wherein he threw off all ceremony with reſpect to the church of Rome. The book that made moſt noiſe was entitled, Concerning the Babyloniſh Captivity. In this book the popes were not ſpared.

In the ſeveral anſwers which appeared, as well againſt this as the other books of Luther, the decretals of the popes, and the works of Thomas Aquinas, were urged in favour of the papal authority. This gave him occaſion, in his replies, to ridicule thoſe, who, in defence of the papal power, alledged the deciſions of the popes themſelves, and the teſtimony of Thomas Aquinas, who was canonized for carrying the pope's authority as high as poſſible. Beſides, he did not ſhew much regard for that author's writings; which probably was the chief thing that incenſed Henry VIII. againſt him. As Henry had much ſtudied the works of Thomas Aquinas, and from thence properly had acquired all his theological knowledge, he could not bear to ſee his favourite author thus contemned[w]. He thought himſelf therefore a match for Luther, and able to confute his writings. But as Leo X. had by a bull expreſly forbid the reading of his works, and as an anſwer neceſſarily ſuppoſed the peruſal, cardinal Wolſey applied to the pope for a power to permit ſuch to read them as deſired it with intent to confute them. This was granted him by a brief dated the 17th of April, 1521, the pope little thinking who the perſon was that was going to ſupport his cauſe.

Henry finiſhed in September his books againſt Luther, entitled, Concerning the Seven Sacraments. He defended indulgences, papal authority, the number of ſacraments, and other articles combated by Luther, proceeding upon Thomas Aquinas's principles, as upon undeniable truths. Very probably he was aſſiſted by cardinal Wolſey in compoſing this work, which was preſented to the pope in full conſiſtory[x]. Leo X. who was ſtill living, received it with great joy, and ſpoke of it in the higheſt ſtrains of flattery, making no ſcruple to compare it to the works of St. Auguſtine and St. Jerom. This is no wonder. A book compoſed by a great king, in defence of the papal authority, could not be too much eſteemed by a pope. A few days after, Leo aſſembled the cardinals, to conſult with them after what manner he ſhould requite the king of England's ſervice to the church. After a long debate, they reſolved at laſt to honour that monarch with the glorious title of defender of the faith[y]. In conſequence of this reſolution, the pope ordered a bull to be drawn, conferring that title on Henry, and all the kings of England his ſucceſſors[z]. I ſhall not repeat here the magnificent enco-

This copy, richly bound, is kept in the Vatican, where lord Herbert ſays, he remembers to have ſeen it. The book is dedicated to the pope. [z] The beginning and end of this bull is engraven from the original, with the very hand-writing of the cardinal's to it, in the XIIIth vol. of the Fœd. p. 756.

Among

miums the pope gave the king in this bull, and in a letter of thanks for his book[a]. It may be eaſily imagined, he ſpared not the moſt extravagant expreſſions to flatter a prince, who was ſo fond of being flattered, and of whom he ſtood in need, his nuncio being then at Calais, negotiating with cardinal Wolſey a league againſt France[b].

[1522] I have already ſpoke of this league, which was really concluded at Bruges. Henry founded his joining with the emperor upon Francis's having been the aggreſſor, by encouraging Robert de la Mark to take up arms. But beſides that Francis denyed he was concerned in that undertaking, and had even obliged Robert to deſiſt, it was evident the emperor had prevented him, by joining in a league with the pope, though their league was not ſo ſoon made known. The ſecret attempts upon Como, Milan, Genoa, and the open war in the Milaneſe, by which the king of France loſt that duchy, were clear evidences that the league was concluded before Robert de la Mark's affair. Henry pretended alſo to have againſt Francis another cauſe of complaint, which however had no better foundation; namely, that contrary to his promiſe, he had permitted the duke of Albany to return into Scotland. But if it is conſidered that the duke arrived not in his own country till the 30th of October, and that the league of Bruges was ſigned the 24th of November, it will be eaſy to perceive the league was already reſolved before Henry could know that the duke of Albany was returned into Scotland. But though, upon the firſt notice, he had taken a haſty reſolution to join with the pope and the emperor, was that a juſt cauſe to proceed to a war, which would probably ruin France? The truth is, theſe were only pretences to cover the injuſtice of a war undertaken by Henry for the cardinal's intereſt, and perhaps without knowing himſelf the real motive of that miniſter's proceedings.

Mean while, Henry perceiving the duke of Albany would embarraſs him if he continued in Scotland, attempted a ſecond time to drive him from thence. To that purpoſe, he ſent Clarenceux his herald, with orders to ubraid him with breach of promiſe, and with returning into Scotland to marry the the queen dowager, and deprive the young king of the crown. The pretended reaſon of this laſt charge, was that the queen dowager being deſirous of having her marrige with the earl of Angus annulled, the duke of Albany had ſeconded her ſuit at the court of of Rome[c]. The duke anſwered he was returned into Scotland, by the invitation of the great men: that he had never done any thing to give occaſion to ſuſpect him of aſpiring to the crown, neither had he ever any ſuch thought: that indeed he had countenanced the queen's ſuit, but without any deſign to marry her, having a wife of his own.

Henry was not ſatisfied with ſummoning the regent, but ſent alſo a letter to the parliament of Scotland, containing the ſame accuſations againſt the duke of Albany, and a charge to the ſtates to expel him the kingdom. The ſubſtance of the parliament's anſwer was: that what had been reported to his majeſty concerning the duke of Albany's return into Scotland, to take forcible poſſeſſion of the king's perſon, was utterly falſe; that the duke did nothing with regard to the king, that could breed the leaſt ſuſpicion, ſince he did not ſo much as offer to change any of his domeſtics without the conſent of the ſtates, and that it was with the queen's advice and conſent, that they had taken care of the guardianſhip and education of the king: that they could not believe the duke had ever intended to put away his wife and marry the queen, or that the queen had any thoughts of eſpouſing the duke: that as for the treaty with the king of France, to hinder the duke of Albany's return into Scotland, it was never communicated to them, neither had they any knowledge of it: that they could not help thinking ſuch a treaty very ſtrange, ſince they rather imagined, his majeſty ſhould have ſollicited the duke to return to defend the king his nephew againſt his rebellious ſubjects, whereas they ſaw with grief, it was he who fomented the rebellion: that if it continued thus, they did not ſee how it was poſſible to keep a good underſtanding between the two kingdoms: that however, if he would be pleaſed to ſend away the biſhop of Dunkeld from his court, and without interpoſing in the affairs of Scotland, leave to the regent and ſtates the care of governing the kingdom, a truce might be concluded till the embaſſy that was to be ſent him, was ready. But that, in caſe he would have no truce, unleſs they expelled the regent, they would endeavour to defend themſelves in the beſt manner they could.

Queen Margaret, to whom the king her brother had likewiſe writ upon the ſame ſubject, ſent an anſwer, ſharply expoſtulating with him for giving ear to the report concerning her marriage with the duke of Albany. She freely owned, it was with her conſent and advice that the duke was recalled, adding if he had not been ſo unkind a brother, ſhe ſhould have had no occaſion to ſeek the protection of a ſtranger.

Henry could not expect any other anſwer, ſince he was conſcious to himſelf, that his accuſations againſt the regent of Scotland were only affected pretences to complain indirectly of the king of France. He ordered however the lord Dacres[d] to march into Scotland with five hundred men, and proclaim on the borders, that if the Scots made not peace with him by ſuch a time[e], it ſhould be to their peril. But he did not ſupport this bravado[f]. His ſole aim was to furniſh his party in Scotland with a pretence to refuſe to ſerve the regent, in caſe he attempted to make a diverſion in England in favour of France. And in this he was not diſappointed. In October following, the regent of Scotland raiſing an army to make an inroad into England, was no ſooner come to the borders, but many of the lords refuſed to attend any farther, alledging, they were unwilling to engage the kingdom in an unneceſſary war with England. The oppoſition the duke of Albany found in his army, convincing him he ſhould be able to do nothing conſiderable, he propoſed a truce, which the Engliſh gladly accepted. For, Henry's aim was only to terrify the Scots with a dread of the ſucceſs of a war with England during the minority of their king. So, the duke of Albany ſeeing it was not in his power to ſerve France as he deſired, returned about the end of October to Paris, in order to take freſh meaſures with the king. Thus Henry attained his ends, in avoiding a rupture with Scotland, as a war with that kingdom could not but extremely incommode him, in his preſent circumſtances.

Mean while, Francis I. having had ſome intelligence of what paſſed at Bruges between the emperor and the cardinal, and deſiring to convince Henry how directly contrary to the league of London his proceedings were, ſent him letters patents, inſerting the article of the treaty, whereby they were engaged mutually to aſſiſt one another. Then he recited what the emperor had done againſt him, as well in Italy as in Champagne and Flanders, and ſummoned him to perform the treaty he had ſolemnly ſworn. Henry in anſwer ſent a herald to proclaim war againſt him[g], alledging, he was obliged to it by the ſame treaty of London, becauſe Francis had firſt attacked the emperor, and moreover had diſappointed him with reſpect to the duke of Albany[h]. Thus war was once more declared between France and England, upon very frivolous, not to ſay unjuſt occaſions. But Wolſey had the art of perſuading the king his maſter to whatever he pleaſed.

Henry having without cauſe proclaimed war againſt France, did not dare to call a parliament to demend a ſubſidy. For he could alledge neither any juſt cauſe, nor any neceſſity

[b] This year, 1522, muſkets were invented, which du Ballai ſays, were firſt uſed in this war. This year alſo, it being obſerved there was a great decay of tillage and huſbandry, occaſioned by the many incloſures made by the nobility and gentry, who, within fifty years, had turned moſt of their lands into paſture, and kept them in their own hands; from whence, among other inconveniences, it followed, that the number of huſbandmen, and perſons capable of defending the country, was very much leſſened; many towns and villages were depopulated; and the prices of wool and meat were very much enhanced, as being engroſſed by perſons who were not obliged to ſell: to remedy all this, the king revived the ſtatutes made againſt incloſures, and iſſued out his commiſſion to juſtices of peace, and other magiſtrates to ſee them put in execution. for undertaking a war deſtructive to the Engliſh merchants. However, money muſt be raiſed, and it was the cardinal's buſineſs, who had embarked him in the war, to find means. The expedient he thought moſt proper was, to order the ſheriffs to ſend a liſt of their names of all above ſixteen years old, with an exact account of what each perſon was worth in land, ſtock, moveables, and money. This was ſuch a ſurvey as was formerly taken in the reign of William the Conqueror, and had given ſo great cauſe of complaint to the nation[i]. This was followed by a general loan of the tenth of his lay ſubjects, and a fourth of the clergy, according to the true value of their eſtates, beſides twenty thouſand pounds which the king borrowed of the city of London. Thus one injuſtice commonly draws on another. The war was manifeſtly unjuſt, and became ſtill more ſo by the means employed to maintain it. Theſe kinds of involuntary loans, to which certain kings of England have ſometimes forced their ſubjects, are a manifeſt violation of the privileges of the people, and tend directly to arbitrary power. If the king may oblige his ſubjects to furniſh him with money, when he ſhall think neceſſary, though it be by way of benevolence or loan, he may be aſſured, he will very ſeldom, or perhaps never think himſelf obliged to call a parliament. It is true, Henry was neither the firſt nor laſt that uſed this extraordinary method to raiſe money. But, though he was ſo fortunate as to receive no prejudice by it, ſome of his ſucceſſors, who were pleaſed to imitate him, were not ſo happy.

The general loan made a great noiſe over all the kingdom. Every one openly exclaimed againſt the cardinal, who was the author. But he little regarded the people's clamours, becauſe he was ſupported by the king. However, though at firſt he had given orders to exact loans with the ſame rigour, as if they had been a tax impoſed by the parliament, he met with ſo many obſtacles, that he was apprehenſive of raiſing in the kingdom commotions not to be appeaſed at his pleaſure. So, the tax was levied much more gently than at firſt was intended. This cauſed ſo great a miſtake in the cardinal's calculation, that the king was forced at laſt to recur to the uſual method of a parliament to maintain the war, as we ſhall ſee preſently. The London merchants were the moſt ſtrenuous oppoſers of the levying this tax. They were required to declare upon oath the real value of their effects; but they firmly refuſed it, alledging, it was not poſſible for them to give an exact account of their effects, part whereof was in the hands of their correſpondents in foreign countries. At length, by agreement, the king was pleaſed to accept of a ſum according to their own calculation.

Cardinal Wolſey's concern at not ſucceeding in this affair according to his wiſh, was not comparable to his trouble at being diſappointed in another, which touched him more nearly, and for which he had ſpared neither money nor pains. I mean his election to the papal dignity, of which he thought himſelf ſure. Leo X. dying the beginning of December the laſt year, when his obſequies were over, the cardinals entered the conclave, where they were not a little embarraſſed concerning the election of a new pope. Julio cardinal de Medici aſpired to the papacy, and had many votes for him. But the emperor's party and ſome cardinals gained by Wolſey, openly oppoſed the election of Julio. Mean while, as it is required to have two thirds of the voices to be choſen pope, if the cardinal de Medici had not enough for himſelf, he had however enough to exclude any other. And this long detained the cardinals in the conclave[k]. Though the emperor had promiſed Wolſey his intereſt, he intended not to keep his word. His deſign was to cauſe Adrian Florentio, biſhop of Tortoſa, native of Utrecht, and formerly his preceptor, to be choſen, reckoning, when he ſhould be pope, he would be entirely devoted to him. But this affair was managed ſo artfully, and withal ſo privately, that the cardinals of his party, without diſcovering their intent, were ſatisfied with breaking the cardinal de Medici's meaſures, till an opportunity offered to carry their point.

Mean while, Wolſey left no ſtone unturned. As he built all his hopes upon the emperor's intereſt, he writ to him to put him in mind of his promiſe, repreſenting the advantages to have a pope at his devotion. At the ſame time he ordered Pace, who was then at Venice, inſtantly to repair to Rome, and do him what ſervice he could. The emperor was very much embarraſſed in relation to Wolſey. He had promiſed to uſe all his intereſt in his favour, though nothing was farther from his thoughts. It was his intereſt to have a pope at his devotion. But he knew cardinal Wolſey too well, to imagine ſuch a pope would be guided by his counſels. It was neceſſary therefore, in order not to loſe Wolſey's friendſhip, to cauſe Adrian to be choſen without the emperor's appearing to be concerned in the election. As he had gained that miniſter to his intereſt, ſolely by the promiſe of procuring him the papacy, he could not doubt, that if he ſaw himſelf deceived, he would turn his maſter againſt him. Wherefore the emperor concealed his deſigns, and was ſo faithfully ſerved in the conclave, that they could not be diſcovered, neither had Adrian ever one vote in the daily ſcrutinies. Mean while, he kept cardinal Wolſey in hopes, and threw upon the cardinal de Medici's faction, the obſtacles which occurred in the performance of his promiſe. At laſt, when they that were in the emperor's ſecret, and managed his affairs in the conclave, were ſecure of a ſufficient number of votes, one day as the cardinals were met to make a ſcrutiny, ſome one propoſed cardinal Adrian biſhop of Tortoſa then in Spain. He enlarged upon the great qualities of that cardinal, and the advantages which would accrue to the church by his promotion. Whereupon they who were of the party voted one after the other for Adrian, as if they had been inſpired, and perhaps without knowing one another's deſign, ſo dexterouſly had the buſineſs been managed. The reſt that were not in the ſecret, ſeeing two thirds of the voices for Adrian, voted the ſame way, leſt a fruitleſs oppoſition might turn to their prejudice. Thus the election was made with unanimous conſent, and paſſed for a miraculous inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt. It is not likely that Wolſey was ſuch a dupe, as to believe the emperor was not concerned in Adrian's election, ſince the thing was ſo plain. The new pope who aſſumed the name of Adrian VI. had been his preceptor, and upon his recommendation was made cardinal, and was now regent in Spain. Beſides, there is no likelihood that the cardinals would have thought of chooſing a Barbarian, for that is the honourable appellation the Italians beſtow on thoſe that are not of their nation, if the election had not been managed by the emperor. However this be, Wolſey ſhewed no reſentment, whether he waited for an opportunity to be only revenged, or thought proper to keep fair with the emperor againſt another vacancy. For it was probable there would be one very ſoon, the new pope being old and infirm. Adrian VI. was elected in January 1522, but it was Midſummer before he came to Rome.

The emperor having made a pope at his devotion, and ſettled his affairs in Flanders and Germany, reſolved to return into Spain, where his preſence was neceſſary. But as he had cauſe to fear ſome change at the court of England, on account of what had paſſed in the late conclave, he thought proper to viſit Henry in his way. This viſit was neceſſary, as well to confirm with that prince the articles agreed on at

[i] Stow gives an account of this ſurvey from an original warrant directed to the conſtable of a hundred, who was commanded to charge the conſtables of every pariſh within the ſaid hundred to appear perſonally before certain commiſſioners, and to bring with them the names of all perſons above ſixteen years old, dwelling within the ſaid hundred, and to enjoin them to repair to a certain place aſſigned, with their arms, and declare what their names are, and to whom they belong, and who is lord of every town or hamlet, and who ſtewards, and who parſons of the town, and what their benefice is worth, and who owners of every parcel of land within the ſaid precincts, and what is the yearly value of every man's land, what ſtock on the lands, and who the owner thereof; alſo what ſtrangers dwell there, and what buſineſs they follow; alſo the value and ſubſtance of every perſon above ſixteen years of age; alſo what penſions go thence to religious and ſpiritual men. Which being certified, the king rejoiced, finding his kingdom ſo wealthy (ſays Polydore Virgil.) See Stow's Ann. p. 515. This warrant was dated at Brentwood, March 27, 1522.

[k] The conclave is in the vatican, where there is a long gallery full of cells, which are choſen by the cardinals by lot. The funeral of the deceaſed pope laſting nine days, on the tenth each cardinal goes to his cell, and are ſhut up in the conclave with one ſervant, called a conclaviſt, with each a ſecretary and gentleman to attend them, carry their meſſages, and manage their intrigues. The conclave is guarded by the militia of the city, to prevent their receiving any letters; and the diſhes of meat (which are received in at a window by the conclaviſt) are ſearched by the maſter of the ceremonies for the ſame reaſon. The cardinals meet every morning and evening in the chapel for a ſcrutiny, which is done by writing their ſuffrages in the billets done up in two folds, and ſealed with two ſeals. In the firſt fold, the conclaviſt writes the name of the cardinal his maſter votes for, becauſe the cardinal's hand would be known. In the ſecond the cardinal writes his own name; and on the outſide, the conclaviſt writes any motto the cardinal pleaſes, as deo volente, by which they know their own billets when they are read, for the fold containing the elector's name is not opened till the pope is choſen, and then he opens all to know who elected him. When the billets are ready, they put them, after a ſhort prayer, into a chalice upon the altar, and appoint two of the number to read the names of the cardinals aloud, and keep account of the votes for each. And this they do till two thirds of the votes fall upon one perſon; and if they do not, the billets are all burnt. The court of Rome conſiſts at preſent of the pope and ſeventy cardinals; viz. fifty cardinal prieſts, fourteen cardinal deacons, and ſix cardinal biſhops, who are for the moſt part of the pope's privy council. See Puffendorf's Introduction to the Hiſtory of Europe, and Relig. Cuſtoms, vol. I.

Bruges, as to try to preſerve cardinal Wolſey's friendſhip, without which he could not expect to preſerve the king's. He landed the 26th of May at Dover, where the cardinal waited on him with a magnificent train, and Henry came himſelf two days after[l]. From thence he conducted the emperor to Greenwich, and then to London [m], where he was received with all the honour and reſpect uſual on ſuch occaſions. The cardinal legate forgot not to ſhew his grandeur by ſaying his maſs[n] before the two monarchs, aſſiſted by ſeveral biſhops, and ſerved by dukes. As he had reſolved to hide his reſentment, the emperor had reaſon to be ſatisfied with his reception, and found a ready compliance with all his deſires. After ſome ſtay in London the king invited him to Windſor, where he was inſtalled of the order of the garter, into which his brother Ferdinand alſo had been admitted the 23d of the foregoing April[o]. This done, the two monarchs received the ſacrament together, and ſwore to the treaty of Bruges.

The preamble of the treaty ran, that the emperor and king of France had referred their differences to the arbitration of the king of England, who had ſent the cardinal of York to Calais to decide them: that in theſe conferences it was long debated to know, which of the two monarchs had been the aggreſſor, and after mature deliberation the cardinal had declared it was the king of France, as well by means of Robert de la Mark, as by invading Navarre: that therefore the king of England was obliged by the treaty of London, to aſſiſt the prince attacked againſt the aggreſſor. That moreover, he had himſelf cauſe to complain of the king of France for breach of promiſe, in ſending back the duke of Albany into Scotland, and for diſcontinuing the payments of the ſums due to him. Upon all theſe accounts, Charles and Henry deeming themſelves free and clear from all engagements with the king of France, had reſolved to contract a ſtrict alliance, and ſeal it with a marriage between the emperor and the princeſs Mary, Henry's daughter, upon the following terms. Of theſe terms I ſhall recite ſuch only as may be of ſervice to the ſequel of the hiſtory. Thoſe concerning the marriage were to this effect:

That the emperor ſhould eſpouſe by proxy, Mary, daughter to Henry, as ſoon as ſhe ſhould be twelve years old.

That her dowry ſhould be four hundred thouſand crowns, out of which ſhould be deducted what the emperors Maximilian and Charles had borrowed of the king of England.

That in caſe the marriage ſhould not be accompliſhed by the emperor's fault, he obliged himſelf to pay four hundred thouſand crowns to the king of England, who bound himſelf in the ſame ſum to the emperor, in caſe the marriage was hindred on his part.

The terms of the league were:

That before the end of May, 1524, the emperor ſhould enter France on the ſide of Spain, and the king of England in Picardy, each with an army of thirty thouſand [p] foot, and ten thouſand horſe.

That they ſhould make neither peace nor truce without a mutual conſent.

That if any places ſhould be conquered upon France, they ſhould be reſtored to him of the two allies, who had a right to them; and to prevent all diſputes, each ſhould declare his pretenſions before the 1ſt of May, 1524.

That if the king of England intended to ſubdue Scotland, or reduce Ireland to an entire obedience, or the emperor to recover Gueldres or Friſeland; if the Scots invaded England, or the duke of Gueldres made war upon the emperor; in all theſe caſes the two monarchs ſhould be bound to aſſiſt one another.

That they ſubmitted to the ſpiritual juriſdiction of the cardinal of York, as legate, and required him to pronounce the ſentence of excommunication againſt him of the two that ſhould firſt violate the treaty.

That the treaty ſhould be kept private, ſo that the common enemy might have no knowledge thereof.

That the pope ſhould be entreated to enter into the league as a principal contractor, and reputed as ſuch, provided he accepted it within three months.

That the Venetians ſhould be likewiſe admitted, provided they renounce their alliance with France.

That the two monarchs ſhould uſe their utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the Switzers to forſake the French, or at leaſt to be neutral.

The ſame day the treaty was ſigned, the emperor ſigned alſo letters patents, promiſing to pay Henry whatever was due to him from Francis, in caſe Francis, on account of the preſent league ſhould refuſe to continue the payment to which he was obliged.

But cardinal Wolſey had not waited to do his own affairs till the king's were finiſhed, for on the eighth of June the emperor by letters patents, had engaged to pay him the penſion of twelve thouſand livres[q], which the king of France gave him for the biſhopric of Tournay. Some days after, he obliged himſelf to pay him a penſion of two thouſand five hundred ducats, till the like penſion was aſſigned him upon the vacant churches in Spain, in lieu of that he received out of the biſhopric of Badajos, which the emperor deſired to diſcharge. But the emperor's bounties to cardinal Wolſey were amply recompenſed by a great ſum lent him by the king before his departure.

During the emperor's ſtay in England, which was about five weeks, he ſo won the affection of the whole court by his civilities, careſſes, and preſents, that he was almoſt ſure of leaving none but friends about the king. He gained the good will of the Engliſh, chiefly by conſtituting the earl of Surrey, admiral of his fleet[r]. The commiſſion was drawn whilſt the emperor was at London, before his journey to Windſor. As he was to make ſome farther ſtay in England, the earl of Surrey taking with him both the Engliſh and Flemiſh fleets, made two deſcents into France, and carried away a rich booty[s]. Then he returned and conveyed the emperor to Spain[t].

I muſt now briefly relate the ſucceſs of the wars which were waging in ſeveral places. The death of Leo X. had put the affairs of the allies in Italy in a very ill ſituation. The troops of the church and of Florence had relinquiſhed the army, immediately after the news of the pope's death. Beſides that, Proſper Colonna received no more ſupplies of money, either from Rome or the emperor, was forced to diſband moſt of his remaining troops, and to keep but what was abſolutely neceſſary for the defence of Milan. Mean while, the emperor ordered a levy of ſix thouſand Landſquenets[u], which Franceſco Sforza, and Hieronimo Adorno a Genoeſe, were to lead into Italy. Shortly after, Lautrec received a reinforcement of ſixteen thouſand Switzers, which rendered him ſuperior to the allies, and yet he could not hinder the Landſquenets from joining the emperor's army. His only refuge was to try to bring the imperialiſts to a battle, and for that purpoſe he beſieged Pavia; but Proſper Colonna found means to throw ſuccours into the place without running any hazard. Whereupon Lautrec diſpairing of ſucceſs, raiſed the ſiege and encamped at Monzas and Colonna, who was afraid for Milan, poſted himſelf at Bicocca, a country ſeat with a large park, capable of being eaſily fortified as ſurrounded with a deep ditch. Here Colonna intrenched himſelf in ſuch a manner, that he could not be attacked without raſhneſs. Lautrec had no inclination to attack the imperialiſts in that poſt, but could not poſſibly help it. His Switzers would have money, and he had none to give them; Louiſa, of Savoy, the king's mother, having applied to other uſes the four hundred thouſand crowns deſigned for the army in Italy. Mean while the Switzers preſſed their general either to give them money, or lead them to battle, elſe they were reſolved to return home. This put him at length upon aſſaulting the camp at Bicocca, where he was repulſed with great loſs [w]; after which, the Switzers quitting him, he was conſtrained to repaſs the mountains, not being able to withſtand the imperialiſts. Preſently after, Colonna became maſter of Genoa. This rich city being taken by ſurpriſe, whilſt a capitulation was negotiating, was miſerably ſacked. In ſhort, Francis had nothing left in Italy but the caſtles of Milan and Cremona, and even theſe were very cloſely blocked up.

In other parts where the war was carrying on during this campaign, France was more proſperous. After admiral Bonnivet had taken Fontarabia, the Spaniards inveſted that place, and continued the ſiege, without being able to accompliſh their enterprize. At laſt, marſhal de Chabanes being ſent into Bearn to take the command of the French army, in the room of marſhal de Chatillon, who was dead, raiſed the ſiege, and appointed one Frauget governor of Fontarabia, who afterwards behaved very ill.

In Picardy and Champagne, the imperialiſts and Engliſh having joined their forces performed nothing of moment. The two armies, commanded by the count de Bure for the emperor, and by the earl of Surrey for the king of England [x], were ſo ſuperior to thoſe of France, that the duke of Vendome who commanded in Picardy, was not able to reſiſt them. So, having furniſhed the towns with ammunition, he contented himſelf with inceſſantly annoying them with a ſmall body of troops. In September the two generals beſieged Heſdin, but after having been five or ſix weeks before the town, were forced to retire. From thence they marched to Dourlens, and finding the place deſerted, and the gates pulled down, ſet fire to it. Then intending to approach Corbie in October, the bad weather, and the care the French had taken for the defence of that place, hindered their undertaking the ſiege. After that, the imperialiſts retired into Artois, and the Engliſh returned home [y].

Thus all the efforts of the emperor and the king of England would have done Francis no great miſchief this campaign, if he had not himſelf been the cauſe of his ill ſucceſs in Italy, by neglecting to find the Switzers money. Indeed, if Lautrec had not been forced to attack the imperialiſts at Bicocca, probably he would have been maſter of Milan before the end of the campaign. Charles V. then perceived, that to gain any conſiderable advantages upon France, much greater efforts were to be uſed, and for that reaſon continued to careſs cardinal Wolſey in order to ſecure the king his maſter's aſſiſtance. In the Collection of the Public Acts, there is a letter of his to the cardinal, full of obliging expreſſions, plainly denoting his want of him. "I return your thanks (ſaid he to him) for the good affection you have always ſhown me, deſiring you to continue it, as I firmly believe you will, for you are ſenſible that I place my whole confidence in you." Again, "I entreat you to give the ſame credit to my ſaid embaſſadors as to myſelf, and ſhew yourſelf, on this occaſion, as I take you to be, my good and faithful friend, for I ſhall have a greatful remembrance of it."

[1522] The extraordinary method uſed by the cardinal to raiſe money having been very diſagreeable to the Engliſh, he judged it more proper to proceed for the future in the uſual way; and therefore the king aſſembled a parliament the 15th of April 1523 [z]. The convocation meeting at the ſame time according to cuſtom [a], the cardinal reſolved to eſtabliſh a good precedent in favour of the king, by exacting from the clergy a conſiderable ſubſidy. His character of legate gave him ſuch intereſt with that body, that he was almoſt ſure of obtaining whatever he was pleaſed to demand. But to find leſs difficulties, he removed on divers pretences ſome of thoſe from whom he feared to meet oppoſition, and gained others by promiſes or threats. Matters being thus ordered, he demanded of the clergy a ſubſidy of one half of their annual revenues, payable in five years. Richard Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, John Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and a proctor of the inferior clergy, one Philips, would have oppoſed this exaction, but the cardinal treated them in ſuch a manner as diſcouraged the reſt from ſupporting them. So the ſubſidy was granted, though the clergy privately murmured, that the pope's legate, who ought to maintain their rights, was the firſt to violate them.

This affair being thus ended with reſpect to the clergy, the cardinal repaired to the houſe of commons, where he made a long ſpeech, endeavouring to ſhew the neceſſity of the war the king had undertaken, by aggravating the pretended injuries he had ſuffered from the king of France. He concluded with demanding a ſubſidy of the fifth part of the goods of ever lay ſubject to be paid in four years [b]. This demand cauſed warm debates among the commons. Several repreſented, that if the kingdom was actually invaded, hardly could the king require ſuch a ſubſidy, much leſs for a war wantonly undertaken, and rather for the intereſt of the emperor than of England. However as the court party were very numerous in the houſe, it was reſolved to grant the king a ſubſidy, which was but one half of what was demanded. The cardinal, who was uſed to be complied with, was extremely offended at the oppoſition of the commons. He went again to the houſe and told them, he deſired to reaſon with thoſe who oppoſed his demands. But the commons replied by their ſpeaker [c], that it was the order of that houſe to hear and not to reaſon, but among themſelves. At this reply, the cardinal withdrew, extremely mortified, perceiving he would only prejudice the king's affairs, in attempting to treat the commons with the ſame haughtineſs he treated the reſt of the world. His ſolicitation however had ſome effect, ſince there was an addition made to the ſubſidy [d].

Beſides this affair, for which properly the parliament was called, nothing remarkable paſſed in the ſeſſion, except an act of attainder againſt the late duke of Buckingham, who had been condemned by a ſentence of his peers. All the world was ſatisfied this ſentence had been procured by indirect and irregular methods, and the cardinal was publicly accuſed of having ſacrificed that lord to his vengeance, he had the credit to obtain this act, in order to divert the blame thrown upon him. But withal, the parliament ſhewed that the act was paſſed out of mere condeſcenſion, ſince by another, Henry Stafford ſon of the deceaſed was reſtored to his eſtate and honours [e]. A ſtatute was made alſo this ſeſſion, impowering the king for his life to repeal all attainders of high-treaſon by his letters patent under the great-ſeal [f].

Theſe were the firſt attempts made in this reign to render the king maſter of the debates of the parliament. Cardinal Wolſey was the firſt author, and unfortunately for the ſubjects, the king too well improved his miniſter's inſtructions. Such favourites as this have but too much cauſe to fear the parliament, and therefore ſtrive to the utmoſt of their power to leſſen its authority, by enlarging that of the ſovereign who ſupports them. But their labour is in vain; very few fail at laſt of falling into the hands of that authority they have endeavoured to deſtroy. Wolſey is one of thoſe who have the moſt openly abuſed their favour, not only againſt the nation's but alſo the king's intereſt, which was much leſs dear to him than his own. He was never contented with eſtates or honours. The 24th of March this year he procured for himſelf the biſhopric of Durham, one of the richeſt in the kingdom, in lie of Bath and Wells, which he was willing to reſign. Two months after, Adrian VI. prolonged his

But afterwards, by the liberal motion of ſome, particularly of ſir John Huſe, a knight of Lincolnſhire, thoſe of fifty pounds a year and upwards were induced to give one ſhilling more for three years to come, which at length being continued to the fourth year, and extended to thoſe who were worth five pounds in goods, was all that could be obtained. Reflecting legateſhip for five years, after the expiration of the term granted by Leo X. Thus eſtates and honours were inceſſantly heaped upon him, without however any poſſibility of ſatisfying his greedineſs. Indeed, he carried his deſires much higher, ſince he ſtill aſpired to the papacy, Adrian's age and infirmities giving occaſion to think his pontificate would not laſt long. He ſtill expected to be raiſed to that high dignity by the emperor's means, and therefore forgot nothing to preſerve his favour. To this doubtleſs muſt be aſcribed the honourable reception given this year to Chriſtiern king of Denmark and Sweden, who had married the emperor's ſiſter. This prince having by his cruelties rendered himſelf odious to his ſubjects, and for that reaſon been expelled his dominions, arrived in England about Midſummer with his queen, and was received as a king unjuſtly oppreſſed, and not like one that had by his barbarities drawn his misfortunes upon himſelf. Henry was not contented to do him all poſſible honour, but moreover renewed with him the treaty of alliance between England and Denmark, as if that prince had ſtill been in poſſeſſion of his dominions.

This was the fruit of cardinal Wolſey's intereſted counſels, who never regarded either honour or juſtice in gratifying his paſſions. He expected every thing from the emperor, and therefore uſed his utmoſt endeavours to increaſe that monarch's power, that he might be better able to perform his promiſe. It was not the cardinal's fault that France was not utterly ruined. At leaſt he performed this year in conjunction with the emperor projects tending to the entire diſſolution of that ancient monarchy.

Though by the treaty of Bruges, ratified by the emperor and Henry at Windſor, they were not to enter France till 1524, an opportunity which offered cauſing them to take other meaſures, they reſolved to anticipate their expedition, and invade the king of France in three different places. The emperor was to have a ſtrong army on the frontiers of Spain, to become maſter of Fontarabia and Bayonne. Henry was to employ his forces in Picardy jointly with thoſe of the Low Countries; and the conſtable of Bourbon, who had ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted by the emperor, or perhaps by his own offer, was to make an inroad into Burgundy. As moſt of the events of the following years turn upon that prince's diſguſt, it will be requiſite briefly to mention the reaſons.

The duke of Bourbon, prince of the blood royal of France, had received the conſtable's ſword ever ſince the firſt year of Francis I. He had all the qualifications neceſſary for that high poſt. Perhaps he had too much merit, ſince, if we believe Mezerai, Louiſa of Savoy mother to Francis wiſhed to have him for her huſband. But as he feigned not to underſtand what ſhe deſired, he made her his irreconcileable enemy. From that time, he perpetually received mortifications from the king, over whom the ducheſs his mother had too great an aſcendant. The firſt mentioned in hiſtory was when in 1521 the king, commanding the army in perſon, gave the conduct of the van to the duke of Alencon, contrary to the prerogatives annexed to the office of conſtable. But this was nothing in compariſon of another, which however is related in the hiſtory of France only upon uncertain reports. The king telling the conſtable he ſhould be glad to marry him to the ducheſs his mother, received an anſwer ſo injurious to the ducheſs [g], that he gave him a box on the ear. This fact is not perhaps ſufficiently atteſted. But however it is certain the ducheſs's affection for the conſtable turned to hatred. From thence forwards he was looked upon with an evil eye at court, and no more truſted with the command of the king's armies. This was ſufficient to give him great diſguſt. But his enemy not being ſatisfied with theſe mortifications, which ſeemed to her too ſlight a revenge for her contemned love, commenced a ſuit againſt him for his whole eſtate. The cauſe was naturally to be tried by the parliament of Paris; but the ducheſs put it into the hands of the chancellor and ſome other commiſſioners, her creatures, which convinced the conſtable that his ruin was determined. So perceiving no way to avoid ſo fatal a blow, his deſpair cauſed him to throw himſelf into the emperor's arms. A Flemiſh lord [h] was the manager of the negotiation, wherein the king of England interpoſed, as being equally concerned with the emperor to create troubles in France. It is hard to know exactly when the negotiation began; but we find in the Collection of the Public Acts of England, the treaty was advanced the 17th of May, 1523. We ſee there Henry's commiſſion to Richard Sampſon and Richard Jerningham, to treat with the duke of Bourbon [i] in order to draw him into the league. This commiſſion empowered the envoys alſo to receive of the ſame prince a promiſe or engagement to own Henry for king of France, to do him homage and ſwear fealty to him. It cannot be inferred from hence, that the conſtable entered into any ſuch engagement, but only that Henry intended to draw him into it. However, by the treaty made by the duke with the two monarchs, after the conqueſt of France he was to have for his part Provence, to be erected into a kingdom, and was to marry Leonora, the emperor's ſiſter, widow of don Emanuel, king of Portugal [k]. The duke was to bring into the field an army of his friends and vaſſals, to whom the emperor promiſed to join ſeven or eight thouſand men. This army was to act in the bowels of the kingdom, whilſt the emperor and Henry invaded Bearn and Picardy.

Mean while, Francis I. ignorant of the deſigns of his enemies, was ſolely employed in preparing to recover the duchy of Milan, where he intended to command his army in perſon. He haſtened his preparations the more, becauſe the Venetians were ſtrongly ſollicited to join with his enemies, on pretence that he amuſed them with the vain hopes of ſeeing him ſpeedily in Italy with a powerful army. But notwithſtanding all his diligence, it was not poſſible to avoid that misfortune. The Venetians ſeeing no French army arrive, and dreading to be expoſed to the emperor's indignation, entered at laſt into the league againſt France about the end of July [l].

On the other hand, pope Adrian VI. laboured with all his power to procure a truce between the chriſtian princes, fancying after that, there would be no difficulty to unite them together in a war againſt the Turks. But as his genius was mean, and very different from that of Leo X. and Julian II. his predeceſſors, inſtead of making the princes ſubſervient to his deſigns, he was himſelf without knowing it inſtrumental to thoſe of others. The emperor told him he heartily deſired the truce, but intimated the neceſſity of its being for ſome time, in order to reap the intended advantage. He thereby laid an invincible obſtacle in the way, becauſe the king of France being lately diſpoſſeſſed of the duchy of Milan, would never hearken to a long truce, which would afford his enemies time to ſecure their conqueſt. That monarch's oppoſition gave the emperor and the king of England occaſion to engage the pope to proceed farther, by hinting to him that after the example of ſome of his predeceſſors, he ſhould exert his apoſtolic power, which no chriſtian prince would preſume directly to oppoſe. Pleaſed with theſe hopes, Adrian publiſhed a bull dated the 30th of April, enjoining by virtue of the power committed to him by God, a three years truce between all chriſtian princes, under pain of excommunication and interdict, againſt thoſe that ſhould refuſe to obſerve it. But the king of France diſregarding ſuch a truce, continued his preparations for the Milan expedition, and ordered his troops to march towards Italy. Then the pope was told, that Francis alone, by his noncompliance and obſtinacy, hindered the chriſtians from joining their forces againſt the Turks. By theſe ſecret practices the good pope was gradually brought to conclude a league againſt France with the emperor, the king of England, Ferdinand, archduke of Auſtria, the emperor's brother, the duke of Milan, the Genoeſe, and the Florentines. This league was ſigned the 3d of Auguſt, a few days after the Venetians had deſerted France.

Italy ſeemed by this league to be ſecured from all invaſions. And indeed Proſper Colonna, who commanded in Milan, ſo little expected to be attacked, that he neglected to take neceſſary meaſures for the defence of that duchy. Mean while, Francis purſued his projects, and the more, as he heard there were no preparations at Milan. The emperor ſeemed wholly to neglect the defence of that ſtate, on purpoſe to draw Francis into Italy, reckoning that his abſence would promote the duke of Bourbon's deſigns. Nay, it is ſaid, that to induce Francis to abſent himſelf from his kingdom, Henry had cauſed him to be privately told, there was no danger from him that year in Picardy.

Affairs being in this ſituation, Francis departed for Lyons in order to paſs into Italy. In the mean while the emperor was preparing an army in Spain to beſiege Fontarabia and Bayonne. But the army was raiſed very ſlowly, becauſe it was not to act till Francis was engaged in the war of Milan. On the other ſide, the count de Bure[m] his general in Flanders, remained quiet, waiting to join the Engliſh, who the better to deceive the king of France were not to land at Calais till the end of September. In ſhort, the emperor ordered eight thouſand Landſquenets to march in ſmall diviſions into Franche Comté, who were to join the duke of Bourbon as ſoon as he was ready. Upon that prince's revolt the allies built all their hopes, imagining that Francis being in Italy, France thus unexpectedly invaded in ſo many places at once would make no great reſiſtance. Theſe hopes were the better grounded, as Francis having no intelligence of the duke of Bourbon's plots, had no troops at all in Burgundy, few in Guienne and Bearn, and Picardy was in an ill ſtate of defence.

Mean while, the conſtable, not to be obliged to attend the king, pretended to be ſick at Moulins. But Francis, whilſt on the road to Lyons, happened to be informed by two of the conſtable's ſervants, that their maſter held private correſpondence with the emperor. Surpriſed at the news, he turned out of his way to go to Moulins, where he told the duke, who ſtill feigned to be ſick, what had been diſcovered to him. The duke freely owned, the emperor had founded him by the count de Rœux, but that he had refuſed to hearken to his propoſals: that he deſigned to inform his majeſty of it, but being prevented by his illneſs from coming to court, he durſt not truſt any perſon with the ſecret. Whether the king believed what the conſtable ſaid, or thought he could not arreſt him in his own territories, he was contented with ordering him follow him to Lyons. The duke ſet out indeed as if he intended to follow the king, being carried in a litter on pretence of his ſickneſs, and travelling by very eaſy journies. But upon notice that two of his confidents were arreſted at court, he privately withdrew from his attendants, and taking with him only Pomperan, one of his gentlemen, he eſcaped through by-ways, and ſafely arrived at Trent in Germany.

The conſtable's flight, convincing the king there was ſome grand plot in France to be executed during his abſence, he relinquiſhed his deſign of going into Italy, and contented himſelf with ſending his army[n] under the command of admiral Bonnivet, who paſſed the Alps about the end of Auguſt or the beginning of September. About the ſame time the emperor aſſembled his army in Spain, the Landſquenets arrived in Franche Comté, and the Engliſh landed at Calais, to act in Picardy in conjunction with the Flemings. It will be abſolutely neceſſary briefly to relate what paſſed during this campaign in thoſe four ſeveral places.

The caſtle of Milan, where Lautrec had left a garriſon, ſurrendered the 4th of April. So the French had no place of importance in the Milaneſe, except the caſtle of Cremona, which too was ſo cloſely blocked up, that there was no likelihood of its holding out long. On the other hand as France could expect no farther aſſiſtance from the Venetians, and as all the reſt of Italy was joined in a league againſt her, Proſper Colonna who commanded in Milan did not doubt that the king would deſiſt from his deſign in carrying war in the Milaneſe. For that reaſon, he had neglected to repair the fortifications of the capital city which were in an ill ſtate, the ramparts being fallen down in ſeveral places. However upon advice that admiral Bonnivet was going to paſs the Alps, he drew together all his forces to try to defend the paſſage of the Teſin; but he came too late. The French had made ſuch ſpeed, that he was forced to retire to Milan, in the utmoſt diſorder. Nay, he reſolved to abandon that city, if, by an unaccountable negligence, they had not given him ſome days time to repair the works. He had but fifteen thouſand men, with which he could not expect to defend againſt an army of above forty thouſand, ſo large a city, which alſo was open in ſeveral places. However, as he had learnt by long experience, that it muſt not always be thought the enemies will do what is moſt for their advantage, he never ceaſed repairing the places which wanted it moſt, deeming he could but withdraw at laſt in caſe the French were as expeditious as they ought to have been. If Bonnivet had marched directly to Milan, he would have found the gates open. But after taking Novarra and Vigerano, and paſſing the Teſin without oppoſition, he prepoſterouſly imagined a few days more or leſs would ſignify nothing. So having loſt to no purpoſe four or five days, he gave the emperor's general time to put Milan in a poſture of defence[o]. At laſt, approaching the city, when it was too late, he found it incapable of being attacked by the good management of Colonna. Whereupon he reſolved to encamp at Chiaravalla, in hopes of cutting off the proviſions of Milan, and of having the imperialiſts at his mercy. But he took his meaſures ſo ill, that after perſiſting in his deſigns till the end of November, he was forced himſelf to remove from Milan for want of proviſions. All he did during that time was to relieve the caſtle of Cremona, reduced to the laſt extremities[p]. Such was the ſucceſs of Bonnivet's campaign, which might have been more glorious for him, and more advantageous for the king his maſter, had he taken juſter meaſures and improved his ſuperiority. Colonna died ſhortly after, and Lanoy, viceroy of Naples, took the command of the imperial army. The ſeaſon was ſo far advanced, that nothing remarkable paſſed in thoſe parts till the end of the year, when the duke of Bourbon came and took the command of the emperor's troops, not without Lanoy's great diſguſt, who unwillingly reſigned his poſt to a foreigner.

The allies, as I ſaid, were reſolved not to invade France till September, becauſe it was to be preſumed, the king would then be employed in Italy. For this reaſon it was the beginning of that month before the emperor aſſembled his army in Spain. Lautrec, who commanded in Guienna, hearing the Spaniards were drawing together, haſtened to the frontiers, to provide for the defence of Bayonne and Fontarabia, which were moſt expoſed. Frauget, an officer of note, was governor of Fontarabia, having been left there the laſt year by marſhal de Chabanes. Lautrec, relying upon Frauget's bravery and experience, left him in the ſame poſt, after having reinforced the garriſon, and laid in ſome ammunition. After that, he did not queſtion the place would be able to maintain a long ſiege. Theſe precautions being taken with regard to Fontarabia, he repaired to Bayonne. He was no ſooner arrived, than the Spaniſh army appeared before the walls, ſupported by a fleet, which threw the inhabitants into great conſternation, the town being weak towards the ſea. But Lautrec ſo managed it, that the Spaniards were diſappointed, though they had expected to carry the place without oppoſition. Perceiving therefore, that the ſiege would employ them too long, they ſuddenly raiſed it, and inveſted Fontarabia, which was baſely ſurrendered by Frauget, in a very few days[q]. He was like to have loſt his head for a fault of that conſequence. But though he preſerved his life, he ſaved not his honour being publicly degraded.

The emperor was not ſo ſucceſsful in Burgundy and Champagne. Lamothe of Noyers, the duke of Bourbon's officer, was gone ſome time ſince into Germany, to conduct into Burgundy, count de Furſtemberg, who with ſeven or eight thouſand Landſquenets, was to join there the duke of Bourbon. Though this project ſeemed to be fruſtrated by the duke's flight, count de Furſtemberg however entered Champagne with his army. He immediately took Coiffy and Monteclair, ſmall places, which made no great reſiſtance But the duke of Guiſe, who commanded in that province, knowing Furſtemberg had no cavalry, aſſembled all the nobles of the country, and forming ſome ſquadrons, cloſely followed the Germans. Furſtemberg finding himſelf too weak in the heart of the enemy's country, and having no horſe to oppoſe thoſe of the duke of Guiſe, reſolved to retire into Lorrain. He could not however make his retreat without receiving a terrible check near Neufchatel, where the duke of Guiſe defeated the beſt part of his troops.

Whilſt the war was carrying on in Italy, Bearn, and Campagne, Henry embarked his troops under the command of the duke of Suffolk[r], who landing at Calais, joined the count de Bure, the 20th of September. Theſe two bodies made together an army of twenty-five, or thirty thouſand foot, and about ſix thouſand horſe. The duke de la Trimouille, who commanded in that country, was ſo inferior in number of troops, that he durſt not keep the field. All he could do was to throw ſuccours into the places moſt expoſed, and ſpeedily inform the king what paſſed in thoſe parts. Francis I. being then at Lyons, was extremely embarraſſed to withſtand ſo many unexpected invaſions. It is ſaid, that deceived by falſe advices from England, he had been in hopes Picardy for this year would be unmoleſted, and yet he ſaw it was there his enemies intended to make their greateſt effort. In this perplexity, he immediately diſpatched the duke of Vendôme, with all the troops he could aſſemble, both to defend Picardy, and ſecure Paris, where he did not queſtion the alarm was very great. Indeed, the duke of Suffolk, and the count de Bure paſſing by Terouenne, Heſdin and Dourlens, had taken Roy and Montdidier, and were advanced as far as Corbie. But the news of the duke of Vendôme's march cauſing them to be more circumſpect, they thought proper to proceed no farther, and the rather becauſe the ſeaſon began to be very incommodious and they were afraid of being engaged between the dukes of Vendôme and la Trimouille. Theſe conſiderations induced them to think of retreating. In their return, they became maſters of Bouchain, the governor whereof brought him the keys, though they had no thoughts of attacking the place. Then leaving an Engliſh garriſon in Bouchin, they retired into Artois. But preſently after the French recovered that town. Thus the progreſs of the confederate army was not ſo great as Francis had reaſon to fear. Had the army taken the field ſooner, he would have been greatly embarraſſed. But as I ſaid, the hopes the emperor and the king of England had conceived of the duke of Bourbon's undertaking, was the cauſe of their not beginning the campaign in any place, till about the end of September.

When Adrian VI. came into the league, he had no deſign to ruin France, in order to compel Francis to wage war with the Turks, but he had been told, it would be a certain means to oblige that prince to conſent to that truce. Mean while, without the pope's knowing any thing of it, the emperor and Henry had combined to invade France, and divide it between them. Probably, if he had lived to the end of this year, he would have ſeen that their deſigns did not correſpond with his, but he died about ſix weeks after ſigning the league againſt France. He was a good man of a character very different from thoſe of his predeceſſors. Inſtead of thinking to enlarge the eccleſiaſtical ſtate by unjuſt confiſcations, he had given the duke of Urbino the inveſtiture of his duchy. He had done the ſame by the duke of Ferrara, knowing that the former popes had quarrelled with theſe princes only to gratify their deſire of enriching their own relations. He would have even reſtored Modena and Reggio to the duke of Ferrara, if the clamours of his council, who could not underſtand that juſtice ought to be the foundation of policy, had not prevented him. He thought likewiſe of reforming the court of Rome, but death ſuffered him not to execute his deſign. All theſe proceedings, ſo remote from thoſe of his immediate predeceſſors, who has uſed the courtiers and people of Italy to ſee the popes purſue the looſe maxims of temporal princes, cauſed it to be ſaid, that he was indeed an honeſt man and a good chriſtian, but an indifferent pope. Accordingly the Italian writers ſpeak of Adrian VI. in terms importing no great eſteem for him.

The beginning of this year, cardinal Julio de Medici, who retired to Florence upon the death of Leo X. returned to Rome, and was very civilly received. In a ſhort time, he gained the good will of the pope to ſuch a degree, that he ſupplanted the cardinal of Volterra, the prime miniſter, and cauſed him to be committed to the caſtle of St. Angelo. From thence forward he had the ſole management of the pope's affairs, gaining more and more his eſteem, by putting on the devout, and expreſſing a great zeal to unite all chriſtian princes againſt the Turks. By this artifice he led him to publiſh a bull for a triennial truce, and at length to ſign the league againſt France. A miniſter like this was, doubtleſs, too politic for ſuch a pope. Adrian VI. died the 14th of September, at the very time the armies began to take the field. Had he lived any longer, he would without doubt have perceived, the league he had imprudently engaged in, was by no means proper to procure the union, he ſo much deſired among the chriſtian princes.

Cardinal Wolſey having notice of the pope's death, writ to the king to inform him of it, deſiring his aſſiſtance and protection[s]. The next day he writ to him again, praying him to recommend him to the emperor, by a letter under his own hand. He flattered himſelf that the emperor would have a grateful ſenſe of his late ſervice, in cauſing the king his maſter to declare againſt France, and would now at leaſt keep his word with him, ſince he had no preceptor to be elected, as in the former conclave. But if the Italian hiſtorians are to be credited, the emperor little thought of procuring him the papacy, and the conclave much leſs, who met preſently after Adrian's deceaſe. Of the thirty-nine cardinals which were in the conclave, Julio de Medici had fifteen or ſixteen at his devotion, beſides three who had promiſed not to be againſt him, if he was like to ſucceed in the conclave; ſo that he had only ſeven or eight to gain, in order to have two-thirds of the voices. But this was not eaſy. Cardinal Colonna, his adverſary, was at the head of a much more numerous party, who would have infallibly carried it, if the cardinals of that faction could have as readily united in chuſing a pope, as in preventing the election of Julio. This made the conclave hold fifty days. As for Wolſey, if he had any cardinals for him, they could not be many, ſince he had againſt him the French party, and the emperor's adherents were the ſame with thoſe of Julio de Medici. In ſhort, Colonna's faction not agreeing upon the choice of a pope, becauſe the head would have one elected who was not liked by his friends, his indignation at their obſtinacy cauſed him to be reconciled with the cardinal de Medici. Guicciardini ſays, Julio gave him a promiſe under his hand to make him his vice chancellor and preſent him with his palace, one of the moſt magnificent in Rome. Be this as it will, Colonna giving him ſeven or eight votes which were at his diſpoſal, there was no farther obſtacle to his election. It being reported in the conclave, that the cardinal de Medici would be elected the next ſcrutiny, moſt of the cardinals ſtayed not till day appeared, but went and made their court to the perſon who was ſoon to be their maſter. Their example drew in the reſt, who finding it not in their power to hinder the election, were willing alſo to ſhew they freely concurred. So, that very night, between the 18th and 19th of November, all the cardinals went and paid obeiſance to the new pope, and the next morning his election was confirmed by a ſolemn ſcrutiny, wherein he had all the voices. Thus it is that the holy ghoſt influences the cardinals in the choice of a pope, who, contrary to their intention, was to be the cauſe of the deepeſt wound the church of Rome had ever received. The new pope aſſumed the name of Clement VII. on account of St. Clement's day, which was very ſhortly to be ſolemnized. He was natural ſon of Julian de Medici, uncle to Leo X. But this defect of birth, though contrary to the canons, was not conſidered. Leo X. who made him cardinal in the beginning of his pontificate, took care to have it legally atteſted, that Julian promiſed his mother marriage. So, taking for granted, that a bare promiſe was equivalent to a marriage, he declared Julio legitimate. Alexander VI. took the ſame courſe when he made Cæſar Borgio, his baſtard ſon, cardinal. He produced witneſſes who depoſed, that Cæſar was born of a married woman, whence it was inferred, the child was to be deemed the huſband's ſon. In this manner did the vicars of Jeſus Chriſt abuſe laws divine and human to gratify their paſſions.

The news of Clement's election was a great mortification to Wolſey, who, after the promotion of Adrian VI. had expected to be pope upon the firſt vacancy. He muſt have been extremely incenſed with the emperor, who had twice deceived him. So it may be aſſured, conſidering his vindictive temper, he reſolved from that moment to be revenged. But as he could not execute this reſolution without his maſter's aſſiſtance, he was to take care not to diſcover that he acted from a motive of revenge; otherwiſe he would have run the hazard of being diſappointed. He concealed therefore, under the maſk of a feigned moderation, the reſentment he harboured in his breaſt, and contented himſelf with telling the king, that ſeveral had voted for him in conclave, but his abſence had turned to his prejudice, and the ſituation of the affairs of Italy cauſed the cardinals to chuſe Julio de Medici. A few days after, the king's embaſſador at Rome had orders to notify to the new pope, the king's and Wolſey's joy at his promotion[t]. At the ſame time, Wolſey deſired the continuance of his legateſhip, affirming, that by reaſon of the king's prerogative, it was not worth to him a thouſand ducates a year. Clement VII. was entirely of the emperor's party, and knowing of what conſequence the king of England's aſſiſtance was at the preſent juncture of affairs in Europe, gladly embraced the opportunity to gratify cardinal Wolſey, and make him his friend, by whoſe means he might gain the favour of the king his maſter. In this diſpoſition he granted the cardinal more than he deſired. By a bull of the 9th of January, 1524, he gave him the legantine power for life. This is the firſt, and perhaps the only inſtance of a perpetual legateſhip.

Wolſey was now raiſed to the higheſt point of grandeur that a ſubject can aſpire to. He was archbiſhop of York, biſhop of Durham, abbot of St. Albans, cardinal legate a latere for life, lord chancellor of England, prime miniſter and favourite, careſſed by the emperor, reſpected by the pope, regarded by all the princes of Europe, with almoſt an abſolute power in England, where nothing material was tranſacted, either in ſpirituals or temporals, but by his ſole direction. It is eaſy to ſee, ſo many advantages were but too capable of rendering him proud and inſolent. He looked upon the king's ſubjects as ſlaves, and unfortunately for them, inſpired the king by degrees with the ſame principles, and inſinuated to him, that he ought to conſider the parliament only as an inſtrument to execute his will. Theſe inſinuations were but too effectual, as will be ſeen in the ſequel. In order, to render him independent of the parliament. he perſuaded him to exact from his ſubjects[u] at once, the ſubſidy given by parliament, and payable in four years. Every one aſcribed to the cardinal this illegal proceeding, which eſtabliſhed a very dangerous preſident. But he little regarded the complaints of the people, ſince he was ſecure of the king's countenance, and the pope's protection.

He undertook this year a thing he would never have ventured upon, had he not been fully ſatisfied, that the pope could not be without the king's aſſiſtance. And that was, to cauſe ſeveral religious houſes to be ſuppreſſed, in order to appropriate the revenues to two colleges, which he intended to found at Oxford and Ipſwich. If the pope had reaped any advantage, his conſent would have been very ſtrange. But that he ſhould agree to the ſuppreſſion of ſeveral monaſteries, to gratify a private perſon, is what could hardly be expected, and perhaps had never happened. Accordingly, the pope would never have granted it, had not the ſatisfying the paſſion of this ambitious miniſter been abſolutely neceſſary to his deſigns. The cardinal's project was to found a magnificent college at Oxford, by the name of Cardinal College, which was to conſiſt of one hundred and eighty-ſix perſons, with ſalaries. The other college was to be founded at Ipſwich, the place of his birth, but only for grammar, and to qualify young ſcholars for his college at Oxford. But as theſe projects were not accompliſhed this year, I ſhall ſpeak of them on another occaſion, and cloſe the year 1523, with an account of what paſſed in Scotland, where affairs were no more undiſturbed than elſewhere.

Henry being engaged in a war with France, juſtly dreaded the diverſion the Scots might make on the frontiers. On the other hand, the king of Scotland's minority frequently tempted him to become maſter of that kingdom, after the example of Edward III. his predeceſſor, who diſpoſſeſſed the king his nephew at a like juncture. The factions in Scotland increaſing his hopes, he never ceaſed to foment them by means of his adherents, who were very numerous, becauſe he had wherewithal to give penſions. He uſed for pretence his being obliged by nature to take care of the king his nephew's concerns, who was not of age to diſtinguiſh what was advantageous from what was prejudicial. So, as an affectionate uncle, he did his endeavour to remove the duke of Albany, under colour there was danger of that prince's ſeizing the crown. He knew he ſhould never accompliſh his deſigns ſo long as Scotland was guarded by ſuch an Argus. The queen his ſiſter had made him very uneaſy in joining with the regent, becauſe he was thereby deprived of all pretence of ſaying the king was in danger. Indeed, it was not likely, as the parliament of Scotland wiſely intimated in their anſwer, that the queen ſhould join with the regent to deſtroy the king her ſon. Henry, however, to give ſome colour to the accuſation, was pleaſed to ſuppoſe, the queen his ſiſter deſigned to marry the duke of Albany. But finding at laſt, this ſuppoſition had not the deſired effect, he had recourſe to another expedient, which was, to gain his ſiſter by promiſing to procure her the regency. That done he preſſed yet more earneſtly the parliament of Scotland to remove the duke of Albany, and confer the regency on the queen. But, to render his aſſiſtance more effectual, he reſolved to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to hinder the duke's return into Scotland. To that end, he ſent out a fleet to take him in his paſſage[w]. At the ſame time he ordered the earl of Surrey to march into Scotland[x], to ſhew the Scots what they were to expect in caſe they did not give him ſpeedy ſatisfaction. The Scots being without a leader, and unprepared againſt this invaſion, ſuſtained great damage during the campaign. The earl of Surrey took Jedworth, and carried fire and ſword into the country[y], without meeting any oppoſition. Mean while, Henry's adherents ceaſed not to cry, that a peace muſt be made with England, ſince it was the only way to ſave Scotland from utter deſtruction. Henry ſupported them by offering to the king his nephew his only daughter Mary in marriage, and magnifying the advantages the Scots would receive from the alliance. But withal he required of them that they ſhould break all the engagements with France. It was, however, very unlikely he ſhould ſeriouſly think of giving his daughter to the king of Scotland, ſince ſhe was affianced to the emperor, and he ſtrictly united with that prince. Beſides, ſuch a marriage would have been of no advantage to himſelf or the nation. To this the oppoſite party replied, the king of England ſought to diſengage Scotland from France, only the more eaſily to ruin the kingdom, and that to make an alliance with England by abandoning France, was the ready way to be ſlaves to the Engliſh; that this was not the firſt time the kings of England, by ſuch marriages, had attempted to become maſters in Scotland, and the worſt was to be feared from neighbours who had ever aſpired to the poſſeſſion of all Great-Britain. In a word, the deſtroying with fire and ſword a country whoſe friendſhip was courted, was a ſtrange way of deſiring an alliance, and propoſing a marriage. All theſe reaſons were anſwered by the other party. But it tended only ſo to increaſe diſorder and confuſion among the Scots, that it was impracticable for them to come to any reſolution. Mean while, Henry, who only intended to terrify them, by making them feel the effects of his arms, ordered the earl of Surrey to quit Scotland, and return into England. But he had ſcarce ſent his men into winter quarters, when the Scots made inroads on the borders of England, which obliged him to march a ſecond time into Scotland, where he became maſter of Jedburrough.

Mean time, the duke of Albany hearing what paſſed in Scotland, burned with deſire to repair thither, to appeaſe by his preſence the troubles cauſed by the king of England's adherents, and to ſtrengthen the French party which was in danger of being ſurmounted by the other. Francis I. had granted him an aid of three thouſand foot, and two hundred men at arms, to enable him to make diverſion upon Henry. But it was not poſſible to tranſport thoſe troops into Scotland, whilſt the Engliſh fleet kept the ſea to hinder their paſſage. Policy therefore was to be recurred to. For that purpoſe, he feigned to deſiſt from his deſign of going into Scotland, and ſent his troops into quarters remote from the coaſt, with orders however to be ready to march upon the firſt notice. The tranſport ſhips were likewiſe ſent away to certain ports, from whence they were ordered to ſail to the appointed rendezvous, the moment they heard from the duke. This ſtratagem deceived the Engliſh admiral, who being informed by his ſpies, that the duke of Albany was returned to court, and had diſmiſſed his troops and vaſſals, thought there was nothing more to fear this year, and ſo returned with the fleet into England. The duke was no ſooner informed of it, but he aſſembled his troops and ſhips, and embarking about the middle of September, arrived in Scotland the 24th[z], the ſame day the earl of Surrey became maſter of Jedburrough.

The regent's arrival revived the courage of the French party, who began to be greatly diſmayed, and drew from the king of England ſeveral perſons who had only favoured him out of fear. Some time after, the regent ſummoned the nobility of Edinburgh, and endeavoured to convince them that the kingdom would be in great danger, unleſs the king of England's deſigns were timely and vigorouſly oppoſed. But all his eloquence was not capaple of cauſing a change of opinion in thoſe who preferred Henry's penſions to all the arguments that could be alledged. However, he aſſembled an army, and advanced towards the borders, where he arrived the 22d of October. But when he came to march into England, he met with the ſame obſtacles that had ſtopped him the laſt year. That is, the generals, and officers of the Engliſh party refuſed to follow him, maintaining it was manifeſtly againſt the intereſt of Scotland to provoke the Engliſh, and therefore it was ſufficient to be upon the defenſive. They added, if the deſign was to ſerve France, it could not be done better than by keeping an army on the frontiers, which would oblige the Engliſh to have the like in thoſe parts. But in the preſent circumſtances of Scotland, it was too much to hazard a battle, the loſs whereof would prove the ruin of the kingdom. In ſhort, the regent ſeeing it was in vain to perſuade them to follow him, ordered Werk caſtle to be aſſaulted by the French troops; but they were vigorouſly repulſed. Mean while, upon notice of the earl of Surrey's approach at the head of a numerous army [a], he did not think proper to expect him, but choſe to retire. Indeed, it would have been too dangerous to give battle with an army wherein the Engliſh had ſo many favourers. The ſeaſon being no longer proper for one or other to keep the field [b], the earl of Surrey, content with having ſtopped the Scots, ſent his troops into winter quarters, and the regent followed his example.

Whilſt the flames of war were kindled in almoſt all parts of Europe, the reformation made great progreſs in Germany, and began even to ſpread in Switzerland, France, and England. In the beginning of this year the canton of Zurick, moved by the preaching of Zuinglius, renounced divers articles of religion they had hitherto profeſſed, though Zuinglius and Luther differed about the euchariſt [c]. Many likewiſe in France and England began to diſlike a religion, that ſeemed to be founded more upon the pope than upon Jeſus Chriſt. Adrian VI. hearing of the daily progreſs of Luther's doctrine in Germany, diſpatched a nuntio to the diet of Nuremberg, to exhort the German princes to deſtroy Luther and his followers. He confeſſed, however, in a letter to them upon the ſame ſubject, that many abuſes and diſorders were crept into the church [d], throwing the blame upon thoſe who had governed before him. But he ſaid to reform all at once, would be the way to ſpoil all, and therefore it was neceſſary to proceed by degrees in this reformation. Luther having ſeen the letter, publiſhed it in Germany, with notes of his own, wherein he ſaid, among other things, that the degrees the pope mentioned were ſo large, that there was an hundred years interval between each of them. On the other hand, the diet taking advantage of the pope's confeſſion, demanded a free council in Germany, where every one ſhould be obliged upon oath to ſpeak his real opinion, and that numberleſs abuſes, under which Germany had ſo long groaned, ſhould be reformed.

Mean while, Luther ſtill continued to write in defence of his doctrine. Among other things he publiſhed an anſwer to the king of England's book, wherein he uſed no ceremony. This behaviour obliged Henry to complain of him to the princes of the houſe of Saxony. At the ſame time he exhorted them to hinder the publication of Luther's German bible, for fear the tranſlation ſhould be prejudicial to truth. But his letter had no great effect.

The progreſs of the reformation was not yet conſiderable enough to be regarded by the chief ſovereigns of Europe, whoſe thoughts were wholly intent upon war. Clement VII. refuſed to renew the league, though himſelf had engaged his predeceſſors in it, and declared he would ſtand neuter. This declaration at firſt extremely embarraſſed the duke of Bourbon, becauſe the emperor not having provided for the payment of his troops, it was not poſſible for the duke to ſatisfy them, ſince the pope and the Florentines withdrew their uſual ſupplies. He found means, however, to draw ſome money from the inhabitants of Milan; and at laſt perſuaded the pope to give him twenty thouſand ducats, and cauſe the Florentines to furniſh him with fifty thouſand, on condition of ſecrecy.

Not long after, the duke of Bourbon receiving a ſupply of ſix thouſand Landſquenets, and the Venetian army under the command of the duke of Urbino joining him, he took the field with thirty-five thouſand men. Mean while Bonnivet was greatly embarraſſed. He had not above twenty thouſand men, having loſt the reſt of his army by death or deſertion during the laſt campaign. But what was worſe, he had no money to pay his troops. This was a misfortune common to both ſides. It is true he expected ten thouſand Switzers, and five thouſand Griſons, but foreſaw they would be of little ſervice, becauſe he had not wherewithal to content them at their arrival. This made him reſolve to go in queſt of the imperialiſts, and give them battle. But as they were informed of his condition, they determined to avoid it, though they were ſuperior in number, in the expectation of diſperſing his army without an engagement. And indeed, the five thouſand Griſons who were coming to join the admiral, and were advanced as far as Bergamo, not receiving the money promiſed them, immediately returned. As for the ten thouſand Switzers, they arrived indeed at Jurea, and even advanced to the banks of the Seſia; but it was not poſſible to perſuade them to continue their march for want of money to pay them. Mean while, the imperialiſts became maſters of ſeveral towns, which very much annoyed the French camp, and at laſt forced the admiral to retire to Novarra. In the mean time, the caſtle of Cremona, which the French had hitherto kept, ſurrendered to the imperialiſts.

Bonnivet, finding that the Griſons were returned, that the Switzers would not ſtir without being ſecure of their pay, and that his men deſerted in great numbers, reſolved at laſt to repaſs the Alps. As ſoon as the duke of Bourbon had notice of his march, he purſued him with all ſpeed, to compel him to battle. There were even between the two armies ſeveral ſharp ſkirmiſhes, in one of which the brave Bayard was ſlain. But notwithſtanding all the efforts of the imperialiſts, Bonnivet retreated in good order. When the French had repaſſed the mountains, the places they ſtill had in the Milaneſe ſurrendered by capitulation to the imperialiſts.

The French were no ſooner out of Italy, but the emperor and the king of England thought of means to invade Francis in his own kingdom. They had expected great matters from the duke of Bourbon's revolt, but hitherto it was not poſſible to make any uſe of it, becauſe the conſpiracy was diſcovered too ſoon. The affairs of Italy having proſpered beyond expectation, they reſolved to make uſe of the duke of Bourbon to carry war into France, imagining, if he could have ſome conſiderable advantage, he would cauſe part of the kingdom to rebel. The duke himſelf fed them with theſe hopes, becauſe that was the thing which rendered him conſiderable. He would have been glad to act in ſome place near his own territories from whence he expected great ſupplies. But it was thought more proper that he ſhould enter Provence with an army, by reaſon he could eaſily be aſſiſted by the Spaniſh fleet, which kept at Genoa; whereas, by engaging in the middle of the kingdom, the fleet would be of no ſervice. This reſolution being taken, Henry readily promiſed to find the duke a hundred [e] thouſand crowns a month, on condition that after the firſt month, he ſhould be free to diſcontinue the payment, provided he acted himſelf in Picardy at the head of a royal army, from the firſt of July to end of December.

Though the emperor had put the duke of Bourbon in hopes he would lend him all his army in Italy for his expedition into Provence, he could not however diſpenſe with leaving a good part at Milan, and other places of that duchy, under the command of Lanoy, vicero of Naples. On the other hand, the Venetians withdrew their troops, becauſe they had promiſed by their private treaty only to defend the Milaneſe. So, the duke of Bourbon began his march the 24th of June much weaker than he expected [f], and entered Provence the ſecond of July. He preſently became maſter of Aix, and ſome other places, and at laſt came before Marſeilles, the taking whereof was the chief end of his expedition. But a few days before, Renzo de Ceri, an Italian captain in the French ſervice, had entered with a ſtrong garriſon. Whereupon the duke found he ſhould meet with more reſiſtance than he imagined, but, however, he opened the ſiege.

Mean while Francis I. having intelligence of Bourbon's march, ordered his forces to be aſſembled, and ſome troops ſent to Avignon, for fear the enemy ſhould ſeize it. There he reſolved to aſſemble his army, and came himſelf to command in perſon. It is needleſs to ſpeak either of the ſiege of Marſeilles, or of the king's great diligence in aſſembling his troops. It ſuffices to ſay, that the very day he departed from Avignon, in order to fight the imperialiſts, namely, the 10th of September, the duke of Bourbon raiſed the ſiege

The duke of Bourbon's retreat entirely changed the face of affairs. Francis I. who had been in danger of loſing Provence, ſaw himſelf at the head of above forty thouſand men, ready to be employed in any important undertaking. So, perceiving that the imperialiſts took a great compaſs to retire into Italy, he reſolved to improve that advantage, and the ſuperiority of his army, to recover the Milaneſe. This reſolution being taken, he began his march, and tried to reach Milan before them. On the other hand, the duke of Bourbon having notice that the king was taking the ſhorteſt road to Milan, made incredible ſpeed not to be prevented, perceiving that thereon would depend the preſervation of the duchy. Thus the two armies marching by different routs, arrived the ſame day, one at Albe, the other at Vercelli. A few days after, the duke of Bourbon joined the viceroy of Naples at Pavia.

Whilſt the imperial army was in Provence, the court of England was otherwiſe diſpoſed than before, and ſeemed to intend to follow new maxims. Henry made no diverſion in Picardy, though he had paid but one month of the ſubſidy he was to give the duke of Bourbon. This was ſufficient to create ſuſpicion in the emperor, which were confirmed by Henry's unſeaſonable demand of the money lent him at his departure from England[g]. He could not believe, Henry would demand his money at ſo improper a time, inſtead of performing his own engagements, unleſs he intended to ſeek an occaſion of quarrel. His uneaſineſs ſtill increaſed upon advice from his embaſſador in England, that a perſon[h] was come from France to London from the ducheſs of Angoulême, regent of that kingdom, and had long and frequent conferences with cardinal Wolſey. All this, added to the cardinal's revengeful temper, whom he had vainly amuſed with hopes of the papacy, made him juſtly apprehenſive that the king of England was thinking to abandon him and join with his enemy. However, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, there was no other meaſure to take, ſince all depended on the ſucceſs of the war which was going to be renewed in Italy, where his generals were not a little embarraſſed.

As ſoon as the duke of Bourbon and the viceroy of Naples were joined, they conſulted upon what was to be done at ſo ill a juncture. At firſt they reſolved to leave ſtrong garriſons in Pavia and Alexandria, and take refuge in Milan. But the plague had made ſuch ravage in that city, every thing there was in ſo great confuſion, and money and proviſions ſo ſcarce, that they were forced to deſiſt from their deſign and abandon Milan. So, having well ſtored Pavia and Alexandria, they withdrew to Soncino, where Franceſco Sforza alſo repaired with them.

Mean while, Francis I. continuing his march towards Milan, and hearing the imperialiſts were retired, cauſed his troops to enter the city, and ordered the caſtle to be inveſted. If, inſtead of going to Milan, he had marched directly to the imperialiſts, who were little able to withſtand him, he would have infallibly diſperſed them. But Bonnivet's unfortunate advice induced him not only to march to Milan, which muſt have fallen into his hands if he had defeated or routed the imperialiſts, but alſo to reſolve to beſiege Pavia. When he appeared before that place, the generals of the imperialiſts began to take courage, in expectation that the length of the ſiege and the winter ſeaſon would afford them time to take ſome meaſures. Mean while, they ſpeedily ſent for a ſupply of ten thouſand Germans. The pope, the Venatians, and the Florentines, failing them all at once upon the French king's coming into Italy, their only refuge was the length of the ſiege of Pavia which began in November.

Clement VII. who in the late pontificate, had openly declared againſt the king of France, being in great perplexity, ſent a nuntio to the two armies to procure a truce; but not ſucceeding, he made his peace with the king of France. Moreover, he propoſed to him the conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples, and concluded with him a private treaty, promiſing free paſſage to the French troops.

Preſently after, Francis detached five or ſix thouſand men, under the command of the duke of Albany, who had left Scotland the beginning of the ſpring, with orders to march towards Naples. As they were neceſſarily to paſs through the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, Clement VII. pretended for ſome time to oppoſe it, to make believe it was againſt his will. When the French were in the middle of his dominions, he publiſhed his agreement with the king of France, as if newly made, and ſent the emperor notice, excuſing himſelf on the neceſſity and conſtraint he was under. Though the emperor was very flegmatic, he could not help ſhewing, on this occaſion, an extreme reſentment againſt the pope. He ſaid, it was ſolely at the inſtance of Leo X. that he had undertaken the defence of Italy: that Clement himſelf had preſſed Adrian VI. to ſign the league, and now he was become pope, forſook him in his greateſt need, and left him to proſecute alone a war kindled by himſelf: that however he hoped to come off with honour, and to the confuſion of thoſe who ſo baſely deſerted him. The event ſhewed however, the pope had done him ſignal ſervices, in perſuading his enemy to carry war into the kingdom of Naples, ſince he thereby cauſed him to divide his forces. But it is uncertain whether the pope had any ſuch intention.

Another accident farther contributed to deprive Francis of his great ſuperiority over his enemies. Renzo de Ceri, who defended Marſeilles, having received the king's orders to embark ten thouſand men on the gallies, and join the duke of Albany, who expected him in Tuſcany, took Savona in his way. This ſucceſs, which ſeemed very advantageous for Francis, turned to his real misfortune, as it put him upon ſending a freſh detachment to Savona, under the conduct of the marquis of Saluzzo, to take againſt Genoa what advantages ſhould offer. The two detachments for Naples and Savona[i], ſo weakened the French army, that the imperialiſt no longer feared to take the field, in order to prolong the ſiege of Pavia, till the arrival of the German ſuccours, which the duke of Bourbon himſelf was gone to haſten. And indeed, within a few days Peſcarra became maſter of Caſſano, a poſt very convenient for his purpoſe. With this event ended the year 1524. But before I proceed to the next, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention what had paſſed this year in Scotland.

The duke of Albany returning into France in May, the queen dowager and the earl of Arran of the houſe of Hamilton, adviſed the young king, who was between thirteen and fourteen years old, to aſſume himſelf the reins of the government. This advice was very intereſted, but James was too young to perceive it. He followed it, and ſummoned the ſtates, declared the authority of the regent was ended, and for the future all orders were to be received from the king himſelf. After that, the queen and the earl of Arran governed in the king's name. This change was not made with univerſal approbation. The earls of Lenox and Argyle, concerned to ſee the earl of Arran in poſſeſſion of the government, under colour of the king's anticipated majority, ſent for the earl of Angus from France, to ſupport themſelves by his intereſt, becauſe he was entirely fallen out with the queen his wife. Upon that lord's arrival, they combined with him, and on pretence of freeing the king from the pretended captivity, the queen and the earl of Arran held him in, levied troops and took Sterling, after which they marched to Edinburgh, where the king was. At their approach, the queen and the earl carried the king into the caſtle, but as they had not taken care to lay in proviſions, were forced in a few days to deliver the king to the three lords, who aſſumed the title of regents. Thus the king was again put in guardianſhip under theſe three lords, who agreed to rule by turns, four months each. The earl of Angus begun, and as he was in the king of England's intereſt, ſent embaſſadors to treat of the king of Scotland's marriage with the princeſs Mary, according to Henry's own ſcheme. To facilitate this negotiation, the truce which was to expire the 1ſt of December, was prolonged to the 26th of January 1525.

As England was very quiet during the whole year 1524, the affairs of that kingdom will not take me up long. I ſhall only obſerve, that Clement VII. finding himſelf in a very ill ſituation between the emperor and the king of France, ſhewed great regard for the court of England, whoſe aſſiſtance, he thought, he might want. To that purpoſe, he confirmed the king's title of defender of the faith, conferred on him by Leo X.[k], and to pleaſe cardinal Wolſey, ſuppreſſed St. Frideſwid's priory in Oxford, on the ground whereof the cardinal intended to build his college, and appropriated the revenues to the new foundation. But as this was not ſufficient for the maintenance of the college, the cardinal procured powers to viſit all the religious houſes, notwithſtanding their immunities, and particularly thoſe of the Franciſcans, who pretended to be exempted. This was to make a certain liſt of ſuch as might be ſuppreſſed, in order to tranſfer the revenues to his colleges. The bull which gave him theſe powers, was dated the 21ſt of Auguſt. On the 11th of September following, the pope granted him another bull, empowering him to ſuppreſs as many monaſteries as he pleaſed, to the value of three thouſand ducats a year for the ſame uſe [l].

In the beginning of December, cardinal Laurentius Campejus, who had been the pope's legate in Germany, was made biſhop of Saliſbury with the king's conſent. We muſt now return to the ſiege of Pavia, to behold an event which made a very great alteration in the affairs of Europe, wherein England was deeply concerned [m].

[1525] Francis I. ſtill perſiſted in the ſiege, though without making much progreſs, becauſe of the rigour of the ſeaſon, and the imperial army, which being poſted at Caſſano, annoyed his convoys very much. Beſides he had made three detachments, one to beſiege the caſtle of Milan, another for Naples, and a third for Savona. On the other hand, the duke of Bourbon came from Germany about the end of January, with a ſupply of ten thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe [n], which made the imperial army two and twenty thouſand ſtrong. As the generals wanted money, and for that reaſon were not ſure of hindering the army from diſbanding, they reſolved to attempt the relief of Pavia. To that end, they began to march the 3d of February towards the town, bent to improve what opportunities ſhould offer. But as the camp of the beſiegers was ſtrongly entrenched, they waited three weeks before they executed ſo dangerous a reſolution, which might be attended with terrible conſequences. Mean while, the Griſons having recalled their ſix thouſand men in the French ſervice, and theſe troops departing, notwithſtanding all the king's endeavours to detain them [o], the duke of Bourbon thought he ſhould no longer defer attacking the enemy's camp. This reſolution was executed the even of St. Matthias [p], with a ſucceſs very fatal to Francis, ſince his army was routed, and himſelf unfortunately taken priſoner [q].

The ſucceſs of this battle filled all Europe with conſternation and dread. The emperor was without a rival, and in condition to over-run Italy with his victorious army, whilſt the king of England his ally, had it in his power to give France a mortal wound on the ſide of Picardy. Conſequently, the balance of Europe being taken away, the ſovereigns for the moſt part had great reaſon to dread falling at laſt into ſlavery. The Venetians alone, perfectly knowing the danger, propoſed to the pope a league againſt the emperor, not queſtioning the king of England would alſo join in it, becauſe it was his intereſt. This league added to the forces France could ſtill bring into the field, and the ſupplies which might be received from the Switzers by paying them well, would have been ſufficient to keep the emperor in awe, if it could have been ſpeedily concluded. But the pope preferring his own intereſt to that of Europe in general, haſtened his treaty with the viceroy of Naples, who acted in the emperor's name. By this treaty the emperor, among other things, was to give the inveſtiture of Milan to Franceſco Sforza. There were alſo three ſeparate articles concerning the pope in particular, namely, 1. That the inhabitants of the Milaneſe ſhould furniſh themſelves with ſalt from the pope's territories. 2. That the emperor ſhould compel the duke of Ferrara to reſtore to the church the town of Reggio, ſeized after Leo Xth's death. 3. That the pope ſhould have the diſpoſal of the benefices in the kingdom of Naples. By this treaty, which was of no force till ratified by the emperor, the politic viceroy found means to defer the project of league againſt the emperor, propoſed by the Venetians, and to render the other powers jealous of the pope. This was the greateſt ſervice he could poſſibly do his maſter on this occaſion.

Mean while the emperor's generals were greatly embaraſſed after ſo glorious a victory, for want of money to pay their troops. They had indeed received a hundred thouſand ducats from Florence, but that not ſufficing to pay the arrears and ſubſiſtence of the army, they were forced to diſband the beſt part of their troops, when by the treaty with the pope, they were ſure of having no league to fear. Beſides Triulzi, who was beſieging the caſtle of Milan, had now repaſſed the Alps, and the duke of Albany was only thinking of retiring into France with his army. This diſbanding of troops, would have been of very great conſequence to the emperor, whoſe intereſt it was to prevent by his moderation the meaſures which the alarmed ſtates of Italy might take againſt him, if his generals had proceeded accordingly. But proſperity cauſing them to be wanting in policy, they treated the ſtates of Italy, and eſpecially the Venetians, with a haughtineſs that gave them occaſion to think their liberty in danger, and made them reſolve to uſe all poſſible endeavours to avoid the threatened ſlavery.

The emperor could better diſſemble his ſentiments. He received the news of the victory of Pavia, and the French king's captivity, with great moderation, forbidding any demonſtrations of joy, and ſaying, Chriſtians ought to rejoice only for victories over infidels. He ſeemed to ſympathiſe with Francis's misfortune, and, as I may ſay, to put himſelf in his place, by acknowledging it be a mere chance, and no prince, how brave ſoever, exempt from the like accident. Preſently after, he called his council to debate what was to be done with the priſoner. His confeſſor, who ſpoke firſt, was for releaſing him without terms. He repreſented to him, that by ſuch a generous action, he would not only acquire immortal fame, but alſo make the king of France his real friend, who not to be outdone in generoſity, would doubtleſs ſtrive to expreſs his gratitude: that with his help, he would give law to Germany and Italy, without being obliged to demand the aſſiſtance of other inferior princes. But the duke of Alva anſwered all theſe arguments, and concluded it was beſt to reap from this victory, all the advantages it could naturally procure; and the emperor embraced his opinion. This plainly ſhews, that his pretended moderation was but a diſguiſe to hinder the princes of Europe from being alarmed, and from concerting meaſures to oppoſe the execution of his ambitious deſigns.

To continue this diſguiſe, he ſent the count of Beaurain into Italy with certain terms, on which he was willing to releaſe his priſoner. He was very ſure Francis would not accept them. But it was his intereſt to make the world believe it was not his fault that the French king was not releaſed. Wherefore, it was every where induſtriouſly reported, that the emperor had ſent the king very reaſonable terms. But great care was taken not to publiſh them. Among other things, he demanded for himſelf the duchy of Burgundy [r]. Moreover, he had a mind to join to the duke of Bourbon's territories, Provence, and Dauphiné, and erect the whole for that prince into a kingdom independent of the crown of France. Laſtly, he demanded that Francis ſhould give the king of England entire ſatisfaction, concerning what was due to him. The firſt of theſe conditions, in juſtice and equity, contained nothing ſtrange. King Lewis XI. took poſſeſſion of the duchy of Burgundy, after the death of the laſt duke, under colour of a title which was conteſted, and of which however he made himſelf judge. It could not therefore be taken ill, that the emperor ſhould demand reſtitution of what was reſted from Mary, of Burgundy, his grandmother, at leaſt, till the cauſe was legally decided. But what was ſurpriſing, and very hard in the emperor's propoſals, was, his deſire to eſtabliſh in the heart of France, an independent kingdom, to gratify a rebellious ſubject, the prime author of the king's misfortune. Probably, he inſiſted on this article only to make the firſt paſs the better, or to give occaſion for a rupture. Francis I. rejected theſe conditions with the utmoſt indignation [s], and ſwore, he would rather be a captive all his life than except them [t]. But he offered, in his turn, conditions which he thought very advantageous to the conqueror, namely, that he would marry Leonora, queen dowager of Portugal, the emperor's ſiſter, and give the duke of Bourbon his ſiſter, the ducheſs of Alençon, who had lately loſt the duke, her huſband: that he would agree to hold the duchy of Burgundy as the queen dowager's dowry, and leave it to their male heirs: that he would reſtore to the duke of Bourbon, all his confiſcated eſtates: that he would renounce all claim to Naples and Milan: that he would ſatisfy the king of England concerning what was due to him: finally, that he would pay the ſame ranſom as king John, when taken priſoner at the battle of Poictiers. But the emperor was not ſatisfied with theſe offers. He ſtill inſiſted that the duchy of Burgundy ſhould be reſtored to him without condition. Moreover, he affirmed that Francis had no right to Naples and Milan, and therefore his offer to relinquiſh it, was needleſs and chimerical.

They

It was not without reaſon that the emperor perſiſted in his demands. It is eaſy to judge the conſternation of France, after the loſs ſhe had lately ſuſtained, the king was a captive, and almoſt all her generals taken or ſlain in the battle of Papia. The kingdom being exhauſted by continual wars under this and the former reigns, was deſtitute of men and money. The Switzers were diſheartened. The canton of Zurich, which had refuſed to furniſh the king with troops for the war, was ſtill in the ſame diſpoſition from a principle of conſcience. Zinglius, who had great intereſt in that canton, perſuaded the ſenate, that to barter the blood of their citizens for money, and ſerve the ambition of princes, was an infamous thing. But though all the cantons had been equally inclined to find troops, it was well known, they would not do without being paid; and to procure the money was no eaſy thing. On the other hand, there was reaſon to fear, the king of England would improve the opportunity to invade France through Picardy, whilſt the emperor attacked the provinces bordering upon Spain. In fine, there was nothing to be expected from Italy, ſince the pope had made his peace with the emperor, it being impoſſible the Venetians would alone maintain the war for the ſake of France. Thus was ſeen on all ſides juſt cauſe of alarm. Certainly, had the emperor and Henry renewed their league, and vigorouſly attacked France, that kingdom, in its preſent ill circumſtances, muſt have been ruined. But at the time the regent, and all true Frenchmen, were under theſe apprehenſions, a ray of hope appeared, which hindered their courage from ſinking entirely. The pope and the emperor could not agree, though outwardly they ſeemed willing to unite. The Venetians were inclined to join in a league with the other ſtates to oppoſe the emperor's progreſs. In ſhort, the king of England, inſtead of taking advantage of the king of France's misfortune, generouſly took his part. On the other hand, Franceſco Sforza, ſeeing himſelf as it were the emperor's ſlave, ſtrove to throw off his yoke, and though he miſcarried, his attempt, however, produced a good effect, as it ſhewed the emperor the diſpoſition of the princes who entered into the plot, which it will be neceſſary to explain, in order to give a diſtinct idea of the affairs of thoſe times, wherein England was concerned. But firſt it muſt be ſeen what became of the captive king.

The unfortunate priſoner was kept in the caſtle of Pizzighitone till Eaſter, but with ſo much uneaſineſs on the part of the imperialiſts, that they durſt not remove their troops from that quarter, for fear of being reſcued. At laſt, Lanoy, hearing the Venetian embaſſador at Rome had frequent conferences with the pope, was afraid ſome plot was forming to deliver the priſoner. Wherefore, without imparting his deſign to the duke of Bourbon, whom perhaps he miſtruſted, he reſolved to convey him into Spain. But this was difficult, ſince he had no naval force, and the French gallies were at ſea. To remove this obſtacle, he inſinuated to the king, that the only way ſpeedily to obtain his liberty was to confer in perſon with the emperor: that as the emperor was a generous prince, and had ſhewn a concern for his misfortune, their interview could not but produce a good effect, and promote a ſpeedy peace. Francis agreed to it, full of hopes that he ſhould do more himſelf in two or three conferences with the emperor, than his miniſters in many months. He even lent the viceroy his gallies to carry him into Spain, where he arrived about the middle of June.

He flattered himſelf, he ſhould be treated in Spain as king John was in England: but at his arrival he had the mortification to be confined in the caſtle of Madrid, where the emperor, inſtead of treating with him in perſon, did not ſo much as pay him a viſit. All he could obtain was a ſafe conduct for his ſiſter, the ducheſs of Alençon, who came to Madrid in September. She was empowered by the regent her mother, to negotiate with the emperor. But at laſt ſhe was forced to return, and nothing obtained. When ſhe came to Madrid, ſhe found the king her brother, ſo ill, that his recovery was deſpaired of. As there was no room to doubt, that his grief at ſeeing his liberty ſo remote, occaſioned his illneſs, the emperor poſted from Toledo to Madrid, to viſit and comfort him, in the apprehenſion of loſing by his priſoner's death the advantages he expected from his captivity. He put him therefore in hopes of his deliverance in the two viſits he made him, though in general terms, which however produced the deſired effect, ſince the king recovered his health. But when after his recovery he would have renewed the negotiation, he quickly perceived he was farther from his deliverance than he imagined. The emperor ſtill inſiſted upon the reſtitution of Burgundy, and when the king offered to eſpouſe the princeſs Leonora, and hold that duchy as her dowry, Charles executed himſelf as having promiſed to give the queen, his ſiſter, in marriage to the duke of Bourbon. It was no ſmall mortification to Francis to ſee one of his ſubjects preferred before him. But what troubled him ſtill more was, that he ſaw it to be only a pretence to retard the concluſion of the treaty. So, in the deſpair the emperor's rigour threw him into, he gave the ducheſs of Alençon a writing under his hand, whereby he conſented, and even ordered, that the ſtates of France ſhould crown the dauphin his ſon. This in France is called the edict of Madrid. But the parliament of Paris thought not fit to record it, either becauſe it was againſt the laws of the realm, or they deemed ſuch an imperfect edict to be of no authority, ſince the king was not free. It may be, Francis thereby deſigned to let the emperor ſee, that inſtead of having a king in his power, he ran the hazard of having only a prince without dominions.

Whilſt the emperor amuſed his priſoner in Spain, he acted with no great ſincerity with the pope, who did not know what to think of his proceedings. The victorious monarch had courted him very earneſtly. But after making a treaty with him by the viceroy of Naples, he long delayed to ratify it, and at laſt had ſent his ratification without including the three ſeparate articles. He ſaid, that as to the duke of Ferrara, he could not oblige him to deliver Reggio to the pope, being a fief of the empire. As to the ſecond article, whereby the emperor was bound to oblige the inhabitants of the Milaneſe to take their ſalt of the pope's ſubjects, he ſaid that concerning only the duke of Milan, and for his part he could not promiſe for others. That for the benefices of Naples, he could not agree to that article, unleſs a limitation was added, which rendered it of no effect, namely, that what had been practiſed in the reigns of the former kings of Naples ſhould be conformed to. The pope finding the emperor refuſed to ratify theſe three articles, would not accept of the ratification, and they both remained upon the ſame terms as before the treaty. But the emperor had obtained his deſires, ſince he had obſtructed the league which was projected againſt him, in rendering the pope ſuſpected by the reſt of the ſovereigns.

There was another thing which ſhewed the emperor's inſincerity, namely, having ſent the inveſtiture of Milan to Franceſco Sforza, he clogged it with the condition that Sforza ſhall pay him twelve hundred thouſand ducats in recompenſe for the charges in keeping that duchy for him. As it was evident Sforza could not poſſibly perform this condition, it was no leſs ſo that the emperor only ſought a pretence to continue maſter of Milan. Theſe things alarmed the pope, who heard beſides, that the council of Spain was not favourable to him. And, indeed, ſome of the emperor's miniſters had adviſed him to chaſtiſe the pope for joining with France at ſo critical a juncture, and compel him to reſtore Modena to the duke of Ferrara, and Boulogna to the Bontivoglios.

On the other hand, the Venetians ſeeing there was no likelihood that the emperor really intended to reſtore Sforza, could not but be alarmed at his keeping the duchy of Milan. Wherefore, they uſed their utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the pope and the king of England to join with them and France againſt the emperor, well knowing that otherwiſe all Italy would fall under the dominion of the houſe of Auſtria. A letter of Andria Gritti their doge to cardinal Wolſey of the 31ſt of March, extant in the Collection of the Public Acts, ſhews, that theſe able politicians had formed this project ſhortly after the battle. The letter indeed is only an embaſſador's credentials, who had orders to treat with the king upon a very important affair. But at ſuch a juncture, this important affair could be only the league they were projecting.

Mean while the pope was extremely embarraſſed. In attempting attempting to manage too artfully, he made ſo many falſe ſteps, that he knew not which way to turn. This is frequently the caſe of thoſe, who quitting the great road walk through by-ways. Clement VII. could not reſolve either to be ſatisfied with the emperor's offers, or enter into a league againſt him. In this uncertainty he choſe to follow the example of Leo X. and Julius II. his predeceſſors, that is, to treat with the emperor and his enemies, at the ſame time, in order to be determined by the events in what would be moſt advantageous. To that end, whilſt he was treating at Rome with the Venetians, he ſent cardinal Salviati to Spain, to negotiate with the emperor, putting into his hands a diſpenſation, deſired by that monarch, to marry his niece Iſabella of Portugal. But the diſpenſation was not to be delivered to the emperor till after the concluſion of the treaty.

The affairs of Italy being in this ſituation, another accident happened, which plainly ſhewed the emperor only ſought to amuſe all the ſovereigns by a feigned moderation, whilſt in truth he was ſolely thinking of extending his dominions. His league with Adrian VI. and the reſt of the ſtates of Italy, was founded upon Franceſco Sforza's reſtoration to the duchy of Milan. As this was the common intereſt of Italy, ſo was it likewiſe the only bond by which the emperor had found means to unite all the potentates againſt France, then in poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe. That league had ſucceeded according to the deſires of the allies. The French were driven out of Italy, and Sforza returned. But though the emperor had pretended to give him his inveſtiture, he had not yet done it, becauſe Sforza was not able to pay the twelve hundred thouſand ducats he demanded. He was made to hope he ſhould obtain more moderate terms, but that was only to amuſe him, and remove his as well as the pope's and Venetians ſuſpicion, that the emperor intended to keep the duchy for himſelf, or give it to his brother, the archduke, Ferdinand.

What was then but a bare ſuſpicion, ſoon became a certainty. The duke of Bourbon going into Spain, to take care of his concerns, Ferdinand d'Avalois, marquis of Peſcara, was commiſſioned by the emperor to command in Italy. Shortly after, Peſcara affected to appear very diſſatisfied, and openly to complain of the emperor's ingratitude. He carried his diſſimulation ſo far, that at laſt he inſpired Jeronimo Moronè, the duke of Milan's chancellor, with the boldneſs to ſound him, to ſee whether by his means the Spaniards might be driven out of the Milaneſe. Peſcara hearkened to his inſinuations, had ſeveral conferences with him, and managed ſo dexterouſly, that he engaged Moronè to cauſe the duke himſelf to ſpeak to him about the affair. Morenè's project was to kill all the Spaniards in the duchy of Milan, and make Peſcara king of Naples. As this could not be effected without foreign aid, Peſcara propoſed to engage in the plot, the pope, the regent of France, and the Venetians. Accordingly, theſe three powers came into it, and promiſed their aſſiſtance. When matters were almoſt ripe, Peſcara received the emperor's orders to diſpoſſeſs the duke of Milan entirely. He began with ſeizing Moronè, and then conſtrained the duke, who was not able to reſiſt, to reſign the city of Milan and all the reſt of the towns in his poſſeſſion. Only the caſtle of Milan Sforza would not deliver, which was therefore immediately beſieged. Thus the emperor had a plauſible colour to render himſelf maſter of the duchy, and the pope and Venetians could not complain of his puniſhing Sforza's treachery, ſince there were evident proofs that they themſelves were concerned in the plot.

The artifice practiſed by the emperor to ſeize the Milaneſe, ſerved only to confirm the Venetians in their reſolution to hazard all to hinder that duchy from remaining in the hands of the houſe of Auſtria. Without troubling themſelves to juſtify their conduct, they plainly told the Spaniſh embaſſador, who preſſed them to join with the emperor, that Sforza's reſtoration was a preliminary they would never depart from. If Clement VII. had ſhewn the ſame reſolution, the emperor would have been a little embarraſſed. But the pope by acting too politically, ſuffered himſelf to be deceived, as he had been before. He had a legate in Spain, who was treating with the emperor, whilſt himſelf was negotiating at Rome with the French and Venetian embaſſadors a league againſt that monarch. He impatiently waited the ſucceſs of his legate's negotiation, and as the concluſion was long delayed, he appointed a day to ſign a league with France and Venice. But in the interval, receiving advice that his treaty was concluded at Madrid, he would hear no more of the league. Soon after, the emperor ſent him by an expreſs the treaty concluded in Spain, which he found ſo equivocal and ambiguous, that he refuſed to ratify it. The Spaniſh embaſſador pretending to be himſelf ſurpriſed at the ambiguities of the treaty, ſtrenuouſly maintained, they were undeſigned, and told the pope, he might draw the treaty as he pleaſed, and engaged to have it ſigned by the emperor within two months. This delay was only to hinder the pope from entering into the league during that time, and Clement ſuffered himſelf to be deceived by the aſſurance wherewith the embaſſador ſpoke. This was tranſacted in December, 1525, and in the ſame month died Peſcara.

Having thus ſhewn the ſituation of affairs in Italy, we muſt ſee what paſſed at the court of England, where was no leſs caballing than at Rome and Venice, ſince it was then really debating to preſerve the balance of Europe, which leaned too much to one ſide. The equality between the two houſes of France and Auſtria was properly what made England conſiderable, and conſequently was an advantage not to be neglected. But there were other reaſons that incited Henry to forſake the emperor, and join with France. Though the treaty of Bruges or Windſor ſeemed to have inſeparably united the emperor and Henry, it is however certain, they were not pleaſed with one another, becauſe each was deſirous to make their union ſubſervient to his own affairs, without any regard to his ally. Probably cardinal Wolſey, who was very angry with the emperor, did not a little contribute to diſpoſe his maſter to a rupture.

The princeſs Mary, Henry's daughter, was affianced to the emperor, and yet the king, her father, had offered her to the king of Scotland. On the other hand, the emperor had not ſcrupled to conclude his own marriage with Iſabella, of Portugal, as if he had not been engaged to Mary, and from hence theſe two monarchs ſhewed they had very little regard for one another. Charles hearing that Henry was treating of a marriage between his daughter and the king of Scotland, took that occaſion to throw upon him the rupture of his marriage. In March [u] he ſent into England the lord of Buren, and the preſident of the council of Mechlin, to require the king to ſend him immediately the princeſs, pay down the covenanted dowry, and purſuant to their league, enter Picardy with a powerful army, as he ſhould have done the laſt year. It was eaſy for Henry to perceive, the emperor ſought only to juſtify himſelf, without any intention to accompliſh his marriage with Mary, and this way of proceeding was not very proper to preſerve a good underſtanding. But on the other hand, the emperor had no reaſon to complain of him. Henry had promiſed to find a hundred thouſand crowns a month for the duke of Bourbon's expedition into France, or to make a powerful diverſion in Picardy. But after ſetting the affair on foot by the firſt monthly payment, he had ſtopped there without making any attempt againſt France. Nay, he had demanded the money due to him, when he knew the emperor was not able to pay him. This proceeding ſeemed to demonſtrate he only ſought a pretence. Moreover, the emperor was informed, that in October laſt, when Francis I. was marching into Italy, a perſon without character [w] came to London from the regent, and had ſeveral conferences with cardinal Wolſey. But then Charles had promiſed to invade France on the ſide of Spain, without having done any thing towards it. And yet he took it very ill that Henry ſhould diſappoint him. Thus theſe two monarchs who were thought ſo ſtrictly united, and whoſe union made France and Italy tremble, were in reality eſtranged from one another, and ready to quarrel. In all appearance, the conferences of the perſon from France with cardinal Wolſey had taken effect. Beſides, the cardinal, who was very revengeful, muſt have been extremely incenſed with the emperor for deceiving him twice, after a poſitive promiſe to help him to the papacy.

It was in the beginning of March that the emperor's two embaſſadors diſcharged their commiſſion. But before they had received an anſwer, the news of the battle of Pavia, and the taking of the king of France, reached England [x], by a letter from the governeſs of Flanders, with another from Laynoy, written on the very day of the battle. As the court of England then ſtood inclined, this news was by no means agreeable. Nevertheleſs, as it was ſtill neceſſary to diſſemble, Henry ordered a ſolemn maſs to be celebrated at St. Paul's, where he was pleaſed to be preſent in perſon [y], without however cauſing Te deum to be ſung [z]. His aim was to make the emperor's embaſſadors believe, it was on account of the victory, and withal to ſhew a regard for France, by avoiding to expreſs any joy at her misfortune.

Some days after, the council was aſſembled to conſider what was to be done at this juncture. The queſtion was, whether the opportunity ſhould be embraced to make conqueſts upon France, in proſecuting the king's title to that kingdom, or whether it was more expedient to aſſiſt and preſerve France entire, and oppoſe the growing power of the houſe of Auſtria. As to the firſt point, it is certain, if, on this occaſion, England had ſtrictly united with the emperor, and made vigorous efforts on the ſide of Picardy, France in her preſent condition would have been irrecoverably loſt. For, inſtead of being able to withſtand the arms of theſe two powerful enemies, it was not poſſible for her to reſiſt the emperor without the king of England's aſſiſtance. But on the other hand, it was conſidered, that France could not be ruined without rendering the emperor too powerful: that he was already in poſſeſſion of Spain, and had alſo an eye upon Portugal, by marrying his niece, Iſabella, as it was publicly reported: that his late victory in Milan gave him ſuch a ſuperiority in Italy, that probably the pope and the Venetians would not be able to make head againſt him: that he poſſeſſed almoſt all the Low Countries with large and rich provinces in Germany; not to reckon the imperial dignity which was become as hereditary in his family: that if by a powerful diverſion, an opportunity was given him to conquer the French provinces bordering upon Spain and Italy, the moſt the king could expect was, to ſhare France with him: but it was to be feared, that afterwards the emperor would become his enemy, and the more formidable, as there would be no proportion between their forces, nor any ſtate in Europe capable of ſupporting the weakeſt: that therefore, ſuppoſing the king had in France all the ſucceſs he could wiſh, in aggrandizing himſelf in that kingdom, he would only be involved for the future in an unequal war with the emperor, who very probably would never be ſatisfied till he had diſpoſſeſſed the Engliſh of their conqueſts: that what had paſſed between Lewis XII. and Ferdinand, in reſpect of the kingdom of Naples, was a clear evidence how difficult it is for ſuch partitions long to ſubſiſt: that upon all theſe accounts, it was more for the intereſt of England to make a vigorous effort to ſupport France, and enable her to be always a balance to the power of the houſe of Auſtria: that the happineſs and glory of England conſiſted in the equality between the king of France and the emperor, ſince thereby England was always in condition to remain arbiter of Europe, and make herſelf courted by both ſides: that there was no other way to cauſe trade to flouriſh, wherein conſiſted all her ſtrength, and without which the Engliſh could never hope to render themſelves formidable: that if, on the contrary, it was reſolved to compleat the deſtruction of France, and a war ſhould afterwards happen with the emperor, of which there was great probability, at once would be loſt the trade with France, Spain, Italy, Flanders, and Germany, which would quickly reduce England to extreme poverty: that at leaſt, it would thereby be out of her power to have land and ſea forces ſufficient to balance the emperor's power. In ſhort, if France came to be divided between the emperor and the king, Scotland would certainly join in alliance with the emperor, and continue to annoy England by frequent diverſions, as ſhe had always done in favour of France. To theſe conſiderations, another of greater weight was added, namely, that a league with the emperor to conquer France was not the ſame thing, as one with the regent in defence of that kingdom: that in the firſt, the emperor's ſole aim would be, to make the Engliſh forces ſerve to enable him to puſh his conqueſts elſewhere: but at the ſame time he would oppoſe directly or indirectly the king's increaſe of power: that this was the uſual policy of princes, when they joined with thoſe weaker than themſelves: that it could be the leſs doubted that the emperor would follow this maxim, as even before the battle of Pavia, he had ſhewn, that he conſidered the king only as his inſtrument to promote his deſigns in Italy; but if the king joined with France, the two allies having the ſame view, would, as is uſual in defenſive leagues, act unanimouſly: that on the other hand, in the preſent juncture, France not being able to ſupport herſelf without the aſſiſtance of England, would readily accept what terms ſhould be impoſed upon her, which was an advantage more real and certain than any to be expected from the invaſion of that kingdom: in a word, nothing could be more glorious for the kingdom, than to relieve France in her diſtreſs, and free her captive king: that by ſo doing, he would truly acquire the title of arbiter and deliverer of Europe, and make the king of France a friend, who probably would eternally remember ſuch a favour.

Theſe were the reaſons that induced the king and council to take part with France. They were perfectly agreeable to the king's and the cardinal's inclinations, and to the meaſures they had now begun to take. The only buſineſs was to ſeek a pretence to break with the emperor, by throwing upon him the blame of the rupture. This is a thing to which princes are very attentive. When they wage unjuſt wars, they would perſuade the world that they are founded upon juſtice and equity, without any motive of envy, jealouſy, ambition, and avarice. The war Henry was meditating againſt the emperor was, as we have ſeen, wholly founded upon policy. And that would have been ſufficient to juſtify it. But he choſe rather to ground it upon the pretended injuries received from the emperor. The reaſon of this conduct is evident. It ſeldom happens that policy and equity agree; and Henry, like moſt princes, had rather be counted a great politician than an honeſt man. However, the reſolution being taken to ſupport France, Cuthbert Tunſtal, biſhop of London, and ſir Robert Wingfield, were ſent into Spain, to demand of the emperor ſeveral things, which it was known he would not grant. Firſt, That as the war was made at a common charge, it was reaſonable the king of England ſhould partake of the fruits of the victory of Pavia. That therefore, purſuant to their alliance, it ſhould be ſtipulated in the treaty with the captive king, that Henry ſhould be reſtored to what belonged to him in France. Secondly, that if this could not be obtained by fair means, the emperor, according to the treaty, ſhould prepare to invade France from Spain, whilſt the Engliſh acted in Picardy, and that the war ſhould not ceaſe till the king of England had acquired all that belonged to him: that the emperor ought to be the readier to aſſiſt the king of England in obtaining his deſires, becauſe by his marriage with the heireſs of England, all theſe acquiſitions would finally devolve to him. Thirdly, That as it was ſaid in the treaty of Windſor, the two alllies ſhould mutually deliver all uſurpers upon each other's right, Henry required, purſuant to that article, that the king of France ſhould be delivered to him the ſame day princeſs Mary was conſigned to the emperor.

Theſe demands were for the moſt part of ſuch a nature, that the emperor eaſily perceived, Henry only ſought a pretence to break with him. Indeed, he could not receive the princeſs Mary, ſince he was determined to marry Iſabella of Portugal, and much leſs would he deliver the captive king, and ſo part with the advantage he expected from his victory. Having therefore framed his anſwer in general terms, denoting his unwillingneſs to grant what was demanded, he afforded Henry the pretence he was ſeeking to join with the regent of France. When this reſolution was divulged, the court of England took care to publiſh the reaſons of the rupture with the emperor. They were briefly theſe: that the governeſs of the Low Countries, inſtead of providing for the war her quota of forces, had privately treated with France: that the Flemings had broken the treaty of commerce in ſeveral articles [a]: that the emperor had not paid the king the ſums due to him: that in the terms on which he had offered to releaſe the king of France, he had very negligently, and in general only mentioned Henry's right as a thing of little moment: that he was now treating of his marriage with the princeſs of Portugal, in contempt of the princeſs Mary, to whom he was contracted. Laſtly, That the Turks being about to invade Chriſtendom [b], it was neceſſary that all chriſtian princes ſhould join their forces againſt them, which could not be done without a general peace; but this peace could not be effected, whilſt the emperor remained in arms to aggrandize himſelf at the expence of other princes. Theſe are the reaſons alleged in vindication of the king's conduct. But the true reaſon was the juſt jealouſy with which the emperor's power inſpired England and the reſt of Europe. However, Henry did not think proper to proclaim war againſt the emperor, being unwilling by ſo raſh a ſtep, to prejudice his intended treaty with France. He contented himſelf with ordering his embaſſadors in Spain to intercede in his name, in behalf of the captive king, though he expected little from that interceſſion. Mean while he acquainted the regent of France, that if ſhe would ſend embaſſadors to treat with him, there might follow a treaty advantageous to the king her ſon and both kingdoms. The regent immediately appointed

Jean Joachim de Paſſau, lord of Vaux, the ſame that had begun the negotiation with cardinal Wolſey, and Jean Brinon, preſident of Roan. Their commiſſion was dated at Lyons, June the 9th.

Whilſt the treaty between France and England was negotiating at London, Henry, knowing how it would end, committed the raiſing of money to cardinal Wolſey's care. The moſt natural way was to apply to the parliament. But Wolſey was too haughty to expoſe himſelf to a refuſal or conteſt with the houſe of commons, as it had once before happened. So, reſolving to uſe a ſpeedier means and more agreeable to his temper, he granted commiſſions in the king's name [c], to levy throughout the kingdom the ſixth part of of every layman's goods, and the fourth of the clergy's [d]. Theſe commiſſions were no ſooner publiſhed, but the nation was in a great fermentation. This method of raiſing money was univerſally deemed a manifeſt breach of magna charta, and an incroachment of ſo great conſequence, that there was like to have been a general rebellion. The king being informed of it, immediately iſſued out a proclamation, diſavowing theſe commiſſions which had been publiſhed in his name, and declaring he would exact nothing of his people by force, nor demand any thing by way of benevolence, as practiſed in the reign of Edward IV. But it was quickly perceived, this was only an artifice to extort, under another name, what the people refuſed to give by force. For, the benevolence demanded by the king was almoſt equal to what was at firſt required by way of authority. The Londoners being taxed firſt, the magiſtrates excuſed themſelves, as benevolences were aboliſhed by Richard III. The cardinal exclaimed againſt it as if it had been the moſt extravagant aſſertion in the world. He told them Richard III. was a tyrant and uſurper, and therefore laws made in his reign could not limit the ſovereign's power. But as this argument had no great effect, he ſent for the chief of the common council of the city one by one, to intimidate them, deſiring at any rate to compaſs his ends without being obliged to call a parliament. But whilſt he was thus employed, there was an inſurrection near London [e], which probably would have drawn in the whole kingdom, if a timely ſtop had not been put it. The ſpeedy courſe that was taken to diſperſe the ſeditious, ſucceeded as the court could wiſh. They who had taken up arms ſeeing themſelves not yet ſufficiently ſupported, ſubmitted to the king's mercy, and ſome of the ringleaders were impriſoned. The king finding how the nation ſtood affected, thought proper to ſatisfy them, by ſhewing he was not concerned in the violent proceedings of his miniſter. Wherefore he declared in full council, that his intention was not to puniſh any perſon for the commotion. The cardinal perceiving the king threw all the blame upon him, vindicated himſelf as well as he could, without accuſing the king, alleging he had the judges opinion for what he had done. If ſuch an excuſe were admitted, it would be no longer neceſſary for a king of England to apply to the parliament for money. The judges being appointed by the king, it would not be difficult for him to have their opinion on his ſide. But though there have been judges ſo hardy as to decide points of this conſequence, as in the reigns of Richard II. Charles I. James II. very few eſcaped the puniſhment due to their preſumption. The parliament never intended that the privileges of the nation ſhould depend upon the deciſion of the judges. The council finding the king was not inclined to ſupport what the cardinal had done, and on the other hand, not daring to come upon the cardinal himſelf, thought fit to throw all the fault, without naming any perſon, upon thoſe that had given the king wrong information, and to releaſe the priſoners after a ſevere reprimand. Purſuant to this reſolution, the priſoners being brought before the council, the cardinal ſharply rebuked them, aggravating the heinouſneſs of their offence, and adding, that the king was pleaſed to grant them his pardon, provided they would find ſureties for their good behaviour for the future. But the priſoners replying, they could find none, the cardinal and duke of Norfolk ſaid, they would be bound for them; whereupon they were diſcharged.

When the king had diſcovered that he approved not all the cardinal's actions, people ventured more boldly to complain of his conduct. The truth is, he oppreſſed the nation, and more eſpecially the clergy, in a ſtrange manner. The inſtrument of his oppreſſions was John Allen [f] his chaplain, who kept no meaſures, well knowing his maſter's protection would not fail him on ſuch an occaſion. Mean while, how great ſoever the cardinal's power was, a private perſon ventured to commence a ſuit againſt Allen, and proſecuted him ſo vigorouſly, that at laſt the affair came to the king's knowledge, who was informed at the ſame time of ſeveral other complaints of the people. He had hitherto fancied, there had never been in England ſo mild a government as his, being ignorant of the ill uſe Wolſey made of his authority. This information threw him into ſo terrible a rage, that the cardinal was like to have been entirely diſgraced. It was not without the utmoſt ſubmiſſion that he appeaſed the king's anger, ſhewing him withal his laſt will, wherein he had made him his heir. This he did to intimate, that he was labouring for him, and that the outrages he committed were only to increaſe the inheritance the king was one day to enjoy. Nothing can more fully expreſs the king's ſentiments concerning him, than his letter to the cardinal after having pardoned him. A fragment whereof inſerted by lord Herbert in his hiſtory, is as follows:

"AS touching the matter of Wilton [g], ſeeing it is in no other ſtrain than you write of, and you being alſo ſo ſuddenly (with the falling ſick of your ſervants) afraid and troubled: I marvel not that it over ſlipped you as it did. But it is no great matter, ſtanding the caſe as it doth; for it is yet in my hand, as I perceive by your letter, and your default was not ſo great, ſeeing the election was but conditional. Wherefore, my lord, ſeeing the humbleneſs of your ſubmiſſion, and though the caſe were much more heinous, I can be content for to remit it, being right glad that, according to mine intent, my monitions and warnings have been beningly and lovingly accepted on your behalf, promiſing you, that the very affection I bear you cauſed me thus to do. As touching the help of religious houſes to the building of your college, I would it were more, ſo it be lawfully; for my intent is none, but that it ſhould ſo appear to all the world, and the occaſion of all their mumbling might be ſecluded and put away; for ſurely there is great murmuring of it throughout all the realm, both good and bad. They ſay not that all that is ill-gotten is beſtowed upon the college, but that the college is the cloak for covering all miſchiefe. This grieveth me, I aſſure you, to hear it ſpoken of him, which I ſo entirely love. Wherefore, methought I could do no leſs, than thus friendly to admoniſh you. One thing more I perceive by your own letter, which a little methinketh toucheth conſcience, and that is, that you have received money of the exempts for having of their old viſitors. Surely, this can hardly be with good conſcience. For, and they were good, why ſhould you take money? And if they were ill, it were a ſinful act. Howbeit, your legacy herein might, paradventure, apud homines, be a cloak, but not apud Deum. Wherefore, you, thus moniſhed him who ſo entirely loveth you, I not, will deſiſt, not only from this, (if conſcience will not bear it) but from all other things which would tangle the ſame; and, in ſo doing, we will ſing, te laudant angeli atque archangeli, te laudat omnis ſpiritus: and thus an end I make of this, though rude, yet loving letter, deſiring you as benevolently to take it, as I do mean it, for I enſure you, (and I pray you think it ſo) that there remaineth at this hour, no ſpark of diſpleaſure towards you in my heart. And thus fare you well, and be no more perplext. Written with the hand of your loving ſovereign and friend,

HENRY R.

This Allen, who is ſaid by Hall to have been a man of more learning than virtue or good conſcience, was commiſſioned by the cardinal, in conſequence of his legatine power, to viſit all religious houſes; and accordingly he rid from one religious houſe to another, with a great train, in a kind of perpetual progreſs or viſitation, and did the cardinal no little ſervice. [g] This matter of Wilton was this: the cardinal had elected a perſon prioreſs of the nunnery there, for whom the king had ſome way previouſly expreſſed his diſlike. The prioreſs of the nunnery of Wilton was a baroneſs by her title, as were alſo thoſe of Shaftſbury, Berkin, and St. Mary's, in Wincheſter, which were the only ones that were ſo in England. See Fiddes's Lif. Wolſ. p. 398.

And

favour, he might have been more fully informed. But it was very dangerous to ſpeak directly againſt a favourite, to whom the king ſtill ſhewed ſo great kindneſs. Mean while, the cardinal finding by this inſtance, what his enemies would be capable of doing againſt him, if they had the king's ear, was very careful to remove from court all he ſuſpected. At the ſame time, he ſtrove to preſerve the king's love and eſteem by all ſorts of condeſcenſions. He had now built at Hampton Court a ſtately palace, which outſhone in beauty all the king's houſes. But what had lately happened convincing him it might breed a jealouſy in the king, he made him a preſent of it[h], as if from the very firſt he had intended to build it for him. He meant to inſinuate by this preſent, that he heaped up riches purely for his ſake, which ſucceeded accordingly. The king had the ſame confidence in him as before, which the murmurs of the people ſeemed to have altered a little. This year he obtained the king's letters patents for founding the college at Oxford.

About the ſame time, the king created Henry Fitz-Roy his natural ſon, duke of Richmond and Somerſet, and high admiral of England, though he was but ſix years old[i]. As he had no legitimate ſon, he was extremely fond of this baſtard, whom he had by the lady Elizabeth Blunt[k].

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, the cardinal was employed in treating with the French embaſſadors. The beginning of June the regent had ſent general full powers to her two embaſſadors. But in the courſe of the negotiation they found they ſhould have occaſion for more particular powers, to ſettle the ſums due from the king of France to the king of England, and which, conſiſting of ſeveral articles, were to be put into one, according to Henry's intention. Theſe new powers were diſpatched the 16th of Auguſt. Upon ſuch an extraordinary occaſion, the French embaſſadors had properly nothing to do but to comply with the king of England's pleaſure. Their aim being to diſengage him from the emperor, and unite him with the king their maſter, there was no diſputing upon the terms. But it muſt be confeſſed that, on this occaſion, Henry behaved with uncommon generoſity. Though he might have demanded towns, and even provinces, in return for the friendſhip he was pleaſed to contract with Francis I. and for the charges he was going to be engaged in, he contented himſelf with ſecuring, by new treaties, the ſums that were juſtly due to him. Theſe treaties being ready, were ſigned at Moore, a houſe of the king's[l], on the 30th of Auguſt.

The firſt contained a defenſive league between France and England, againſt all powers ſpiritual or temporal, that ſhould invade either of the two kingdoms. The allies of the two kings were included by name in the league[m], but with the limitation, that this article was not to be underſtood of thoſe who had uſurped any thing upon either of the two principal contractors ſince the league concluded at London, October the 1ſt, 1518. Hence the emperor, who had lately conquered the duchy of Milan, was excluded. Moreover, Henry engaged to uſe his beſt endeavours to procure the liberty of Francis.

The ſecond treaty concerning the payment of the ſums due to Henry from the king of France, namely, 1. by a treaty of the 7th of Auguſt 1515, one million of crowns of gold. 2. By another of the 12th of January 1518, for the reſtitution of Tournay, five hundred thouſand crowns of gold. 3. By another of the ſame date, twenty-three thouſand livres Tournois. 4. By another of November the 13th, 1520, four hundred ſixty-two thouſand crowns. For all theſe ſums the regent bound herſelf in the king her ſon's name, to pay Henry two millions of crowns of gold, of thirty-five pence Tournois each, which being reduced to crowns de ſoleil, of thirty-eight pence, amounted to the ſum of eighteen hundred and ninety-four thouſand, ſeven hundred, thirty-ſix crowns, and thirty-two pence Tournois[n]. This ſum was to be paid at ſeveral times, viz. forty-ſeven thouſand three hundred and ſixty-eight crowns, within forty days after the date of the treaty; the like ſum on the firſt of November next, and the ſame every ſix months till the whole was paid. This made in all forty payments, conſequently the whole ſum was to be paid in twenty years.

It was farther agreed by the ſame treaty, that if Henry died before he had received the two millions, the arrears were to be paid to his heirs and ſucceſſors. But in caſe he out-lived the payment of the whole, he ſhould receive during life, a yearly penſion of a hundred thouſand crowns to ceaſe at his death.

To ſecure the performance of the treaty, the regent was to ſwear to it ſolemnly before the Engliſh embaſſadors, and Francis I. was to ratify and ſwear to it immediately after his return into France. Moreover, Henry had for ſecurity, the cardinal of Bourbon, the dukes of Vendome and Longueville, the earls of St. Paul, Maulevrier, Brienne, the lords of Montmorency, Lautrec, and Brezé, the cities of Paris, Lyons, Orleans, Toulouſe, Amiens, Bourdeaux, Tours, and Rheims[o].

It muſt be obſerved, that in the ſum of two millions of crowns due to Henry, there was no deduction of what he had received from Francis I. from the year 1515, to their rupture. This was all the advantage Henry made, which was not very great, conſidering how little punctual the king of France was in his payments.

By a third treaty, the regent engaged to pay to Mary, Henry's ſiſter, queen dowager of France, all the arrears of her dowry at ſeveral payments, namely, five thouſand crowns within forty days after the date of the treaty, and a like ſum every ſix months till the whole was diſcharged. Moreover, ſhe promiſed to let her enjoy her dowry for the future.

There was alſo a fourth treaty, which ran, that the king of Scotland ſhould be reckoned in the number of the allies of France, but on condition the Scots committed no act of hoſtility againſt England after the 25th of December next.

Laſtly, by a fifth treaty it was agreed, that the court of France ſhould conſent, neither directly nor indirectly, that the duke of Albany ſhould return into Scotland during the minority of James V.

All theſe ſeveral treaties, which properly were only different articles of one and the ſame treaty, were ratified and ſworn by the regent of France[p], and confirmed by the parliaments of Paris, Toulouſe, and Bourdeaux. The lords and cities that were to be ſecurities, gave their bonds. Finally, Francis I. himſelf ſent a ratification under his own hand, and dated the 27th of December.

But after having done the king's affairs, the cardinal forgot not himſelf. There is in the collection of the public acts, the regent's bond of the 18th of November, to pay the cardinal the arrears of the penſion granted him in lieu of the adminiſtration of the biſhopric of Tournay, being four years and a half, amounting to the ſum of twenty-nine thouſand ſeven hundred and ninety-three crowns of gold de ſoliel[q]. Moreover, ſhe declared, that for ſeveral other weighty reaſons, there was due to the cardinal a hundred thouſand crowns of gold: theſe two ſums making together one hundred and twenty-one thouſand eight hundred and ninety-eight crowns de ſoleil, were to be paid in ſeven years, by half-yearly equal payments.

The defenſive league between France and England being thus concluded and ſigned, the regent began to be a little more at eaſe, and better able to diſpute upon the terms of the king her ſon's liberty. Beſides, ſhe had reaſon to hope, the king of England's declaration would help to determine the pope and Venetians, whoſe fears alone hindered them from forming a league againſt the emperor. And indeed, it will hereafter be ſeen, they altered their meaſures upon hearing what the king of England had done. Mean while, the emperor receiving advice of the treaty of Moore, recalled his embaſſadors, who were ſtill in England[r], and Henry did the ſame with reſpect to his in Spain. Shortly after, Charles concluded his marriage with Iſabella of Portugal, by virtue of a diſpenſation brought him by cardinal Salviati, who delivered it to him after the concluſion of the foremen-tioned treaty.

Whilſt the affairs of Europe took a new turn, by the effects of the battle of Pavia, and the French king's captivity, there was no other alteration in thoſe of Scotland, except that the earl of Angus, who was to hold the adminiſtration but four months, did not think fit to reſign when his time was expired. Whereupon the earl of Argyle withdrew greatly diſſatisfied; but the earl of Lenox, though likewiſe diſpleaſed, ſtill remained at court. Mean while, the queen, and the earl of Arran, who had been diſpoſſeſſed, were not unmindful of their affairs. The earl of Lenox's diſcontent giving them room to hold intelligence with him, they perſuaded him to inſtill into the king a deſire to be freed from the earl of Angus. But as there was occaſion for great precaution to deceive that lord's vigilance, it was not till the next year that the king found an opportunity to attempt the execution of his deſign.

In the beginning of the year, the court of Scotland had ſent an embaſſy to England, at the had whereof was the earl of Caſſils, to treat of the king's marriage with the princeſs Mary. But as ſeveral difficulties occurred, the truce which was to expire the 26th of January, was prolonged to the 23d of March, to give the earl of Caſſils time to take a journey to Scotland for new inſtructions. Mean while, it was not poſſible to conclude any thing, becauſe, in all appearance, Henry had no intention to give his only daughter and heir to the king of Scotland. Indeed, it does not appear what advantage could be reaped by the marriage. Beſides, as he then intended to join with France, it was no longer his intereſt to manage the Scots[s].

Before the treaty of Moore was concluded, the emperor had a great advantage in his negotiations at Rome and Madrid. By reſtoring Sforza to Milan, he was almoſt ſure the pope and Venetians would abandon France, and by deſiſting from his demand of the duchy of Burgundy, he could be certain Francis would readily reſign Milan, and not trouble himſelf much with the concerns of Italy. But he could not reſolve to do either, and that made the negotiations ſo tedious. After the treaty of Moore was ſigned, the ſtate of his affairs was changed. The pope was grown more courageous, and finding himſelf deceived by the emperor, who in a ſecond ratification of their treaty, left the reſtoration of Sforza in a ſtate of uncertainty, plainly told him, that without the reſtitution of the Milaneſe, there was no peace to be expected. The emperor had alſo reaſon to fear, that Francis I. ſeeing himſelf like to be ſo well ſupported, would be ſtill more incompliant with reſpect to Burgundy. So, perceiving there was no way to prevent a league which was going to unite ſo many princes againſt him, he was in great perplexity. There was a neceſſity of ſpeedily reſolving either to maintain, without any ally, the impending war, or to make peace with France. Both were equally perplexing. In chooſing war, he knew not where to find money, and in making with his priſoner a forced peace, he could not expect to reap from his victory the advantage he propoſed. Happily for him, Francis, tired of his captivity, freed him from this perplexity, by offering to reſign the duchy of Burgundy, which had hitherto been the main obſtacle to a peace. After that, the emperor readily and ſeriouſly treated with him, whereas before he had only amuſed him. Shortly after, they concluded together the famous treaty of Madrid. The chief articles to which Francis ſubmitted were theſe, beſides many others which it would be needleſs to recite.

That the king of France ſhould marry queen Leonora, the emperor's ſiſter, and have with her two hundred thouſand crowns of gold.

That Francis ſhould be releaſed on the 10th of March, and the ſame day ſhould deliver to the emperor his two ſons in hoſtage [t].

That he ſhould reſign to the emperor the duchy of Burgundy in full ſovereignty.

That he ſhould deſiſt from the homage the emperor owed him for Flanders and Artois.

That he ſhould renounce all claim to Naples, Milan, Aſti, Tournay, Liſle, and Heſdin, &c.

That he ſhould perſuade Henry d'Albert to reſign the kingdom of Navarre to the emperor, or at leaſt ſhould give him no aſſiſtance.

That, within forty days, he ſhould reſtore the duke of Bourbon and all his party to their eſtates.

That he ſhould reſtore Phillibert de Châlons, prince of Orange, and Michael Antonio de Saluzzo, to their principalities.

That he ſhould give no ſort of aſſiſtance to the duke of Guelders, and after that prince's death, ſhould uſe his beſt endeavours to cauſe his towns to fall into the emperor's hands.

That he ſhould pay the king of England five hundred thouſand crowns which the emperor owed him.

That when the emperor went to Italy to receive the imperial crown, he ſhould lend him twelve gallies, four large ſhips, and a land army, or two hundred thouſand crowns inſtead of the army.

Laſtly, he promiſed upon the word and honour of a prince, to execute all theſe articles, or in caſe of non-performance to return priſoner into Spain.

If Francis had not been ſo haſty to offer the duchy of Burgundy, he would probably have ſaved himſelf many troubles, and avoided reproaches which much concerned his honour [u]. At the time the treaty of Madrid was concluded, Charles was under very great perplexities. Beſides thoſe already mentioned, he knew that the princes and Hans-Towns of Germany, that had embraced Luther's doctrine, began to take meaſures to ſecure themſelves from the calamities they were daily threatened with. To this was added, the dread of a Turkiſh invaſion in Hungary, which greatly concerned the emperor, by reaſon of the neighbourhood of Auſtria. So, in all likelihood, if Francis had not been ſo haſty, the emperor would have rather deſiſted from Burgundy than been expoſed to ſo many enemies at once. theſe were the real motives that obliged him to haſten the concluſion of the treaty of Madrid, contrary to the inſtances and oppoſition of many of his counſellors, who repreſented to him, that he would be infallibly diſappointed. His chancellor even refuſed to ſign it; but as he believed he had ſtrong reaſons to run that hazard, he abſolutely concluded, in a belief that it was the ſole means to prevent the league againſt him. Whatever happened, he hoped to come off by reſtoring Sforza to Milan, which however he did not intend to do, but at the laſt extremity. Mean while, by reſolving to inſiſt upon that article, he rendered all his meaſures ineffectual; he loſt his priſoners, without obtaining Burgundy, or preventing the league; in ſhort, after ſuſtaining many attacks, he was, as will be ſeen, forced to part with the duchy of Milan. But where is the prince, let his abilities be ever ſo great, that can foreſee all the conſequences of his own policy? When Charles V. ſigned the treaty of Madrid, he thought it very advantageous. Indeed Francis would have dearly purchaſed his liberty, if, when he ſigned the treaty, he had really intended to keep it. But it is too manifeſt, that when he gave his word, he deſigned to break it, ſince he had no ſooner ſet foot on his own dominions, but he refuſed to ratify the treaty. This was ſo little expected by the emperor, that immediately after the concluſion of the peace, he wrote to the pope, that though he had promiſed to reſtore Sforza to Milan, it was however on condition that Sforza cleared himſelf of the crime of felony and treaſon laid to his charge. Adding, that ſince the princes of Italy wiſhed, he would not give the duchy of Milan to the archduke Ferdinand, his brother, he would preſent it to the duke of Bourbon, in caſe make the emperor's embaſſadors believe, it was on account of the victory, and withal to ſhew a regard for France, by avoiding to expreſs any joy at her misfortune.

Some days after, the council was aſſembled to conſider what was to be done at this juncture. The queſtion was, whether the opportunity ſhould be embraced to make conqueſts upon France, in proſecuting the king's title to that kingdom, or whether it was more expedient to aſſiſt and preſerve France entire, and oppoſe the growing power of the houſe of Auſtria. As to the firſt point, it is certain, if, on this occaſion, England had ſtrictly united with the emperor, and made vigorous efforts on the ſide of Picardy, France in her preſent condition would have been irrecoverably loſt. For, inſtead of being able to withſtand the arms of theſe two powerful enemies, it was not poſſible for her to reſiſt the emperor without the king of England's aſſiſtance. But on the other hand, it was conſidered, that France could not be ruined without rendering the emperor too powerful: that he was already in poſſeſſion of Spain, and had alſo an eye upon Portugal, by marrying his niece, Iſabella, as it was publicly reported: that his late victory in Milan gave him ſuch a ſuperiority in Italy, that probably the pope and the Venetians would not be able to make head againſt him: that he poſſeſſed almoſt all the Low Countries with large and rich provinces in Germany; not to reckon the imperial dignity which was become as hereditary in his family: that if by a powerful diverſion, an opportunity was given him to conquer the French provinces bordering upon Spain and Italy, the moſt the king could expect was, to ſhare France with him: but it was to be feared, that afterwards the emperor would become his enemy, and the more formidable, as there would be no proportion between their forces, nor any ſtate in Europe capable of ſupporting the weakeſt: that therefore, ſuppoſing the king had in France all the ſucceſs he could wiſh, in aggrandizing himſelf in that kingdom, he would only be involved for the future in an unequal war with the emperor, who very probably would never be ſatisfied till he had diſpoſſeſſed the Engliſh of their conqueſts: that what had paſſed between Lewis XII. and Ferdinand, in reſpect of the kingdom of Naples, was a clear evidence how difficult it is for ſuch partitions long to ſubſiſt: that upon all theſe accounts, it was more for the intereſt of England to make a vigorous effort to ſupport France, and enable her to be always a balance to the power of the houſe of Auſtria: that the happineſs and glory of England conſiſted in the equality between the king of France and the emperor, ſince thereby England was always in condition to remain arbiter of Europe, and make herſelf courted by both ſides: that there was no other way to cauſe trade to flouriſh, wherein conſiſted all her ſtrength, and without which the Engliſh could never hope to render themſelves formidable: that if, on the contrary, it was reſolved to compleat the deſtruction of France, and a war ſhould afterwards happen with the emperor, of which there was great probability, at once would be loſt the trade with France, Spain, Italy, Flanders, and Germany, which would quickly reduce England to extreme poverty: that at leaſt, it would thereby be out of her power to have land and ſea forces ſufficient to balance the emperor's power. In ſhort, if France came to be divided between the emperor and the king, Scotland would certainly join in alliance with the emperor, and continue to annoy England by frequent diverſions, as ſhe had always done in favour of France. To theſe conſiderations, another of greater weight was added, namely, that a league with the emperor to conquer France was not the ſame thing, as one with the regent in defence of that kingdom: that in the firſt, the emperor's ſole aim would be, to make the Engliſh forces ſerve to enable him to puſh his conqueſts elſewhere: but at the ſame time he would oppoſe directly or indirectly the king's increaſe of power: that this was the uſual policy of princes, when they joined with thoſe weaker than themſelves: that it could be the leſs doubted that the emperor would follow this maxim, as even before the battle of Pavia, he had ſhewn, that he conſidered the king only as his inſtrument to promote his deſigns in Italy; but if the king joined with France, the two allies having the ſame view, would, as is uſual in defenſive leagues, act unanimouſly: that on the other hand, in the preſent juncture, France not being able to ſupport herſelf without the aſſiſtance of England, would readily accept what terms ſhould be impoſed upon her, which was an advantage more real and certain than any to be expected from the invaſion of that kingdom: in a word, nothing could be more glorious for the kingdom, than to relieve France in her diſtreſs, and free her captive king: that by ſo doing, he would truly acquire the title of arbiter and deliverer of Europe, and make the king of France a friend, who probably would eternally remember ſuch a favour.

Theſe were the reaſons that induced the king and council to take part with France. They were perfectly agreeable to the king's and the cardinal's inclinations, and to the meaſures they had now begun to take. The only buſineſs was to ſeek a pretence to break with the emperor, by throwing upon him the blame of the rupture. This is a thing to which princes are very attentive. When they wage unjuſt wars, they would perſuade the world that they are founded upon juſtice and equity, without any motive of envy, jealouſy, ambition, and avarice. The war Henry was meditating againſt the emperor was, as we have ſeen, wholly founded upon policy. And that would have been ſufficient to juſtify it. But he choſe rather to ground it upon the pretended injuries received from the emperor. The reaſon of this conduct is evident. It ſeldom happens that policy and equity agree; and Henry, like moſt princes, had rather be counted a great politician than an honeſt man. However, the reſolution being taken to ſupport France, Cuthbert Tunſtal, biſhop of London, and ſir Robert Wingfield, were ſent into Spain, to demand of the emperor ſeveral things, which it was known he would not grant. Firſt, That as the war was made at a common charge, it was reaſonable the king of England ſhould partake of the fruits of the victory of Pavia. That therefore, purſuant to their alliance, it ſhould be ſtipulated in the treaty with the captive king, that Henry ſhould be reſtored to what belonged to him in France. Secondly, that if this could not be obtained by fair means, the emperor, according to the treaty, ſhould prepare to invade France from Spain, whilſt the Engliſh acted in Picardy, and that the war ſhould not ceaſe till the king of England had acquired all that belonged to him: that the emperor ought to be the readier to aſſiſt the king of England in obtaining his deſires, becauſe by his marriage with the heireſs of England, all theſe acquiſitions would finally devolve to him. Thirdly, That as it was ſaid in the treaty of Windſor, the two allies ſhould mutually deliver all uſurpers upon each other's right, Henry required, purſuant to that article, that the king of France ſhould be delivered to him the ſame day princeſs Mary was conſigned to the emperor.

Theſe demands were for the moſt part of ſuch a nature, that the emperor eaſily perceived, Henry only ſought a pretence to break with him. Indeed, he could not receive the princeſs Mary, ſince he was determined to marry Iſabella of Portugal, and much leſs would he deliver the captive king, and ſo part with the advantage he expected from his victory. Having therefore framed his anſwer in general terms, denoting his unwillingneſs to grant what was demanded, he afforded Henry the pretence he was ſeeking to join with the regent of France. When this reſolution was divulged, the court of England took care to publiſh the reaſons of the rupture with the emperor. They were briefly theſe: that the governeſs of the Low Countries, inſtead of providing for the war her quota of forces, had privately treated with France: that the Flemings had broken the treaty of commerce in ſeveral articles [a]: that the emperor had not paid the king the ſums due to him: that in the terms on which he had offered to releaſe the king of France, he had very negligently, and in general only mentioned Henry's right as a thing of little moment: that he was now treating of his marriage with the princeſs of Portugal, in contempt of the princeſs Mary, to whom he was contracted. Laſtly, That the Turks being about to invade Chriſtendom [b], it was neceſſary that all chriſtian princes ſhould join their forces againſt them, which could not be done without a general peace; but this peace could not be effected, whilſt the emperor remained in arms to aggrandize himſelf at the expence of other princes. Theſe are the reaſons alleged in vindication of the king's conduct. But the true reaſon was the juſt jealouſy with which the emperor's power inſpired England and the reſt of Europe. However, Henry did not think proper to proclaim war againſt the emperor, being unwilling by ſo raſh a ſtep, to prejudice his intended treaty with France. He contented himſelf with ordering his embaſſadors in Spain to intercede in his name, in behalf of the captive king, though he expected little from that interceſſion. Mean while he acquainted the regent of France, that if ſhe would ſend embaſſadors to treat with him, there might follow a treaty advantageous to the king her ſon and both kingdoms. The regent immediately appointed make the emperor's embaſſadors believe, it was on account of the victory, and withal to ſhew a regard for France, by avoiding to expreſs any joy at her misfortune.

Some days after, the council was aſſembled to conſider what was to be done at this juncture. The queſtion was, whether the opportunity ſhould be embraced to make conqueſts upon France, in proſecuting the king's title to that kingdom, or whether it was more expedient to aſſiſt and preſerve France entire, and oppoſe the growing power of the houſe of Auſtria. As to the firſt point, it is certain, if, on this occaſion, England had ſtrictly united with the emperor, and made vigorous efforts on the ſide of Picardy, France in her preſent condition would have been irrecoverably loſt. For, inſtead of being able to withſtand the arms of theſe two powerful enemies, it was not poſſible for her to reſiſt the emperor without the king of England's aſſiſtance. But on the other hand, it was conſidered, that France could not be ruined without rendering the emperor too powerful: that he was already in poſſeſſion of Spain, and had alſo an eye upon Portugal, by marrying his niece, Iſabella, as it was publicly reported: that his late victory in Milan gave him ſuch a ſuperiority in Italy, that probably the pope and the Venetians would not be able to make head againſt him: that he poſſeſſed almoſt all the Low Countries with large and rich provinces in Germany; not to reckon the imperial dignity which was become as hereditary in his family: that if by a powerful diverſion, an opportunity was given him to conquer the French provinces bordering upon Spain and Italy, the moſt the king could expect was, to ſhare France with him: but it was to be feared, that afterwards the emperor would become his enemy, and the more formidable, as there would be no proportion between their forces, nor any ſtate in Europe capable of ſupporting the weakeſt: that therefore, ſuppoſing the king had in France all the ſucceſs he could wiſh, in aggrandizing himſelf in that kingdom, he would only be involved for the future in an unequal war with the emperor, who very probably would never be ſatisfied till he had diſpoſſeſſed the Engliſh of their conqueſts: that what had paſſed between Lewis XII. and Ferdinand, in reſpect of the kingdom of Naples, was a clear evidence how difficult it is for ſuch partitions long to ſubſiſt: that upon all theſe accounts, it was more for the intereſt of England to make a vigorous effort to ſupport France, and enable her to be always a balance to the power of the houſe of Auſtria: that the happineſs and glory of England conſiſted in the equality between the king of France and the emperor, ſince thereby England was always in condition to remain arbiter of Europe, and make herſelf courted by both ſides: that there was no other way to cauſe trade to flouriſh, wherein conſiſted all her ſtrength, and without which the Engliſh could never hope to render themſelves formidable: that if, on the contrary, it was reſolved to compleat the deſtruction of France, and a war ſhould afterwards happen with the emperor, of which there was great probability, at once would be loſt the trade with France, Spain, Italy, Flanders, and Germany, which would quickly reduce England to extreme poverty: that at leaſt, it would thereby be out of her power to have land and ſea forces ſufficient to balance the emperor's power. In ſhort, if France came to be divided between the emperor and the king, Scotland would certainly join in alliance with the emperor, and continue to annoy England by frequent diverſions, as ſhe had always done in favour of France. To theſe conſiderations, another of greater weight was added, namely, that a league with the emperor to conquer France was not the ſame thing, as one with the regent in defence of that kingdom: that in the firſt, the emperor's ſole aim would be, to make the Engliſh forces ſerve to enable him to puſh his conqueſts elſewhere: but at the ſame time he would oppoſe directly or indirectly the king's increaſe of power: that this was the uſual policy of princes, when they joined with thoſe weaker than themſelves: that it could be the leſs doubted that the emperor would follow this maxim, as even before the battle of Pavia, he had ſhewn, that he conſidered the king only as his inſtrument to promote his deſigns in Italy; but if the king joined with France, the two allies having the ſame view, would, as is uſual in defenſive leagues, act unanimouſly: that on the other hand, in the preſent juncture, France not being able to ſupport herſelf without the aſſiſtance of England, would readily accept what terms ſhould be impoſed upon her, which was an advantage more real and certain than any to be expected from the invaſion of that kingdom: in a word, nothing could be more glorious for the kingdom, than to relieve France in her diſtreſs, and free her captive king: that by ſo doing, he would truly acquire the title of arbiter and deliverer of Europe, and make the king of France a friend, who probably would eternally remember ſuch a favour.

Theſe were the reaſons that induced the king and council to take part with France. They were perfectly agreeable to the king's and the cardinal's inclinations, and to the meaſures they had now begun to take. The only buſineſs was to ſeek a pretence to break with the emperor, by throwing upon him the blame of the rupture. This is a thing to which princes are very attentive. When they wage unjuſt wars, they would perſuade the world that they are founded upon juſtice and equity, without any motive of envy, jealouſy, ambition, and avarice. The war Henry was meditating againſt the emperor was, as we have ſeen, wholly founded upon policy. And that would have been ſufficient to juſtify it. But he choſe rather to ground it upon the pretended injuries received from the emperor. The reaſon of this conduct is evident. It ſeldom happens that policy and equity agree; and Henry, like moſt princes, had rather be counted a great politician than an honeſt man. However, the reſolution being taken to ſupport France, Cuthbert Tunſtal, biſhop of London, and ſir Robert Wingfield, were ſent into Spain, to demand of the emperor ſeveral things, which it was known he would not grant. Firſt, That as the war was made at a common charge, it was reaſonable the king of England ſhould partake of the fruits of the victory of Pavia. That therefore, purſuant to their alliance, it ſhould be ſtipulated in the treaty with the captive king, that Henry ſhould be reſtored to what belonged to him in France. Secondly, that if this could not be obtained by fair means, the emperor, according to the treaty, ſhould prepare to invade France from Spain, whilſt the Engliſh acted in Picardy, and that the war ſhould not ceaſe till the king of England had acquired all that belonged to him: that the emperor ought to be the readier to aſſiſt the king of England in obtaining his deſires, becauſe by his marriage with the heireſs of England, all theſe acquiſitions would finally devolve to him. Thirdly, That as it was ſaid in the treaty of Windſor, the two allies ſhould mutually deliver all uſurpers upon each other's right, Henry required, purſuant to that article, that the king of France ſhould be delivered to him the ſame day princeſs Mary was conſigned to the emperor.

Theſe demands were for the moſt part of ſuch a nature, that the emperor eaſily perceived, Henry only ſought a pretence to break with him. Indeed, he could not receive the princeſs Mary, ſince he was determined to marry Iſabella of Portugal, and much leſs would he deliver the captive king, and ſo part with the advantage he expected from his victory. Having therefore framed his anſwer in general terms, denoting his unwillingneſs to grant what was demanded, he afforded Henry the pretence he was ſeeking to join with the regent of France. When this reſolution was divulged, the court of England took care to publiſh the reaſons of the rupture with the emperor. They were briefly theſe: that the governeſs of the Low Countries, inſtead of providing for the war her quota of forces, had privately treated with France: that the Flemings had broken the treaty of commerce in ſeveral articles [a]: that the emperor had not paid the king the ſums due to him: that in the terms on which he had offered to releaſe the king of France, he had very negligently, and in general only mentioned Henry's right as a thing of little moment: that he was now treating of his marriage with the princeſs of Portugal, in contempt of the princeſs Mary, to whom he was contracted. Laſtly, That the Turks being about to invade Chriſtendom [b], it was neceſſary that all chriſtian princes ſhould join their forces againſt them, which could not be done without a general peace; but this peace could not be effected, whilſt the emperor remained in arms to aggrandize himſelf at the expence of other princes. Theſe are the reaſons alleged in vindication of the king's conduct. But the true reaſon was the juſt jealouſy with which the emperor's power inſpired England and the reſt of Europe. However, Henry did not think proper to proclaim war againſt the emperor, being unwilling by ſo raſh a ſtep, to prejudice his intended treaty with France. He contented himſelf with ordering his embaſſadors in Spain to intercede in his name, in behalf of the captive king, though he expected little from that interceſſion. Mean while he acquainted the regent of France, that if ſhe would ſend embaſſadors to treat with him, there might follow a treaty advantageous to the king her ſon and both kingdoms. The regent immediately appointed

Jean Joachim de Paſſau, lord of Vaux, the ſame that had begun the negotiation with cardinal Wolſey, and Jean Brinon, preſident of Roan. Their commiſſion was dated at Lyons, June the 9th.

Whilſt the treaty between France and England was negotiating at London, Henry, knowing how it would end, committed the raiſing of money to cardinal Wolſey's care. The moſt natural way was to apply to the parliament. But Wolſey was too haughty to expoſe himſelf to a refuſal or conteſt with the houſe of commons, as it had once before happened. So, reſolving to uſe a ſpeedier means and more agreeable to his temper, he granted commiſſions in the king's name [c], to levy throughout the kingdom the ſixth part of of every layman's goods, and the fourth of the clergy's [d]. Theſe commiſſions were no ſooner publiſhed, but the nation was in a great fermentation. This method of raiſing money was univerſally deemed a manifeſt breach of magna charta, and an incroachment of ſo great conſequence, that there was like to have been a general rebellion. The king being informed of it, immediately iſſued out a proclamation, diſavowing theſe commiſſions which had been publiſhed in his name, and declaring he would exact nothing of his people by force, nor demand any thing by way of benevolence, as practiſed in the reign of Edward IV. But it was quickly perceived, this was only an artifice to extort, under another name, what the people refuſed to give by force. For, the benevolence demanded by the king was almoſt equal to what was at firſt required by way of authority. The Londoners being taxed firſt, the magiſtrates excuſed themſelves, as benevolences were aboliſhed by Richard III. The cardinal exclaimed againſt it as if it had been the moſt extravagant aſſertion in the world. He told them Richard III. was a tyrant and uſurper, and therefore laws made in his reign could not limit the ſovereign's power. But as this argument had no great effect, he ſent for the chief of the common council of the city one by one, to intimidate them, deſiring at any rate to compaſs his ends without being obliged to call a parliament. But whilſt he was thus employed, there was an inſurrection near London [e], which probably would have drawn in the whole kingdom, if a timely ſtop had not been put it. The ſpeedy courſe that was taken to diſperſe the ſeditious, ſucceeded as the court could wiſh. They who had taken up arms ſeeing themſelves not yet ſufficiently ſupported, ſubmitted to the king's mercy, and ſome of the ringleaders were impriſoned. The king finding how the nation ſtood affected, thought proper to ſatisfy them, by ſhewing he was not concerned in the violent proceedings of his miniſter. Wherefore he declared in full council, that his intention was not to puniſh any perſon for the commotion. The cardinal perceiving the king threw all the blame upon him, vindicated himſelf as well as he could, without accuſing the king, alleging he had the judges opinion for what he had done. If ſuch an excuſe were admitted, it would be no longer neceſſary for a king of England to apply to the parliament for money. The judges being appointed by the king, it would not be difficult for him to have their opinion on his ſide. But though there have been judges ſo hardy as to decide points of this conſequence, as in the reigns of Richard II. Charles I. James II. very few eſcaped the puniſhment due to their preſumption. The parliament never intended that the privileges of the nation ſhould depend upon the deciſion of the judges. The council finding the king was not inclined to ſupport what the cardinal had done, and on the other hand, not daring to come upon the cardinal himſelf, thought fit to throw all the fault, without naming any perſon, upon thoſe that had given the king wrong information, and to releaſe the priſoners after a ſevere reprimand. Purſuant to this reſolution, the priſoners being brought before the council, the cardinal ſharply rebuked them, aggravating the heinouſneſs of their offence, and adding, that the king was pleaſed to grant them his pardon, provided they would find ſureties for their good behaviour for the future. But the priſoners replying, they could find none, the cardinal and duke of Norfolk ſaid, they would be bound for them; whereupon they were diſcharged.

When the king had diſcovered that he approved not all the cardinal's actions, people ventured more boldly to complain of his conduct. The truth is, he oppreſſed the nation, and more eſpecially the clergy, in a ſtrange manner. The inſtrument of his oppreſſions was John Allen [f] his chaplain, who kept no meaſures, well knowing his maſter's protection would not fail him on ſuch an occaſion. Mean while, how great ſoever the cardinal's power was, a private perſon ventured to commence a ſuit againſt Allen, and proſecuted him ſo vigorouſly, that at laſt the affair came to the king's knowledge, who was informed at the ſame time of ſeveral other complaints of the people. He had hitherto fancied, there had never been in England ſo mild a government as his, being ignorant of the ill uſe Wolſey made of his authority. This information threw him into ſo terrible a rage, that the cardinal was like to have been entirely diſgraced. It was not without the utmoſt ſubmiſſion that he appeaſed the king's anger, ſhewing him withal his laſt will, wherein he had made him his heir. This he did to intimate, that he was labouring for him, and that the outrages he committed were only to increaſe the inheritance the king was one day to enjoy. Nothing can more fully expreſs the king's ſentiments concerning him, than his letter to the cardinal after having pardoned him. A fragment whereof inſerted by lord Herbert in his hiſtory, is as follows:

"AS touching the matter of Wilton [g], ſeeing it is in no other ſtrain than you write of, and you being alſo ſo ſuddenly (with the falling ſick of your ſervants) afraid and troubled: I marvel not that it over ſlipped you as it did. But it is no great matter, ſtanding the caſe as it doth; for it is yet in my hand, as I perceive by your letter, and your default was not ſo great, ſeeing the election was but conditional. Wherefore, my lord, ſeeing the humbleneſs of your ſubmiſſion, and though the caſe were much more heinous, I can be content for to remit it, being right glad that, according to mine intent, my monitions and warnings have been benignly and lovingly accepted on your behalf, promiſing you, that the very affection I bear you cauſed me thus to do. As touching the help of religious houſes to the building of your college, I would it were more, ſo it be lawfully; for my intent is none, but that it ſhould ſo appear to all the world, and the occaſion of all their mumbling might be ſecluded and put away; for ſurely there is great murmuring of it throughout all the realm, both good and bad. They ſay not that all that is ill-gotten is beſtowed upon the college, but that the college is the cloak for covering all miſchiefe. This grieveth me, I aſſure you, to hear it ſpoken of him, which I ſo entirely love. Wherefore, methought I could do no leſs, than thus friendly to admoniſh you. One thing more I perceive by your own letter, which a little methinketh toucheth conſcience, and that is, that you have received money of the exempts for having of their old viſitors. Surely, this can hardly be with good conſcience. For, and they were good, why ſhould you take money? And if they were ill, it were a ſinful act. Howbeit, your legacy herein might, paradventure, apud homines, be a cloak, but not apud Deum. Wherefore, you, thus moniſhed him who ſo entirely loveth you, I not, will deſiſt, not only from this, (if conſcience will not bear it) but from all other things which would tangle the ſame; and, in ſo doing, we will ſing, te laudant angeli atque archangeli, te laudat omnis ſpiritus: and thus an end I make of this, though rude, yet loving letter, deſiring you as benevolently to take it, as I do mean it, for I enſure you, (and I pray you think it ſo) that there remaineth at this hour, no ſpark of diſpleaſure towards you in my heart. And thus fare you well, and be no more perplext. Written with the hand of your loving ſovereign and friend,

HENRY R.

This Allen, who is ſaid by Hall to have been a man of more learning than virtue or good conſcience, was commiſſioned by the cardinal, in conſequence of his legatine power, to viſit all religious houſes; and accordingly he rid from one religious houſe to another, with a great train, in a kind of perpetual progreſs or viſitation, and did the cardinal no little ſervice. [g] This matter of Wilton was this: the cardinal had elected a perſon prioreſs of the nunnery there, for whom the king had ſome way previouſly expreſſed his diſlike. The prioreſs of the nunnery of Wilton was a baroneſs by her title, as were alſo thoſe of Shaftſbury, Berkin, and St. Mary's, in Wincheſter, which were the only ones that were ſo in England. See Fiddes's Lif. Wolſ. p. 398.

And

favour, he might have been more fully informed. But it was very dangerous to ſpeak directly againſt a favourite, to whom the king ſtill ſhewed ſo great kindneſs. Mean while, the cardinal finding by this inſtance, what his enemies would be capable of doing againſt him, if they had the king's ear, was very careful to remove from court all he ſuſpected. At the ſame time, he ſtrove to preſerve the king's love and eſteem by all ſorts of condeſcenſions. He had now built at Hampton Court a ſtately palace, which outſhone in beauty all the king's houſes. But what had lately happened convincing him it might breed a jealouſy in the king, he made him a preſent of it[h], as if from the very firſt he had intended to build it for him. He meant to inſinuate by this preſent, that he heaped up riches purely for his ſake, which ſucceeded accordingly. The king had the ſame confidence in him as before, which the murmurs of the people ſeemed to have altered a little. This year he obtained the king's letters patents for founding the college at Oxford.

About the ſame time, the king created Henry Fitz-Roy his natural ſon, duke of Richmond and Somerſet, and high admiral of England, though he was but ſix years old[i]. As he had no legitimate ſon, he was extremely fond of this baſtard, whom he had by the lady Elizabeth Blunt[k].

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, the cardinal was employed in treating with the French embaſſadors. The beginning of June the regent had ſent general full powers to her two embaſſadors. But in the courſe of the negotiation they found they ſhould have occaſion for more particular powers, to ſettle the ſums due from the king of France to the king of England, and which, conſiſting of ſeveral articles, were to be put into one, according to Henry's intention. Theſe new powers were diſpatched the 16th of Auguſt. Upon ſuch an extraordinary occaſion, the French embaſſadors had properly nothing to do but to comply with the king of England's pleaſure. Their aim being to diſengage him from the emperor, and unite him with the king their maſter, there was no diſputing upon the terms. But it muſt be confeſſed that, on this occaſion, Henry behaved with uncommon generoſity. Though he might have demanded towns, and even provinces, in return for the friendſhip he was pleaſed to contract with Francis I. and for the charges he was going to be engaged in, he contented himſelf with ſecuring, by new treaties, the ſums that were juſtly due to him. Theſe treaties being ready, were ſigned at Moore, a houſe of the king's[l], on the 30th of Auguſt.

The firſt contained a defenſive league between France and England, againſt all powers ſpiritual or temporal, that ſhould invade either of the two kingdoms. The allies of the two kings were included by name in the league[m], but with the limitation, that this article was not to be underſtood of thoſe who had uſurped any thing upon either of the two principal contractors ſince the league concluded at London, October the 1ſt, 1518. Hence the emperor, who had lately conquered the duchy of Milan, was excluded. Moreover, Henry engaged to uſe his beſt endeavours to procure the liberty of Francis.

The ſecond treaty concerning the payment of the ſums due to Henry from the king of France, namely, 1. by a treaty of the 7th of Auguſt 1515, one million of crowns of gold. 2. By another of the 12th of January 1518, for the reſtitution of Tournay, five hundred thouſand crowns of gold. 3. By another of the ſame date, twenty-three thouſand livres Tournois. 4. By another of November the 13th, 1520, four hundred ſixty-two thouſand crowns. For all theſe ſums the regent bound herſelf in the king her ſon's name, to pay Henry two millions of crowns of gold, of thirty-five pence Tournois each, which being reduced to crowns de ſoleil, of thirty-eight pence, amounted to the ſum of eighteen hundred and ninety-four thouſand, ſeven hundred, thirty-ſix crowns, and thirty-two pence Tournois[n]. This ſum was to be paid at ſeveral times, viz. forty-ſeven thouſand three hundred and ſixty-eight crowns, within forty days after the date of the treaty; the like ſum on the firſt of November next, and the ſame every ſix months till the whole was paid. This made in all forty payments, conſequently the whole ſum was to be paid in twenty years.

It was farther agreed by the ſame treaty, that if Henry died before he had received the two millions, the arrears were to be paid to his heirs and ſucceſſors. But in caſe he out-lived the payment of the whole, he ſhould receive during life, a yearly penſion of a hundred thouſand crowns to ceaſe at his death.

To ſecure the performance of the treaty, the regent was to ſwear to it ſolemnly before the Engliſh embaſſadors, and Francis I. was to ratify and ſwear to it immediately after his return into France. Moreover, Henry had for ſecurity, the cardinal of Bourbon, the dukes of Vendome and Longueville, the earls of St. Paul, Maulevrier, Brienne, the lords of Montmorency, Lautrec, and Brezé, the cities of Paris, Lyons, Orleans, Toulouſe, Amiens, Bourdeaux, Tours, and Rheims[o].

It muſt be obſerved, that in the ſum of two millions of crowns due to Henry, there was no deduction of what he had received from Francis I. from the year 1515, to their rupture. This was all the advantage Henry made, which was not very great, conſidering how little punctual the king of France was in his payments.

By a third treaty, the regent engaged to pay to Mary, Henry's ſiſter, queen dowager of France, all the arrears of her dowry at ſeveral payments, namely, five thouſand crowns within forty days after the date of the treaty, and a like ſum every ſix months till the whole was diſcharged. Moreover, ſhe promiſed to let her enjoy her dowry for the future.

There was alſo a fourth treaty, which ran, that the king of Scotland ſhould be reckoned in the number of the allies of France, but on condition the Scots committed no act of hoſtility againſt England after the 25th of December next.

Laſtly, by a fifth treaty it was agreed, that the court of France ſhould conſent, neither directly nor indirectly, that the duke of Albany ſhould return into Scotland during the minority of James V.

All theſe ſeveral treaties, which properly were only different articles of one and the ſame treaty, were ratified and ſworn by the regent of France[p], and confirmed by the parliaments of Paris, Toulouſe, and Bourdeaux. The lords and cities that were to be ſecurities, gave their bonds. Finally, Francis I. himſelf ſent a ratification under his own hand, and dated the 27th of December.

But after having done the king's affairs, the cardinal forgot not himſelf. There is in the collection of the public acts, the regent's bond of the 18th of November, to pay the cardinal the arrears of the penſion granted him in lieu of the adminiſtration of the biſhopric of Tournay, being four years and a half, amounting to the ſum of twenty-nine thouſand ſeven hundred and ninety-three crowns of gold de ſoliel[q]. Moreover, ſhe declared, that for ſeveral other weighty reaſons, there was due to the cardinal a hundred thouſand crowns of gold: theſe two ſums making together one hundred and twenty-one thouſand eight hundred and ninety-eight crowns de ſoleil, were to be paid in ſeven years, by half-yearly equal payments.

The defenſive league between France and England being thus concluded and ſigned, the regent began to be a little more at eaſe, and better able to diſpute upon the terms of the king her ſon's liberty. Beſides, ſhe had reaſon to hope, the king of England's declaration would help to determine the pope and Venetians, whoſe fears alone hindered them from forming a league againſt the emperor. And indeed, it will hereafter be ſeen, they altered their meaſures upon hearing what the king of England had done. Mean while, the emperor receiving advice of the treaty of Moore, recalled his embaſſadors, who were ſtill in England[r], and Henry did the ſame with reſpect to his in Spain. Shortly after, Charles concluded his marriage with Iſabella of Portugal, by virtue of a diſpenſation brought him by cardinal Salviati, who delivered it to him after the concluſion of the foremen-tioned treaty.

Whilſt the affairs of Europe took a new turn, by the effects of the battle of Pavia, and the French king's captivity, there was no other alteration in thoſe of Scotland, except that the earl of Angus, who was to hold the adminiſtration but four months, did not think fit to reſign when his time was expired. Whereupon the earl of Argyle withdrew greatly diſſatisfied; but the earl of Lenox, though likewiſe diſpleaſed, ſtill remained at court. Mean while, the queen, and the earl of Arran, who had been diſpoſſeſſed, were not unmindful of their affairs. The earl of Lenox's diſcontent giving them room to hold intelligence with him, they perſuaded him to inſtill into the king a deſire to be freed from the earl of Angus. But as there was occaſion for great precaution to deceive that lord's vigilance, it was not till the next year that the king found an opportunity to attempt the execution of his deſign.

In the beginning of the year, the court of Scotland had ſent an embaſſy to England, at the had whereof was the earl of Caſſils, to treat of the king's marriage with the princeſs Mary. But as ſeveral difficulties occurred, the truce which was to expire the 26th of January, was prolonged to the 23d of March, to give the earl of Caſſils time to take a journey to Scotland for new inſtructions. Mean while, it was not poſſible to conclude any thing, becauſe, in all appearance, Henry had no intention to give his only daughter and heir to the king of Scotland. Indeed, it does not appear what advantage could be reaped by the marriage. Beſides, as he then intended to join with France, it was no longer his intereſt to manage the Scots[s].

Before the treaty of Moore was concluded, the emperor had a great advantage in his negotiations at Rome and Madrid. By reſtoring Sforza to Milan, he was almoſt ſure the pope and Venetians would abandon France, and by deſiſting from his demand of the duchy of Burgundy, he could be certain Francis would readily reſign Milan, and not trouble himſelf much with the concerns of Italy. But he could not reſolve to do either, and that made the negotiations ſo tedious. After the treaty of Moore was ſigned, the ſtate of his affairs was changed. The pope was grown more courageous, and finding himſelf deceived by the emperor, who in a ſecond ratification of their treaty, left the reſtoration of Sforza in a ſtate of uncertainty, plainly told him, that without the reſtitution of the Milaneſe, there was no peace to be expected. The emperor had alſo reaſon to fear, that Francis I. ſeeing himſelf like to be ſo well ſupported, would be ſtill more incompliant with reſpect to Burgundy. So, perceiving there was no way to prevent a league which was going to unite ſo many princes againſt him, he was in great perplexity. There was a neceſſity of ſpeedily reſolving either to maintain, without any ally, the impending war, or to make peace with France. Both were equally perplexing. In chooſing war, he knew not where to find money, and in making with his priſoner a forced peace, he could not expect to reap from his victory the advantage he propoſed. Happily for him, Francis, tired of his captivity, freed him from this perplexity, by offering to reſign the duchy of Burgundy, which had hitherto been the main obſtacle to a peace. After that, the emperor readily and ſeriouſly treated with him, whereas before he had only amuſed him. Shortly after, they concluded together the famous treaty of Madrid. The chief articles to which Francis ſubmitted were theſe, beſides many others which it would be needleſs to recite.

That the king of France ſhould marry queen Leonora, the emperor's ſiſter, and have with her two hundred thouſand crowns of gold.

That Francis ſhould be releaſed on the 10th of March, and the ſame day ſhould deliver to the emperor his two ſons in hoſtage[t].

That he ſhould reſign to the emperor the duchy of Burgundy in full ſovereignty.

That he ſhould deſiſt from the homage the emperor owed him for Flanders and Artois.

That he ſhould renounce all claim to Naples, Milan, Aſti, Tournay, Liſle, and Heſdin, &c.

That he ſhould perſuade Henry d'Albert to reſign the kingdom of Navarre to the emperor, or at leaſt ſhould give him no aſſiſtance.

That, within forty days, he ſhould reſtore the duke of Bourbon and all his party to their eſtates.

That he ſhould reſtore Phillibert de Châlons, prince of Orange, and Michael Antonio de Saluzzo, to their principalities.

That he ſhould give no ſort of aſſiſtance to the duke of Guelders, and after that prince's death, ſhould uſe his beſt endeavours to cauſe his towns to fall into the emperor's hands.

That he ſhould pay the king of England five hundred thouſand crowns which the emperor owed him.

That when the emperor went to Italy to receive the imperial crown, he ſhould lend him twelve gallies, four large ſhips, and a land army, or two hundred thouſand crowns inſtead of the army.

Laſtly, he promiſed upon the word and honour of a prince, to execute all theſe articles, or in caſe of non-performance to return priſoner into Spain.

If Francis had not been ſo haſty to offer the duchy of Burgundy, he would probably have ſaved himſelf many troubles, and avoided reproaches which much concerned his honour[u]. At the time the treaty of Madrid was concluded, Charles was under very great perplexities. Beſides thoſe already mentioned, he knew that the princes and Hans-Towns of Germany, that had embraced Luther's doctrine, began to take meaſures to ſecure themſelves from the calamities they were daily threatened with. To this was added, the dread of a Turkiſh invaſion in Hungary, which greatly concerned the emperor, by reaſon of the neighbourhood of Auſtria. So, in all likelihood, if Francis had not been ſo haſty, the emperor would have rather deſiſted from Burgundy than been expoſed to ſo many enemies at once. theſe were the real motives that obliged him to haſten the concluſion of the treaty of Madrid, contrary to the inſtances and oppoſition of many of his counſellors, who repreſented to him, that he would be infallibly diſappointed. His chancellor even refuſed to ſign it; but as he believed he had ſtrong reaſons to run that hazard, he abſolutely concluded, in a belief that it was the ſole means to prevent the league againſt him. Whatever happened, he hoped to come off by reſtoring Sforza to Milan, which however he did not intend to do, but at the laſt extremity. Mean while, by reſolving to inſiſt upon that article, he rendered all his meaſures ineffectual; he loſt his priſoners, without obtaining Burgundy, or preventing the league; in ſhort, after ſuſtaining many attacks, he was, as will be ſeen, forced to part with the duchy of Milan. But where is the prince, let his abilities be ever ſo great, that can foreſee all the conſequences of his own policy? When Charles V. ſigned the treaty of Madrid, he thought it very advantageous. Indeed Francis would have dearly purchaſed his liberty, if, when he ſigned the treaty, he had really intended to keep it. But it is too manifeſt, that when he gave his word, he deſigned to break it, ſince he had no ſooner ſet foot on his own dominions, but he refuſed to ratify the treaty. This was ſo little expected by the emperor, that immediately after the concluſion of the peace, he wrote to the pope, that though he had promiſed to reſtore Sforza to Milan, it was however on condition that Sforza cleared himſelf of the crime of felony and treaſon laid to his charge. Adding, that ſince the princes of Italy wiſhed, he would not give the duchy of Milan to the archduke Ferdinand, his brother, he would preſent it to the duke of Bourbon, in caſe came [h]. Probably this treaty was to be made public, in order to induce the emperor to deſiſt from his claim to Burgundy, and be ſatisfied with the offered equivalent.

By the ſecond treaty it was agreed :

That in caſe the emperor rejected their propoſals, or deferred his anſwer, all commerce ſhould be forbidden with his ſubjects by the two kings, allowing them however forty days to withdraw their effects;

That the two kings ſhould make war upon the emperor in the Low Countries with an army of thirty thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred men at arms, and that two thirds of the foot and all the horſe [i] ſhould be furniſhed by the king of France.

That they ſhould equip a fleet with fifteen thouſand men, whereof the king of France ſhould find ten thouſand.

That if the king of Portugal or any other prince or ſtate ſhould join with the emperor, they ſhould be declared enemies to both the kings.

That the pope and Venetians ſhould be deemed included in the league, provided they continued the war in Italy.

That the king of France ſhould endeavour to perſuade the king of Navarre, the duke of Gueldres, and Robert de la Mark, to make war upon the emperor.

That the two kings ſhould uſe their joint endeavours to encourage John de Zapol to proſecute his right to the crown of Hungary, in caſe he had not already made and alliance with the Turk, in order to keep the emperor's brother, Ferdinand, employed in thoſe parts.

That the league ſhould be notified to the princes of Germany, and the two kings endeavour to prevent their aſſiſting the emperor.

The ſubſtance of the third treaty was :

1. That this treaty ſhould not derogate from that of Moore, which remained in force.

2. That there ſhould be perpetual peace between Francis and Henry, and their reſpective ſubjects.

3. That neither of them ſhould give aid or advice to any perſon whatever that ſhould attack the dominions of the other.

4. Henry renounced for himſelf and ſucceſſors all right and title to the kingdom of France [k], and, in general, whatever Francis now poſſeſſed.

5. In conſideration whereof, Francis bound himſelf and ſucceſſors to pay to Henry's ſucceſſors an annual penſion for ever of fifty thouſand crowns, at two payments; namely, on the 1ſt of May, and the 1ſt of November, and that the payment of the penſion ſhould commence on the firſt of thoſe two days which ſhould happen after Henry's death, without deduction of what ſhould remain to be paid after Henry's deceaſe of the two millions, ſtipulated by the treaty of Moore.

6. Moreover Francis bound himſelf to give yearly to Henry fifteen thouſand crowns worth of ſalt of Bruage [l], beſides the forementioned fifty thouſand crowns.

7. That, to prevent the objection which might hereafter be made, that a king cannot bind his ſucceſſors, the two kings ſhould cauſe the treaty to be confirmed by the ſtates of their realms, and held as a perpetual and inviolable law.

8. That the treaty ſhould be approved and confirmed by the archbiſhops, biſhops, princes, dukes, earls, barons, and other great men of the two kingdoms, whoſe names were inſerted in this article, under forfeiture of all their goods; and by the parliaments of Paris, Toulouſe, Roan, Bourdeaux, as well as by all the courts of juſtice in England.

The news of the ſacking of Rome and the pope's captivity, arriving ſhortly after the concluſion of theſe treaties, the two kings thought fit to alter the article of the ſecond, concerning their carrying war into the Low Countries, and to agree to act only in Italy. But as the Engliſh troops could not be tranſported into Italy without great difficulties and loſs of time, they agreed that the king of France ſhould undertake the war alone for a certain ſum [m], which Henry was to pay him monthly till the end of October. The laſt treaty was ſigned the 29th of May, about three weeks after the taking of Rome.

In conſequence of the firſt of the three treaties of April the 30th, Henry ſent ſir Francis Pointz into Spain to demand of the emperor, that as by their former treaties the war with France was carried on at a common charge, he would give him half the booty taken at Pavia, and one of the two hoſtages received from the French king. Pointz was accompanied with Clarenceux king at arms, but incognito, that he might be ready to do his office when there ſhould be occaſion. The emperor eaſily perceived the king of England ſought only a pretence of quarrel. But as it was his intereſt to prolong the time, he told the embaſſador he would ſend his anſwer to the king his maſter by an expreſs.

While the embaſſador was on his way to Spain, Francis and Henry, hearing what had paſſed in Italy, thought proper that cardinal Wolſey ſhould go and confer with Francis at Amiens, in order to concert meaſures agreeable to the ſituation of affairs. Shortly after, Francis ſent Lautrec with the forces deſigned for Italy [n].

Cardinal Wolſey departing from court the 3d of July, arrived at Calais the 11th [o], from whence he went to Abbeville and ſtayed till Francis came to Amiens. He was received at his entrance into the French territories with the ſame reſpect as would have been paid to the king of England. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, Francis's letters patents, empowering the cardinal, his deareſt and great friend, to releaſe the priſoners wherever he came, what crimes ſoever they were guilty of, except high treaſon, rapes, coining, ſacrilege, and the like, and to grant them a pardon by his letters patents.

Whilſt the cardinal was at Abbeville he received a memorial from the emperor, containing his anſwer to the king of France's offers to the viceroy of Naples. He had, as was obſerved, rejected theſe offers at firſt with diſdain, and refuſed to hear them mentioned. But the ſituation of his affairs being altered by the league between France and England, he believed it would be better to end all difference by a peace, than run the hazard of maintaining the war alone againſt ſo many powerful enemies. It was therefore, in order to procure a peace, that he ſent this anſwer to the cardinal, wherewith he imagined the king of France and Henry would be ſatisfied.

As this memorial is very proper to illuſtrate the hiſtory of thoſe times, it will not doubtleſs be unacceptable to inſert the ſubſtance thereof.

" The emperor began with proteſting, that by what he offered in his memorial, he meant not to derogate from the treaty of Madrid, but in the points only which were contrary to it. He added, that as to the hoſtages, the king of France was not ignorant of the reaſon of their being in Spain, and had it in his power to recover them. Then he ſet forth the offers made by Francis to the viceroy of Naples, containing the four following articles :

The king of FRANCE's offers to the emperor.

" I. That he would execute the treaty of Madrid, provided Franceſco Sforza was reſtored to the duchy of Milan.

" II. That he would give the emperor in lieu of Burgundy two millions of gold payable, namely, a good ſum in hand, when queen Leonora ſhould be delivered to him, and the reſt at a day to be appointed, and then his ſons ſhould be reſtored; unleſs the emperor had rather have the whole ſum at once, and deliver at the ſame time the queen and the two hoſtages.

" III. That he would pay the king of England what was due from the emperor.

" IV. He demanded that the emperor ſhould increaſe queen Leonora's dowry in proportion to the ſum he was to receive, ſince he could do it without any charge to himſelf.

[h] Hall ſays, the people were very much againſt this match, becauſe the princeſs Mary being king Henry's preſumptive heir, if he died without ſons, ſhe ſucceeded of courſe to the throne, and, on account of her marriage, it was feared ſhe would be too much under the influence of France, fol. 155.

8. That the treaty ſhould be approved and confirmed by the archbiſhops, biſhops, princes, dukes, earls, barons, and other great men of the two kingdoms, whoſe names were inſerted in this article, under forfeiture of all their goods ; and by the parliaments of Paris, Toulouſe, Roan, Bourdeaux, as well as by all the courts of juſtice in England.

The news of the ſacking of Rome and the pope's captivity, arriving ſhortly after the concluſion of theſe treaties, the two kings thought fit to alter the article of the ſecond, concerning their carrying war into the Low Countries, and to agree to act only in Italy. But as the Engliſh troops could not be tranſported into Italy without great difficulties and loſs of time, they agreed that the king of France ſhould undertake the war alone for a certain ſum [m], which Henry was to pay him monthly till the end of October. The laſt treaty was ſigned the 29th of May, about three weeks after the taking of Rome.

In conſequence of the firſt of the three treaties of April the 30th, Henry ſent ſir Francis Pointz into Spain to demand of the emperor, that as by their former treaties the war with France was carried on at a common charge, he would give him half the booty taken at Pavia, and one of the two hoſtages received from the French king. Pointz was accompanied with Clarenceux king at arms, but incognito, that he might be ready to do his office when there ſhould be occaſion. The emperor eaſily perceived the king of England ſought only a pretence of quarrel. But as it was his intereſt to prolong the time, he told the embaſſador he would ſend his anſwer to the king his maſter by an expreſs.

While the embaſſador was on his way to Spain, Francis and Henry, hearing what had paſſed in Italy, thought proper that cardinal Wolſey ſhould go and confer with Francis at Amiens, in order to concert meaſures agreeable to the ſituation of affairs. Shortly after, Francis ſent Lautrec with the forces deſigned for Italy [n].

Cardinal Wolſey departing from court the 3d of July, arrived at Calais the 11th [o], from whence he went to Abbeville and ſtayed till Francis came to Amiens. He was received at his entrance into the French territories with the ſame reſpect as would have been paid to the king of England. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, Francis's letters patents, empowering the cardinal, his deareſt and great friend, to releaſe the priſoners wherever he came, what crimes ſoever they were guilty of, except high treaſon, rapes, coining, ſacrilege, and the like, and to grant them a pardon by his letters patents.

Whilſt the cardinal was at Abbeville he received a memorial from the emperor, containing his anſwer to the king of France's offers to the viceroy of Naples. He had, as was obſerved, rejected theſe offers at firſt with diſdain, and refuſed to hear them mentioned. But the ſituation of his affairs being altered by the league between France and England, he believed it would be better to end all difference by a peace, than run the hazard of maintaining the war alone againſt ſo many powerful enemies. It was therefore, in order to procure a peace, that he ſent this anſwer to the cardinal, wherewith he imagined the king of France and Henry would be ſatisfied.

As this memorial is very proper to illuſtrate the hiſtory of thoſe times, it will not doubtleſs be unacceptable to inſert the ſubſtance thereof.

" The emperor began with proteſting, that by what he offered in his memorial, he meant not to derogate from the treaty of Madrid, but in the points only which were contrary to it. He added, that as to the hoſtages, the king of France was not ignorant of the reaſon of their being in Spain, and had it in his power to recover them. Then he ſet forth the offers made by Francis to the viceroy of Naples, containing the four following articles :

The king of FRANCE's offers to the emperor.

" I. That he would execute the treaty of Madrid, provided Franceſco Sforza was reſtored to the duchy of Milan.

" II. That he would give the emperor in lieu of Burgundy two millions of gold payable, namely, a good ſum in hand, when queen Leonora ſhould be delivered to him, and the reſt at a day to be appointed, and then his ſons ſhould be reſtored ; unleſs the emperor had rather have the whole ſum at once, and deliver at the ſame time the queen and the two hoſtages.

" III. That he would pay the king of England what was due from the emperor.

" IV. He demanded that the emperor ſhould increaſe queen Leonora's dowry in proportion to the ſum he was to receive, ſince he could do it without any charge to himſelf.

[h] Hall ſays, the people were very much againſt this match, becauſe the princeſs Mary being king Henry's preſumptive heir, if he died without ſons, ſhe ſucceeded of courſe to the throne, and, on account of her marriage, it was feared ſhe would be too much under the influence of France, fol. 155.

The EMPEROR's Anſwer.

The emperor replied to theſe four articles by the eight following declarations:

"I. That what ſhall be agreed upon ſhould not be prejudicial to the treaty of Madrid, except in ſuch things as ſhould be altered by mutual conſent.

"II. That the emperor's right to Burgundy ſhould remain entire, as before the treaty of Madrid.

"III. That all the articles of the treaty of Madrid, except ſuch as were mentioned in theſe offers, ſhould remain entire.

"IV. The emperor in his fourth declaration ſaid, that he hoped the king of England and the lord cardinal would cauſe the ſum of two millions of gold, offered by the king of France, to be augmented. However, if that could not be, it ſhould be underſtood, that this ſum was over and above what the emperor owed the king of England, as well for money lent, as for the indemnity he had undertaken to diſcharge, which ſums the king of France had taken upon himſelf in the treaty of Madrid; beſides, likewiſe, the reſtitution of the late Mr. de Bourbon's eſtate, it being reaſonable that his heirs ſhould partake of the benefit of the treaty. Item, That the king of France ſhould punctually perform all the reſt of the articles concluded on his part in the treaty of Madrid before his ſons left Spain; the emperor not being able, after what had paſſed, to take any ſecurity if the hoſtages remained not in his power till the treaty was fully executed.

"V. That purſuant to the treaty of Madrid, what ſhould be agreed upon, ſhould be ratified by the ſtates general of France, and approved by the parliaments. Or, if that could not be done by the ſtates general, it ſhould at leaſt be ratified by the ſtates of each province.

"VI. The emperor declared, That he could not ſend the queen his ſiſter to France till every thing was accompliſhed, and then the queen and the hoſtages ſhould be ſent together.

"VII. That as for duke Sforza, the emperor would appoint impartial judges to decide his affair, as if he was found guilty of no crime for which he deſerved to be deprived of his duchy, he ſhould be reſtored. But if he was condemned, the ſtate of Milan ſhould remain in the emperor's diſpoſal, according to juſtice and equity.

"VIII. That the king of England ſhould be guarantee of the future treaty, and, by his letters patents, engage to aſſiſt, at his own charge, with a certain number of troops, him of the two parties that ſhould keep the treaty, againſt him that ſhould not obſerve it.

"Beſides theſe eight conditions, which the emperor called declarations, he demanded moreover in his memorial, that the king of France ſhould ſatisfy him for the expences of the leagues he had made with him, and of which he was the ſole author, empowering the king of England to ſettle the ſum.

"Finally, he ſaid, That he did not queſtion the king of England, who perfectly knew what had paſſed between the two parties, would not cauſe the king of France's offers to be encreaſed, and that the lord legate, whom the emperor always looked upon as his good friend, would alſo endeavour the ſame to the utmoſt of his power: that however, he was ſo inclined to peace, that if the king of England deſired he ſhould make any farther conceſſions than what were contained in the eight foregoing declarations, he would do more for his ſake than for any prince in the world. That he ſhould be very glad all the potentates of Europe knew how much he valued his friendſhip, and aſcribed to him the whole glory of procuring the peace. This memorial was dated at Valladolid the ——— of July 1527.

If this anſwer of the emperor be cloſely examined, it will be manifeſt that he ſimply and abſolutely accepted of the French king's offers, under terms denoting, it was he that gave rather than received law, and that by his declarations he only obviated all poſſible cavils. As to what he farther demanded, it was under ſuch reſtrictions, that he ſeemed willing to ſtand to the king of England's determination, which at ſuch a juncture was the ſame as departing from his demands. There was but one ſingle point concerning which he could not reſolve to ſubmit; namely, the duke of Milan's affair. But this was a point newly propoſed by the king of France, and which had no relation to the treaty of Madrid, where nothing like it was to be found. However, it is plain, if that had been the only obſtacle to a peace, he would alſo have granted it, ſince he reſerved a way to come off with honour, namely, by cauſing Sforza to be declared innocent, in the manner he had himſelf propoſed to the pope. Perhaps Francis would have accepted the peace on the terms offered in the memorial, if the emperor had come to that reſolution at firſt. But ſince he had made theſe offers to the viceroy of Naples, the face of affairs was very much altered, as he had entirely gained Henry to his intereſt, and as after the taking of Rome it was to be feared the emperor would become maſter of all Italy. Mean while, the emperor's offers, which were in effect the ſame Francis had made to the viceroy of Naples, were either to be accepted or rejected. But as it was not Henry's buſineſs to return an anſwer, ſince the affair did not directly concern him, he only ſent the memorial to the king of France, who no longer deſiring to make peace, diſengaged himſelf in this manner: He demanded in the firſt place, that Sforza ſhould be reſtored without condition. Secondly, that his ſons ſhould be delivered before he recalled his forces from Italy, where Lautrec was now arrived, offering to depoſit three hundred thouſand ducats in the hands of the king of England for ſecurity of his word. There could not be a plainer evidence of his little deſire to execute the treaty of Madrid, though the ſame terms only were demanded as were offered by himſelf preſently after his deliverance. He meant, after having withdrawn his hoſtages, to have the execution of the treaty in his own power, under colour of offering to depoſit, for ſecurity, three hundred thouſand ducats in the hands of a prince devoted to him, and who by a private treaty was engaged to make his intereſt his own. The emperor, unwilling to be thus inſnared, offered on his part to depoſit the ſame ſum in the hands of the king of England for pledge that the hoſtages ſhould be reſtored. But his offer being rejected, the affair ſtopped there, and war was only thought of. Mean while, the emperor deſiring to let all the world ſee it was not his fault that a peace was not concluded, gave the embaſſadors of England, of the pope, and of the Venetians, the ſame anſwer he had ſent to cardinal Wolſey. They all ſeemed very well ſatisfied, and ſaid their maſters would doubtleſs accept a peace on theſe terms, and ſend orders to conclude it. But they knew not that the kings of France and England had altered their minds and taken new reſolutions.

If Francis and cardinal Wolſey were to confer together at Abbeville, it was not to ſeek means to make peace, but rather to take meaſures, on ſuppoſition that a war with the emperor was infallible. Francis being come to Abbeville the 1ſt of Auguſt, the cardinal waited on him, and, after conferring together, they concluded on the 18th three treaties, which properly were only ſupplements, explanations, and reſtrictions, of the three foregoing ones.

By the firſt it was agreed:

I. That, as he had left it to the king of France's choice to marry the princeſs Mary, or leave her for the duke of Orleans, his ſecond ſon, the duke ſhould eſpouſe the princeſs when they ſhould both be of age. That then, and not before, ſhould be ſettled the marriage articles concerning the dowry, the education of the duke of Orleans in England, and the like. Moreover, that, whether the marriage ſhould be conſummated, or the two kings think fit to diſpoſe of their children otherwiſe, their friendſhip ſhould remain inviolable, the marriage being only to be conſidered as a ſupplement to the treaties of the 30th of April, and not as part of thoſe treaties.

II. That the treaty concluded at Moore ſhould remain in full force.

III. That the project of the interview of the two kings ſhould be laid aſide, on account of the ſeaſon and circumſtances of affairs.

IV. As by the treaty of the 29th of May, it was agreed that the king of England ſhould contribute a certain ſum for the war of Italy; it was concluded by this, that in caſe the emperor accepted the offers the two kings ſhould make him by their embaſſadors, the contribution ſhould ceaſe without any prejudice to the treaty of peace: But if he rejected them, the treaty of league, offenſive and defenſive, ſhould ſubſiſt, on condition that, during this campaign, the king of England ſhould be deemed to have diſcharged his part of the treaty, by his contribution for the war with Italy.

V. That the king of England ſhould form no demands upon the king of France on pretence of his charges for the war of Italy.

VI. That to prevent all diſputes, without examining the number of troops which the king of France maintained in Italy, the king of England ſhould pay for the month of June laſt laſt twenty thouſand crowns, for the month of July laſt thirty thouſand crowns, and thirty-two thouſand two hundred and twenty two for each of the three following months. On condition, however, that if in theſe three laſt months, the Engliſh commiſſaries found in the army of Italy, a leſs number of troops than what the king of France was to maintain, the contribution ſhould be leſſened in proportion. Moreover, if a peace was made during theſe three laſt months, the contribution ſhould ceaſe the day the peace was concluded.

By the ſecond treaty, which concerned only trade, Francis promiſed to give the Engliſh merchants ſuch privileges as ſhould be agreed upon hereafter.

By a third treaty the two kings were bound,

Firſt, not to conſent to the calling of a general council during the pope's captivity.

Secondly To receive no bull brief or mandate from the pope [p] till he was releaſed.

Thirdly, That till the pope ſhould reſume the government of the church, whatever ſhould be determined in England by the cardinal legate, aſſiſted by the principal members of the clergy [q], and in France by the clergy of the Gallican church, ſhould be punctually executed.

Theſe treaties being concluded, Francis I. ratified them, and ſwore to the obſervance before he left Abbeville [r]. Cardinal Wolſey did the ſame thing in his maſter's name, by virtue of his full powers and title of vicar general, which he had received on this occaſion. After that he returned into England to give the king an account of the ſucceſs of his negotiations [s].

Henry being reſolved to proclaim war againſt the emperor, but willing to conceal the real motives, demanded of him by his embaſſadors, four things, which he knew could not then be performed. The firſt was, That he ſhould pay what was borrowed of him, or of his father king Henry VII. The ſecond, that he ſhould pay him the five hundred thouſand crowns to which he was obliged, in caſe he married not the princeſs Mary, to whom he was affianced. The third, that according to the tenor of their treaty, he ſhould ſatisfy him for his penſion from the king of France, whereof there was now due four years and four months. The fourth, that he ſhould releaſe the pope, and ſatisfy him for all the damages cauſed by his troops. The emperor anſwered the embaſſadors, firſt, that he had never denied his debt to the king of England; but was ſurprized he ſhould at this juncture inſiſt ſo much upon payment: that at leaſt, when the money was required, the obligations ſhould be offered to be reſtored. Secondly, that he would write to the king their maſter to acquaint him, why he did not think himſelf liable to the penalty of five hundred thouſand crowns, for not conſummating the marriage. In the third place, that orders were ſent into Italy to ſet the pope free. He ſaid nothing concerning making ſatisfaction for the penſion, becauſe probably he conſidered it as included in the article of the debts to which he owned himſelf bound, as indeed nothing was more reaſonable.

The emperor's replies were not capable of ſatisfying Henry, who only ſought an occaſion of quarrel. On the other hand, Francis having called together the chief men, that is to ſay properly, perſons devoted to him, declared to them all the ſteps he had made towards a peace with the emperor; and it may be eaſily gueſſed, he was not very careful to explain what the emperor might allege againſt him. Having repreſented the matter as he pleaſed, he ſaid he was ready to return into captivity, if it was judged that he was obliged in honour or conſcience. The aſſembly unanimouſly replied, that his perſon belonged to the realm, and it was no in his power to diſpoſe of it according to his pleaſure: that moreover, he could not alienate the provinces of the crown, but if the emperor would accept of a ranſom for the two princes in hoſtage, they offered the king two millions of gold to redeem them. A man muſt have voluntarily ſhut his eyes, not to ſee what was the deſign of this farce, entirely managed by the court. Mean while the king believing, after this deciſion, that he might with a ſafe conſcience go to war with the emperor, thought only of means to recover his ſons by force of arms. He ſtill hoped, however, the dread of a war would induce the emperor to mitigate the treaty of Madrid. This was not now with reſpect to Burgundy, ſince he could not be ignorant that the emperor had accepted the offered equivalent. But he hoped by means of the war, to procure a new treaty, which ſhould annul that of Madrid. Thus many princes play with their words and oaths, and ſeek to blind themſelves, or at leaſt, the public, whilſt none about them dare to tell them the truth. The emperor kept his word no better with regard to the duchy of Milan; and Henry VIII. ſcrupled not to break his league with the emperor, as he had before violated that with Francis. Princes never want excuſes when they have a mind to break a treaty. But the public is not always impoſed upon, though frequently they appear ſo to be. Probably, the ſovereign themſelves are not ſo blind, but they ſee the irregularity of their conduct, though countenanced by the diſſimulation of the public, they affect a great ſecurity. But the time comes at laſt, when poſterity, leſs prepoſſeſſed, does juſtice to all the world, and calls things by their proper name.

Francis, willing to preſerve the friendſhip newly contracted with Henry, ſent him the order of St. Michael [t], by Anne de Montmorency [u], one of the knights. This lord had power to diſpenſe with Henry's oath, in whole or in part, as the new knight ſhould think fit, or even to be contented with his bare word. Henry was pleaſed to ſwear to obſerve all the ſtatutes of the order of St. Michael, which were not contrary to thoſe of the garter, or any other order he had already received. Then he ſent the order of the garter to Francis, by Arthur [Plantegenet] viſcount Liſle, natural ſon of Edward IVth [w], and Francis took the uſual oath of the order, with the ſame reſtrictions. The French embaſſador, who arrived in England about the end of October, was received with ſuch magnificence, that du Bellai, who accompanied him, aſſures us, he had never ſeen the like. The Engliſh embaſſador was received in the ſame manner in France, there having ever been between Francis and Henry an emulation, which frequently threw them into needleſs expences. But it was moſt inconvenient for Francis, by reaſon of his continual wars with the emperor, wherein Henry was no farther engaged than he pleaſed: nay, he paid the very contribution for the war of Italy, by way of deduction for the ſums owed him by Francis [x], as appears in the Collection of the Public Acts. Thus Francis was forced to diſburſe all the money employed in that war, of which I muſt now relate the ſequel.

Clement VII. was ſtill confined in the caſtle of St. Angelo, till he could pay the ſums exacted upon him. As he had but little money, he could only pay part of what he had promiſed, and therefore his captivity was longer than he expected at firſt; they, in whoſe cuſtody he was, not being willing to truſt to his word. The emperor had not advice of the ſacking of Rome, and the pope's impriſonment, ſooner than the beginning of June, and it was above a month before he came to any reſolution. As he did not queſtion this affair would make great noiſe in the world, he was willing to ſee, before he determined what to do, how the kings of France and England would take it, in order to proceed accordingly. The 2d of Auguſt, he wrote to Henry to excuſe himſelf concerning the outrages committed by his troops at Rome, and the violence exerciſed upon the pope's perſon, wherein he proteſted he was not concerned. At the ſame time he aſked his advice about what was to be done on the occa-ſion, as if he ſtill deemed him his good friend and ally. But it was only to gain time till he received Francis's anſwer to the memorial ſent to cardinal Wolſey. On the other hand, the pope, though narrowly watched, had found means to write to Henry [y], and cauſe the thirteen cardinals, who were confined with him, to do the ſame, deſiring his protection, and entreating him to uſe his beſt endeavours to free them from their unhappy condition. Henry, upon receipt of theſe letters, ſent orders to his embaſſadors in Spain to demand of the emperor the pope's and cardinal's liberty: to which the emperor anſwered, in general terms, that he would do what lay in his power for the king of England's ſatisfaction. Mean while he was thinking of conveying the pope into Spain, in expectation of making a better bargain with him than if he left him in Italy. Of this cardinal Wolſey informed Henry, by a letter from Abbeville of the 29th of July.

It is certain Henry's inſtances in the pope's behalf greatly embarraſſed the emperor. He found that Francis and Henry would not fail to join their counſels and forces againſt him, under colour of labouring for the pope, and this union could not but break all his meaſures with reſpect to his affairs in Italy. He believed, therefore, that before all things he ſhould try to divide them, by ſowing jealouſies and ſuſpicions between them. One of his expedients to ſucceed, was to propoſe to the cardinal a marriage between the duke of Richmond, natural ſon of Henry, and Iſabella, princeſs of Portugal, with whom he offered in dower the duchy of Milan. The cardinal acquainted the king with it by a letter of the 31ſt of July, telling him withal, that the offer was not much to be relied on, but however, it was proper to ſeem to liſten to it, becauſe it was neceſſary ſtill to preſerve ſome correſpondence with the emperor. This related without doubt to the affair of the divorce which I ſhall preſently ſpeak of. For, by a letter of the 1ſt of Auguſt, the cardinal informed the king it was reported in Spain, he intended to divorce the queen, but that it was requiſite to ſend orders to his embaſſadors at Madrid to ſtifle the rumour as much as poſſible. That to this end, they might ſay, it had no other foundation than the biſhop of Tarbe's ſcruples concerning the princeſs Mary's marriage with the duke of Orleans, as if there was room to queſtion the princeſs's legitimacy. The emperor alſo uſed another means to divide Francis and Henry, by trying to gain cardinal Wolſey by advantageous offers [z]. But for once he could not ſucceed; whether Wolſey was now too far engaged with Francis, or was bent to be revenged on the emperor, who had twice deceived him, or whether the buſineſs of the divorce was now reſolved, in which caſe it was not poſſible for him to promiſe to eſpouſe the emperor's intereſts.

When Francis heard of the ſacking of Rome, he perceived it was time to lay aſide artifice, and neceſſary to ſend a powerful aid into Italy, otherwiſe the Venetians would infallibly conclude a peace with the emperor. Indeed it was not likely they could, or would bear alone the burden of the war. Wherefore his firſt care was to make a new treaty with them [a], to bring each into the field ten thouſand men, and levy ten thouſand Switzers at a common charge. The Venetians deſired nothing more than to be ſupported by France; becauſe they juſtly dreaded that the army which had ſacked Rome would be employed againſt them. Indeed, if the duke of Bourbon had been alive, or the viceroy of Naples able to influence the army, the Venetians would undoubtedly have been attacked, being the only enemies the emperor had in Italy. But happily for them, the Imperial troops being wholly intent upon the plunder of Rome, without thinking of any other undertaking, the plague which broke out among them ſwept away two thirds of the ſoldiers. In ſhort, the diſtemper deſtroying them by heaps, they left Rome, and diſperſed themſelves in the neighbouring country. After which, having ſacked Terni and Narni, and extorted money from Spoleto, the Germans parted from the Spaniards, and returned to Rome. Thus diſcord ariſing in the army, which ill obeyed the prince of Orange, though they had choſen him for general, they projected nothing to improve their victory for the emperor's advantage. On the contrary, by their negligence, they gave Francis time to ſend troops into Italy, under the command of Lautrec, who was declared general of the league he had newly concluded with the Venetians. As for the duke of Urbino, he continued in the Milaneſe with part of the Venetian army.

Lautrec arrived in Piedmont in July, with part of the army he was to command. The marquis of Saluzzo was ordered to join him with his Italians, and the Switzers were to come preſently after. Whilſt he was employed in conqueſts of little moment, waiting the junction of all his forces, Andrea Doria, who had quitted the pope's ſervice, and commanded the French gallies, to which he had joined eight others of his own, found means to reduce the city of Genoa under Francis's dominion. This was a good opening of a campaign, which ſeemed to promiſe an advantageous ſucceſs in the reſt of the war, eſpecially as Lautrec, after aſſembling his whole army, conſiſting of twenty-five thouſand men, became maſter of Vigevano, Alexandria, and Pavia. Sforza and the Venetians earneſtly preſſed him to beſiege Milan, but he ſhewed them poſitive orders to march to Naples. The king of France took care not to employ his army to conquer the duchy of Milan, which by the treaty of league was to be reſtored to Sforza, after which the Venetians would give themſelves but little trouble to accompliſh his attempt upon Naples. Beſides, he ſtill hoped, that by conſenting the emperor ſhould keep Milan, he might recover his ſons, whereas in reſtoring Sforza he ſhould deprive himſelf of that means. Lautrec therefore began his march to the kingdom of Naples, but with ſuch ſlowneſs and affected delays, that it was evident he had private orders not to make too much haſte. And, indeed, it was at the time that Francis expected the emperor's final anſwer to the offers made him by his and Henry's embaſſadors. Lautrec long halted at Parma and Placentia, which had opened their gates to him. Mean while, the duke of Ferrara joined with France, as well on account of Lautrec's march, who might have eaſily ravaged his country, as of Francis's offer to give in marriage to his ſon Hercules, Renée of France, ſecond daughter of Lewis XII. The duke of Mantua preſently after followed his example.

Mean while, the emperor ſeeing the ill effects of the pope's captivity, had diſpatched the general of the order of St. Francis to the viceroy of Naples, with orders to releaſe the pope. The general, finding the viceroy ſeized with a diſtemper, whereof he died in a few days, delivered the orders to Hugo de Moncada to be executed. The emperor had given general inſtructions that the pope ſhould be bound to pay the arrears due to the army, and give ſecurity, after having his liberty, to forſake the league. But as it was not eaſy for the pope to find pledges, or the money neceſſary to pay the army, the negotiation was prolonged. Mean while he continually ſolicited Lautrec, by private meſſengers, to approach Rome, in order to facilitate his deliverance. But Lautrec had poſitive orders which hindered him from making haſte; and yet his march, though ſlow, was of good ſervice to the pope. Moncada ſeeing the kingdom of Naples was going to be invaded, and that it was not poſſible to lead thither the imperial army which was at Rome, without giving them money, concluded at laſt [b] a treaty with the pope to this effect:

I. That the pope ſhould not oppoſe the emperor in the affairs of Naples or Milan.

II. That he ſhould grant the emperor a cruſade in Spain, and a tenth in the reſt of his dominions.

III. That the emperor ſhould keep Civita Vecchia, Oſtia, Citta Caſtellana, and the caſtle of Furli.

IV. That the pope ſhould pay down to the German troops ſixty thouſand ducats, and thirty-five thouſand to the Spaniards.

V. That in a fortnight after he ſhould pay them another certain ſum, and within three months all the reſt that was due to the emperor, amounting to above three hundred and fifty thouſand ducats.

VI. That till the two firſt payments were made, the pope ſhould be conducted to ſome ſafe place out of Rome, and give hoſtages.

The treaty being ſigned, and the cardinals of Ceſis and Orſino delivered in hoſtage, it was agreed, that on the 10th of December the pope ſhould be taken out of the caſtle of St. Angelo, and conducted to a place appointed. But as he was afraid of a longer confinement, becauſe he was unable to perform the treaty, he eſcaped in diſguiſe the night before, and ſhut himſelf up in Orvieto.

When Lautrec heard that the pope was at liberty, he reſtored to him the city of Parma, and marched to Bologna, where he ſtaid three weeks, expecting freſh orders from the king. Some days after, he received a letter from Clement VII. acknowleging himſelf indebted to him for his liberty; intimating withal, that, having been forced to grant the imperialiſts whatever they required, he did not think himſelf obliged to perform his engagements.

It was whilſt the pope was priſoner in the caſtle of St. Angelo, that Henry's divorce was ſet on foot: a momentous affair, if ever there was one, as well in itſelf as on account of the parties concerned, and chiefly for its effects. It was not yet thirty years ſince Lewis XII. put away his wife, without any difficulty or much noiſe in the world. Henry VIII. had a mind to attempt the ſame thing, and though ſupported with much more plauſible reaſons, he met with inſuperable obſtacles, not to be ſurmounted without an extraordinary method, which gave occaſion to the eſtabliſhment of the reformation in England. This effect diſtinguiſhed Henry VIIIth's divorce from ſo many others, which are but ſlightly mentioned by hiſtorians. The writers upon this ſubject, being either catholics or proteſtants, have conſidered it variouſly. The catholics have drawn arguments from thence againſt the reformation in England, and repreſented Henry's divorce as the next and immediate cauſe of the change of religion; whereas the proteſtants affirm, it was only the occaſion. Three Engliſh authors eſpecially, have written the hiſtory of this divorce, beſides many others of the ſame nation, or foreigners who have ſpoke of it in their works. Sanderus, or rather Sanders, author of the Origin and Progreſs of the Engliſh Schiſm, makes it his buſineſs to defame Henry VIII. and ſhews, that the reformation in England, which he terms ſchiſm, entirely ſprung from Henry's paſſion for Anne Bullen. He fancied by that to give a mortal wound to the reformation, and cauſe the world to think that a ſuperſtructure, raiſed on ſuch a foundation, could not be the work of God. The lord Herbert, in his hiſtory of Henry VIII. contents himſelf with a bare recital of the events of this reign, whereof the divorce is one of the principal, without many reaſonings, leaving his readers to make inferences from the facts he relates. Doctor Burnet, intending to write the hiſtory of the reformation of England, made it his chief aim, in ſpeaking of Henry's divorce, to ſhew, that though it occaſioned the reformation, it was only by accident. For this reaſon he has endeavoured to refute the palpable falſehoods aſſerted by Sanders in his hiſtory. He has ſucceeded ſo well, that no ſincere man can for the future acknowlege Sanders for a writer worthy of credit.

The ſequel of my hiſtory obliges me to ſpeak of this famous divorce. I ſhould be inclined to refer the reader to the forementioned excellent hiſtory of the reformation of England, known to all the world, and to which it is difficult to make any additions, but it would not be reaſonable to oblige the readers to remember what they have read in that hiſtory, or to peruſe it again. Wherefore I ſhall chooſe, in purſuing the thread of my hiſtory, to relate this event, which is as the hinge whereon do turn numberleſs other things, which that illuſtrious author had occaſion only to mention, but which I muſt more fully explain, becauſe our ends are different. His aim in ſpeaking of Henry VIIIth's affairs with the pope, the emperor, and the king of France, was to illuſtrate the hiſtory of the reformation, and mine is not to meddle with the affairs of religion, any farther than they relate to the other events of this reign.

Henry had been married eighteen years to Catherine of Arragon, and by her had three children, whereof one was living when he formed the deſign to put her away. He alleged, as the principal reaſon, his ſcruples for marrying his brother's widow. But, as it is pretended, theſe ſcruples troubled him not till he was in love with Anne Bullen, one of the queen's maids of honour, it is inferred, that his doubts concerning the validity of his marriage, ſprung from this new paſſion, and without that would never have exiſted [c]. Accordingly, ſome labour to ſhew his divorce had no other foundation than his love for that lady. Others again endeavour to prove, that his love and his ſcruples were independent of each other. For my part, I ſhould think it needleſs to accuſe or juſtify Henry, with regard to the concerns of religion, if there was not ſome neceſſity to illuſtrate this matter with reſpect to the hiſtory. By illuſtrating, I mean, ſhewing the impoſſibility of giving a certain judgment about it. But before all things, it is neceſſary to deſcribe the perſon, who, as it is pretended, was the prime cauſe of the king's divorce, and of all the conſequences thereof.

Anne Bullen [d] was of a good, though a noble family. Sir Thomas Bullen, her father, married a ſiſter of the duke of Norfolk [e], and by her had Anne, born according to Camden in 1507, about two year's before Henry VIIIth's acceſſion to the throne. Thomas Bullen, her father, was twice embaſſador to France, firſt in 1515, and again in 1527. He was made viſcount Rochford in 1525, and afterwards earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond [f]. Anne, his daughter, being but ſeven years old, was carried into France in 1514, when Mary the king's ſiſter, went and conſummated her marriage at Abbeville, with Lewis XII. That queen being re-married ſhortly after to the duke of Suffolk, and returning into England, Anne Bullen was left in France. It is pretended, ſhe then entered into the ſervice of Francis Iſt's queen, though ſhe was but eight years of age, but it is not ſaid in what quality. It is certain, a girl of her age was not capable of doing much ſervice. So it may be preſumed, her beauty, genteelneſs, or the livelineſs of her wit, made queen Claude deſirous to keep her about her. Camden affirms, ſhe retained her in her ſervice to the day of her death, which happened in July 1524, and ſays not that Anne ever took a journey into England all that time. But du Tillet, and du Pleix, French authors, pretend, ſhe came over in 1522. The lord Herbert ſays the ſame thing; but, without citing any particular author, contents himſelf with ſaying, it appears in hiſtory. Camden affirms, Anne remained in France, not only till queen Claude's death, but that, after ſhe had loſt her miſtreſs, ſhe was taken into ſervice by the ducheſs of Alençon, Francis's ſiſter. However, he does not ſay when ſhe quitted it. Others affirm, ſir Thomas Bullen brought his daughter to England when he returned from his embaſſy. His embaſſy of 1515, cannot here be meant, ſince it is unanimouſly agreed, that Anne was in queen Claude's ſervice after queen Mary's departure, and continued ſeveral years in the court of France. It muſt therefore be his embaſſy of 1527. But it is likely Bullen was not ſent to France till September 1527; ſince his ſole commiſſion was to ſee the treaty of the 30th of April, of the ſame year, ſworn to, which Francis had not ratified ſooner than the 18th of Auguſt, as appears in the collection of the public acts [g]. But, as before his departure the affair of the divorce was already commenced, it may be affirmed the king's love for his daughter was later than his reſolution concerning the divorce, if it be true that Anne returned to England with her father about the end of the year 1527. Indeed it may be objected, that two French authors aſſert, that Anne went over to England in 1522, and that it was then the king fell in love with her. But it may be replied, firſt, that it is very ſtrange theſe two hiſtorians, who wrote long after the fact, ſhould meet with memoirs of the journey of a maid of honour, and the more, as they cite nothing to ſupport their teſtimony. Secondly, ſuppoſing it were ſo, they do not ſay Anne ſtayed in England. Conſequently they deſtroy not Camden's teſtimony, who affirms, Anne ſerved queen Claude till 1524, and afterwards the ducheſs of Alençon. But if it be true that Anne took a journey into England in 1522, and the king then fell in love with her, it cannot be ſuppoſed ſhe returned to France, becauſe the rupture between the two crowns happening that year, it is not likely that in time of war an Engliſh woman ſhould go and ſerve a queen of France. Beſides, if the king was then in love, would he have ſuffered Anne to depart the kingdom? Camden, therefore, or the two French authors, muſt have been miſtaken. This is a difficulty not to be eaſily ſolved.

But there is a fact which paſſes for certain, namely, that Anne Bullen, being twenty years old, was taken into queen Catherine's ſervice as maid of honour. Now this muſt have been in 1527, ſince ſhe was born 1507. Accordingly, this is the time to which the beginning of the king's love may moſt properly be fixed. But ſtill this is only a conjecture, which, were it well grounded, would be a ſufficient proof that the king's divorce was not an effect of his paſſion; ſince it was reſolved before the end of the year 1526. My aim in this enquiry, is to ſhew that the time of Anne Bullen's return into England is very uncertain, and the beginning of the king's affection no leſs ſo. How then can it be ſo boldly affirmed, as it is by ſome, that love for Anne Bullen inſpired the king with the thoughts of annulling his marriage with Catherine? We must see now, whether it be easier to discover the time when Henry resolved to sue for his divorce.

When Henry VII. concluded his son's marriage with Catherine, prince Arthur's widow, archbishop Warham told him plainly, it was contrary to the law of God, which the pope could not dispense with. The king, without doubt, was touched with this remonstrance. The very day the prince, his son, entered into his 14th year, he caused him to make, against his marriage, a secret protestation, though before trusty witnesses, declaring he was constrained to give his consent. After that, the king, on his death bed, strictly charged the prince not to consummate his marriage with Catherine. Notwithstanding all this, Henry VIII. being come to the crown, espoused the princess, contrary to Warham's opinion, to which he preferred that of the bishop of Winchester. He had by her three children [h], two sons and a daughter, of whom the sons died soon after their birth. He afterwards affirmed, that he considered the untimely death of his two sons as God's curse on his marriage, especially when he saw the queen had done breeding. It happened afterwards, that Charles V. who was affianced to the princess Mary, refused to marry her, upon the council of Spain's questioning the princess's legitimacy. After that, when a marriage was treating between Mary and king Francis, or the duke of Orleans, the bishop of Tarbe, the French embassador, made the same objection, maintaining, that the princess could not be deemed born in wedlock, notwithstanding Julius II.'s dispensation.

All these things were more than sufficient to raise scruples in the king's mind concerning his marriage. But though in an assembly of lords, which he afterwards called, to inform them of his reasons for a divorce, he affirmed, the bishop of Tarbe's objection inspired him with the first thoughts of inquiring into the matter; it appears, however, that his scruples began sooner. For in a letter [i] afterwards to Grynæs, he told him, he had abstained from the queen ever since the year 1524.

But supposing it could be discovered at what time Henry begun, either by himself, or by the suggestion of others, to be troubled with these scruples, it would signify nothing with respect to his resolution concerning the divorce, which in all appearance was taken much later. Polydore Virgil says, Longland, bishop of Lincoln, the king's confessor, laboured to persuade him of the necessity of the divorce by cardinal Wolsey's order, but mentions not the time. All the historians affirm, the king had recourse himself to Thomas Aquina's works to clear his doubts, and caused the bishops to be consulted upon that subject. But none of them say at what time this was done. It is well known, secretary Knight was dispatched to Rome about this affair in July 1527, but then the rumour of the king's meditating a divorce had already reached the court of Spain, as appears in the cardinal's letter to the king from Abbeville [k]. It is also very probable, that before he engaged in this affair, Henry had considered of it some time before. It is scarce to be supposed a resolution of this nature can be taken lightly, or when taken, immediately executed, without thoroughly weighing the difficulties, or waiting a favourable juncture. Henry said himself, that the bishop of Tarbe raised in him the thought of annulling his marriage. But if it be true, as some affirm, that the bishop spoke only as directed by cardinal Wolsey, it may be presumed the project of the divorce was formed some time before, and this embassador made to speak, only to have an excuse to commence the affair. This is what seems to me extremely probable. Indeed it is not likely the embassador, after thus questioning Mary's legitimacy, would have concluded the marriage of the king, his master, or of the duke of Orleans, with that princess, had he not acted in concert with the court of England. These then are my thoughts, which I submit to the reader's judgment.

Ever since Francis was freed from his captivity, he had never ceased to press Henry to join with him in an offensive league against the emperor. But Henry had constantly excused himself, without even suffering him to entertain the least hopes in that respect. However, lord Herbert says, that about the end of the year 1526, Henry, of his own accord, sent an embassador to France, to propose the league, so eagerly desired by Francis, and to offer him his daughter Mary in marriage. This proceeding gives occasion to believe he had now resolved upon the divorce, and foreseeing how much the emperor would oppose it, intended so to embarras him as to oblige him to court his friendship. Upon this supposition it may naturally be conjectured, that he proposed the marriage of his daughter with the king of France, only to convince the emperor that he really designed to be strictly united with France. But at the same time, it is very likely he informed Francis of the obstacle which would occur in the execution of his pretended project, namely, the divorce of the princess's mother, which he was meditating. This conjecture is confirmed by the coldness wherewith these two monarchs treated of the marriage. In the first place, Henry left it to the king of France's choice, to have Mary himself, or to leave her to his second son, as if this alternative were the same thing. In the next place, when Francis declared he would leave Mary to the duke of Orleans, the treating more fully concerning the marriage was deferred to another time. In the third place, in the treaty Francis and the cardinal concluded at Abbeville, they took care to insert this clause: "that though the marriage should not be effected, the treaty however should subsist." In fine, though Knight was at Rome, or on his way thither, when the treaty of Abbeville was concluded, it does not appear Francis ever complained to Henry, that he had offered him a princess whom he was labouring to bastardize by prosecuting his divorce with the queen her mother. On the contrary, he assisted him to the utmost of his power to obtain his desires. But he must have looked upon the offer as an affront, had they not understood one another. If this conjecture has any foundation, it may be inferred, that the resolution concerning the divorce was taken at least about the end of the year 1526, though the execution was deferred till the middle of the next year. But in that case, it would therefore be true, that the king had resolved upon the divorce before his passion for Anne Bullen, who, in all appearance, returned not into England sooner than October 1527.

From what has been said it may be gathered, that to affirm with any probability that Henry's passion for Anne Bullen was the cause of his divorce with Catherine, these queries must be decided in favour of that opinion. At what time did Anne Bullen return into England? When did the king's love for her first begin? When was it that he came to a resolution concerning his divorce? But upon all these questions, conjectures only, as I have observed, can properly be formed. Thus much is certain, that between the resolution about the divorce, and the beginning of the king's love, there was no great distance of time. Here we must stop. But it is going too far to ground upon this nearness, as a certain fact, that Henry undertook the prosecution of his divorce with Catherine, on purpose to marry Anne Bullen. I say, moreover, that though there was no difficulty about the times, and they exactly corresponded, yet as to what passed in the king's breast, it would be only conjecture.

I have enlarged a little on this point, because the illustrious author of the history of the reformation seems to leave it in the dark. Besides, I thought it requisite to curb the overconfident, by informing the readers of what is true, and what doubtful in the matter. We see it in many histories, and hear it every day positively affirmed, as if there was no difficulty, that Henry's love for Anne Bullen was the sole cause of his divorce with Catherine of Arragon, though, as I have shewn, it can only be said by conjecture, and the conjecture itself does not countenance that notion. Not that Henry VIII. is to be considered as a prince incapable of being misled by his passion, even to the sacrificing Catherine of Arragon to Anne Bullen. Why should he have been more scrupulous with respect to Catherine, than he was with regard to Anne herself? whom he made no difficulty to sacrifice to a third wife, as will hereafter be seen. He was a prince of an impetuous temper, who could bear no opposition to his will. The flatteries of his subjects, and the extravagant praises continually bestowed on him by the sovereigns who stood in need of him, had possessed him with such a conceit of his own merit, that he imagined his actions ought to have been the standard of good sense, reason, and justice. When therefore it is said, his love for Anne Bullen caused him eagerly to push the affair of his divorce, of which otherwise the difficulties would perhaps have discouraged him, nothing is affirmed repugnant to his character. Only care must be taken, not to assert for an undoubted truth, what is but a bare conjecture.

However this be, without dwelling longer upon the king's secret motives, and endeavouring to discover his thoughts, which lie hid from human eyes, let us content ourselves with what he published himself. In the first place, he said, he was troubled in conſcience for his marriage with Catherine; and indeed he had but too much reaſon. The wonder is, that he had not theſe ſcruples more early. He had married his brother's widow, and found it forbidden by the law of Moſes. It is true, he had the pope's diſpenſation. But he could not be ignorant that many learned divines were of opinion, that the pope could not diſpenſe with the laws of God. This was ſufficient to give him very juſt ſcruples. As ſoon as theſe doubts had poſſeſſed him, he was willing to clear them, and found in Thomas Aquinas what he had perhaps inattentively read many times: firſt, that the levitical laws are moral and eternal: ſecondly, that the pope cannot diſpenſe with the laws of God, becauſe to diſpenſe with a law, one muſt be ſuperior [or equal] to the law-giver. This deciſion of a divine, for whom he had a great eſteem, confirming his ſcruples, he deſired archbiſhop Warham, who had formerly declared againſt the marriage, to conſult the biſhops of England upon the occaſion. Some affirm, that Longland his confeſſor cheriſhed his doubts, by the private orders of cardinal Wolſey, which is not improbable. The queen was aunt of the emperor, with whom Wolſey had reaſon to be diſpleaſed. Beſides, the favourite loved not the queen herſelf, becauſe ſhe could not help ſhewing how much ſhe was offended, that a biſhop, a cardinal, a legate of the holy ſee, ſhould lead ſo ſcandalous a life. However this be, ſoon after the archbiſhop preſented to the king a writing, under the hands and ſeals of all the biſhops, wherein they condemned his marriage, as contrary to common decency, and the law of God. Only Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, refuſing to ſet his hand, it is ſaid the archbiſhop made another write his name unknown to him [l]. But the biſhops were not the only perſons of this opinion. Since Luther's works began to appear, many people in England were put out of their former high conceit of the papal power. As therefore the validity of the king's marriage was wholly founded on Julius II.'s diſpenſation, is was publicly diſputed whether the diſpenſation could authoriſe a marriage ſo notoriouſly repugnant to the law of God: nay, many, who were otherwiſe ſtrongly attached to the court of Rome, could not reliſh the doctrine of the pope's diſpenſing with the divine laws. All theſe things conſpired either to breed or confirm the king's ſcruples.

This

But it was not only ſcruples of conſcience that Henry alleged to juſtify his deſign. He pretended, that though he were regardleſs of his ſalvation, or able to overcome his ſcruples, the good of his people required the prevention of an inconvenience which was eaſily to be foreſeen. He had but one daughter, and very likely ſhould have no more children, if his marriage were not annulled. If therefore, after his deceaſe, the validity of his marriage with Catherine ſhould come to be queſtioned, he foreſaw England would again be involved, on account of the ſucceſſion, in troubles from whence it was but juſt freed. Mary his daughter, the king of Scotland his nephew, the queen dowager of France, could equally pretend to the crown, upon very plauſible reaſons. Mary could allege the pope's diſpenſation againſt ſuch as ſhould charge her with her being born of an unlawful marriage. The king of Scotland, who was next heir after her, could maintain the diſpenſation was not valid. The queen dowager, the king's ſiſter, could allege, that the firſt was illegitimate, and the ſecond a foreigner. Theſe ſeveral claims might eaſily kindle a civil war in England, where it was but too viſible that each would find adherents, not to mention the foreign ſuccours they might be ſupported with. Henry therefore imagined there was but one way to prevent this danger, namely, by annulling his marriage, and taking another wife, by whom with God's bleſſing he might have ſons. He to whom the ſecrets of all hearts are open, can only know for certain, whether this thought was inſtilled into him by the danger he foreſaw, by his averſion to the queen, or by his love for Anne Bullen. But however this may be, independently of the ſeveral motives aſcribed to him, it is certain, there was great danger of the kingdom's being one day expoſed to a civil war, if the king remained till death in his preſent ſtate, and he ſaw no other way to come out of it than by annulling his marriage. It is true, he foreſaw great oppoſition from the emperor the queen's nephew, who was then very powerful. But on the other hand, as that monarch had himſelf ſhewn on this occaſion ſcruples, which hindered him from eſpouſing Mary, Henry hoped he would not obſtinately maintain what he had himſelf queſtioned. Beſides, the juncture ſeemed very favourable for his purpoſe. The pope, who was priſoner in the caſtle of St. Angelo, ſeemed to have no other reſource to be reſtored to his former ſtate, than the aſſiſtance of France and England; and Henry did not queſtion that Francis, who ſtood in need of him, would promote his proceedings to the utmoſt of his power. As to the reſt, he never doubted the pope's authority, reckoning that Clement VII. could revoke a diſpenſation granted by Julius II. Nay, cardinal Wolſey warranted the ſucceſs of the affair; whether he had already gained the pope, or imagined that Clement in his preſent circumſtances could deny the king nothing. So it was reſolved the ſuit ſhould be moved in the court of Rome, or cauſe the marriage to be annulled.

The beſt reaſon that could be alleged was, That Julius's diſpenſation was contrary to the divine law, and that alone ought to have been ſufficient. But it would have been imprudent to begin with diſputing the prerogative of the Roman pontiffs, when a favour was to be aſked of the court of Rome. Recourſe therefore was to be had to another expedient, which was to find nullities in Julius's bull, and to ſhew it was procured by falſe ſurmiſes and untrue ſuggeſtions, which rendered the bull revocable, even according to the rules of the court of the Rota [m]. And this was not very difficult. The bull was grounded upon Henry's and Catherine's requeſt, ſetting forth, that the marriage was neceſſary to preſerve peace between England and Spain. And here were found two reaſons for revoking the bull. The firſt, that Henry being then but twelve years old, could not be deemed to have any political views; whence it was inferred that the requeſt was not his own. The ſecond, that the ſuggeſtion was falſe; ſince as matters then ſtood between Spain and England, the marriage was not at all neceſſary for the preſervation of peace between the two crowns, and conſequently Julius II. had been ſurpriſed. Another nullity was found, as the bull having no other foundation than the maintenance of peace and union between Henry VII. and the king and queen of Spain, this reaſon ceaſed when the marriage was conſummated, ſince Henry VII. and Iſabella were now dead. In fine, it was alleged that Henry VIII. having proteſted againſt his marriage before conſummation, thereby renounced the liberty granted him by the bull, and therefore another bull was neceſſary to render the marriage valid. But all theſe reaſons were produced only to afford the pope a pretence to revoke Julius's diſpenſation. For, if the repugnancy of the diſpenſation to the divine law was not the real foundation of ſuing for the divorce, nothing would have been more eaſy for the pope, than to quiet the king's conſcience, by confirming whatever had been done by a new bull.

Mean while, as the pope's compliance was not doubted in his preſent circumſtances, the king ſent doctor Knight ſecretary of ſtate to Rome, to deſire him to ſign four inſtruments drawn in England. The firſt was a commiſſion to cardinal Wolſey, to try and decide the affair with ſome Engliſh biſhops. The ſecond was a bull decretal, declaring the king's marriage with Catherine void, becauſe Arthur's with the ſame princeſs was conſummated. By the third, the pope granted the king a diſpenſation to marry another wife. By the fourth, he promiſed never to repeal any of the three foregoing acts.

Knight departed from England in July, about the time the cardinal began his journey to confer with the king of France [n]. But as the pope was priſoner, and guarded by a Spaniſh captain, it was impoſſible for Knight to have an audience. He found means however to convey to him a memorial [o], containing the ſum of his commiſſion, to which the pope returned a favourable anſwer. He made believe he would grant whatever the king deſired, though the emperor had already required him, by the general of the Franciſcans, not to do any thing in that affair, without communicating it to his miniſters. By the way, this ſhews Henry had reſolved long before to ſue for his divorce; ſince the emperor had time to hear of it, and ſend to the pope. As it was not practicable for Knight to treat with the pope in perſon, the matter was carried no farther at that time. At length the news of the pope's going to be releaſed, reaching England, cardinal Wolſey wrote to ſir Gregory Caſſali [p], the king's ordinary embaſſador at Rome, to order him to join with Knight, and preſs the pope to grant the king's requeſt. This letter was worded in very ſtrong terms, and ſhewed the cardinal's deſire that the divorce ſhould be effected. It was dated the 5th of Decem-

[l] This particular is not very certain. See Burnet's Ref. tom. III. p. 38. It was ſigned on July 1, by Warham, Tunſtal, Fiſher, and the biſhops of Carliſle, Ely, St. Aſaph, Lincoln, and Bath.

Clement VII. being retired to Orvieto, Knight went [r] and talked with him about the affair. The pope owned he had received his memorial, and promised again to do all that lay in his power for the king's satisfaction, but prayed him not to be too hasty. His circumstances then were such, that he did not yet know whether he should want the king of England, or whether the emperor would agree with him. Wherefore he desired to gain time, in order to proceed as should best suit with his interest. But for that reason, and because the king's orders were urgent and positive, Knight would not delay his negotiation. He earnestly pressed the pope, who promised at last to sign the instruments, on condition no use should be made of them till the Germans and Spaniards were departed out of Italy. Knight willingly accepted of the condition, imagining, when the instruments, ready signed, were in the king's hands, he would use them when he pleased. But the pope was not easily to be deceived. Whilst he feigned to have no other view than to satisfy the king, he was only contriving to gain time, being ready to sacrifice him if he found it for his advantage. He used therefore all his art to prolong the affair, by means unsuspected by the king. To that end he told Knight, that before the instruments were executed he should be glad to talk with the cardinal Sanctorum quatuor.

The pope having thus engaged himself, Knight and Cassali fancied they had no more to do than to prepossess in the king's favour the cardinal, whom the pope intended to consult. They were at no great pains to succeed, since, besides ten thousand ducats which they had in hand to reward such as should do them service, they were empowered to make what farther promises they should think fit in the king's name. The cardinal, examining the instruments sent from England, found very great faults, particularly in the legate's commission, and took upon him to draw one more perfect. Which done, Knight and Cassali waited on the pope and pressed him to sign. He did not absolutely refuse, but said, the emperor having required him not to act in that business without imparting it to him, it was necessary to find some expedient to excuse so hasty a proceeding: That therefore it would be proper to cause Lautrec to march towards Orvieto, and press him, in his master's name, to give the king of England satisfaction. Lautrec being then at Bologna, to get him to march to Orvieto, there would have been occasion for orders from the court of France, which would have taken up much time. Wherefore Henry's agents rejected the expedient, their aim being to finish the affair before the emperor had notice thereof. At last the pope, finding himself extremely pressed, delivered to them the commission for cardinal Wolsey, with the bull of dispensation for the king [s], and promised to send into England the bull decretal to null the marriage [t]. But here the pope used an artifice, which the agents perhaps did not sufficiently consider. He dated these two instruments from the time he was prisoner in the castle of St. Angelo. So, when the king had them in his power, he did not think fit to make use of them, lest it should be objected that the pope had granted them only with design to obtain his liberty by the assistance he expected from England. Besides, all acts executed by a prisoner may be deemed void, whereof the treaty of Madrid was a late instance. Thus, how urgent soever the king was to end the affair, he found, at the close of the year 1527, that he had yet made no progress.

[1528.] Clement VII. had time, during his captivity, seriously to reflect upon his past conduct; which had been very unsuccessful, because he had swerved from the maxims of his most able predecessors. He had preposterously engaged in a war with the emperor, whereas Alexander VI. Julius II. and Leo X. after sowing dissention among the princes, left them for the most part to decide their quarrels, and then sided with the strongest, or, if they engaged in a war, it was commonly at other people's expence. But Clement VII. after draining his treasure in maintaining an army, had lost Florence, Parma, Reggio, Rome itself, with the best part of the ecclesiastical state, and seen himself captive and ransomed. This was sufficient to make him wiser, and take another course. As soon as the embassadors of France, England, and Venice, saw him secure at Orvieto, from the outrages of the imperialists, they pressed him to declare against the emperor. They thought, if he could not assist the league with temporal arms, he might at least by means of his spiritual, embroil the common enemy, whom he seemed to have no reason to regard. But he himself considered the affair in a different light. Having learned, by sad experience, that he had been the dupe of his allies, he resolved to be no longer guided by their interested councils. So, without discovering his thoughts, he only told them, that his joining in the league would only draw upon him fresh mischiefs, without procuring them any advantage: that besides, it was necessary, for the benefit of Christendom, there should be a mediator for procuring peace, and that was all he could do in the state he was reduced to. Nevertheless, he intimated to them that he might take other measures, if Lautrec approached, to oblige the emperor's troops to abandon Rome. This indeed was his sole aim, to free the ecclesiastical state from that foreign army, in order to be able to act more agreeably to his interest.

At last, Lautrec, departing from Bologna the 9th of January, took the road to Naples, having first sent the prince of Vaudemont and la Trimouille to the pope to press him to declare. But Clement found means to excuse himself without, however, a positive denial. He saw, as I may say, all Europe in motion, and was willing to wait the success of the war in order to take juster measures than before. So it was not possible by any means to bring him to a declaration. He only made believe, that if Francis and Henry would cause Ravenna and Cervia to be restored to him, he would join with them. This was an advantage he would willingly have reaped from their instances, without being debarred from finding some other evasion, to prevent his declaring after the recovery of these two places. Mean while, he was thinking how to treat secretly with the emperor, from whom he had greater expectations than from his allies. Indeed, his chief aim being to restore the house of the Medici to the government of Florence, he perceived that he could not accomplish it without the emperor's help, since the allies were concerned to support the Florentines, who were become parties in the league. But it would have been imprudent in him to declare for the emperor, when that monarch was weak in Italy, and so powerful an army was marching to invade the kingdom of Naples. It was therefore necessary for him to wait till the event of the war enabled him to resolve with safety. This was the true reason which obliged him to use many artifices to try to displease neither the emperor, nor the king of France, nor the king of England. If, instead of unadvisedly engaging in a war, he had before taken this course, he might have sold his favours at any rate. At least, he would not have had the mortification to be a captive in Rome itself.

But though the pope refused to declare, the kings of France and England were not the less eager in the pursuit of their projects. On the 21st of January 1528, their embassadors in Spain demanded the emperor's leave to retire, and the next day Clarenceux and Guienne, heralds, one of England, the other of France, proclaimed war against him. This was done with great solemnity, the emperor being seated on his throne, and attended by all his grandees. He answered each in particular, but in a very different manner. Speaking to the English herald, he made use of civil and honourable terms, denoting, he was not at all pleased with having the king his master for an enemy. He complained however that Henry had used him ill in designing to give him in marriage a princess whom he proposed to bastardize, since he was suing to be divorced from the queen her mother. But he threw all the blame on the boundless ambition of cardinal Wolsey. He said the cardinal would have obliged him to employ his arms in Italy to make him pope, and thought himself injured, because he would not disturb the peace of Christendom for his sake. As for the sums of which Henry demanded payment, he denyed, he had ever refused to discharge the debt. But added, that the English embassadors, not having brought with them the original obligation, nor even a power to give him a discharge, Henry was in the wrong to complain. As to the indemnity he demanded, he knew the king of France had taken it upon him in the treaty of Madrid. As for the penalty of five hundred thousand crowns, in case he refused to marry the princess Mary, he replied, it was not his fault: that he had demanded her of the king her father by embassadors sent on purpose, and that Henry had refused to send her: that besides, before that time Henry had offered her to the king of Scotland: in ſhort, that he could not lawfully claim that ſum, before he had proved that he had himſelf performed all the articles of the treaty of Windſor. Such was the emperor's anſwer to the declaration of war made by Henry's herald. In his anſwer to the French herald, he ſpoke not with ſo much regard and caution. He plainly accuſed Francis of breach of faith, and charged the herald to put him in mind of the meſſage he ſent him by the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux his embaſſador, "That it would be better for them to decide their quarrel by ſingle combat," but that he had not received any anſwer. Probaby, the embaſſador had not thought fit to deliver that meſſage to the king, ſince he ſeemed extremely ſurpriſed when he heard it from the herald's mouth. In a few days he ſent the ſame herald to the emperor, with a challenge under his own hand, wherein he gave him the lie in form, and required him to aſſure him the field to fight hand to hand. The challenge was dated March 28, 1528. The emperor ſent his anſwer by one of his heralds, who was charged to tell him, by word of mouth, very diſagreeable things. The herald coming to Paris could not obtain leave without great difficulty, to put on [u] his coat of arms when he entered the city. The king expected him on his throne, ſurrounded with a great number of princes and lords. But he had ſcarce begun to ſpeak, before the king interrupted him, and demanded, whether he had brought the ſecurity of the field, and that all the reſt was to no purpoſe. Thus ended the affair, which had now made great noiſe. The two monarchs gave public marks of their courage, by their mutual challenges, and yet there was no great labour required to prevent them from deciding their quarrel in a way ſo uncommon to great princes.

Hugo de Mendoſa, the emperor's embaſſador at London, hearing what had paſſed in Spain, would have retired. But cardinal Wolſey [w] ſent him word that Clarenceux had exceeded his inſtructions in proclaiming war againſt the emperor, and ſhould be puniſhed at his return. Whereupon the embaſſador ſent an expreſs to inform the emperor of what the cardinal had ſaid. Clarenceux, who was ſtill in Spain, ſurpriſed that he ſhould be made accountable for what he had expreſs orders, demanded and obtained an authentic copy of the embaſſador's letter [x]. Upon his arrival in England, he waited on the king [y], before he ſpoke with the cardinal, and ſhewed him the letter, with three others, written with the cardinal's own hand, whereby he gave him expreſs orders to declare war againſt the emperor. Henry, aſtoniſhed at his miniſter's preſumption, fell into a great paſſion with him before the whole court. Nay, he would perhaps have entirely diſgraced him, had he not been withheld by the conſideration of the affair of the divorce, wherein he could not proceed without him. He made him however undergo a terrible mortification, by cauſing the affair to be examined in the council. This inquiry would doubtleſs have been fatal to the miniſter, if the king had been pleaſed to purſue it; but he was contented with the cardinal's proteſtation, that he thought to have acted agreeably to his majeſty's intentions.

The emperor's anſwer to Clarenceux being made public in England, by the Spaniſh embaſſador's means, the cardinal was afraid it would cauſe ill effects among the people, conſidering the weakneſs of the motives alleged by the king for undertaking the war. For that reaſon he aſſembled in the Star Chamber [z] all the great lords then at court [a], to whom he made a ſpeech, aggravating as much as poſſible the injuries the king had received from the emperor, and his reaſons to demand ſatisfaction by arms. But let him ſay what he would, though every one outwardly applauded him, what the emperor ſaid to the herald, that the war was cauſed only by the cardinal's private diſcontent, made deeper impreſſion than all the argumeats the miniſter could allege [b]. The people openly exclaimed againſt a war which was going to ruin the kingdom, to gratify the favourite's paſſion. Nay, ſome went farther than murmurs. As the trade with the Low Countries was interrupted by the declaration of war, and the merchants would buy no more cloth which they could not vend, the clothiers roſe in arms [c]. Whereupon the cardinal ordered the merchants to buy the cloths as uſual, threatening, in caſe of refuſal, to buy them himſelf, and ſell them to the foreigners. But they made a jeſt of this threat, and continued obſtinate, reſolving not to render themſelves liable to inevitable loſſes for his ſake. An embaſſy from the governeſs of the Low Countries [d] to the king, whilſt theſe things were in agitation, freed the cardinal from his embarraſment. The embaſſadors acquainting him, that if the king pleaſed to conſent to a truce with the Low Countries, for the mutual benefit of trade, the governeſs would readily agree to it; this overture being debated in council, it was reſolved, notwithſtanding the French embaſſador's oppoſition, to agree to a truce for eight months, which was ſigned the 8th of June.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, the affairs of Italy were in ſuch a ſituation as gave Francis room to expect Lautrec's expedition in the kingdom of Naples would be crowned with ſucceſs, though afterwards it ended very unfortunately for him. Lautrec going from Bologna the 9th of January, arrived the 10th of February on the borders of Naples, and, marching into Abruzzo, became maſter of that province, and afterwards of part of Aulia. It was not without extreme difficulty that the prince of Orange obliged the Imperialiſts to quit Rome, where, for ten months, they had exerciſed all ſorts of rapine and violence. Though the Imperial army went not from Rome till the 17th of February, they got before Lautrec, who had taken a longer way in order to procure money, which he wanted exceedingly; the king of France, according to cuſtom, not having ſent him what he had promiſed. The Imperialiſts being poſted at Troya, he offered them battle, but as they thought proper to retire to Naples, purſued his march, and arrived in the beginning of May before that capital, which he beſieged in form according to his orders. Sixteen French gallies, commanded by Andrea Doria, eight more under the conduct of Philippino Doria, his nephew, with twenty-two from Venice, were to block up Naples by ſea, whilſt Lautrec, with thirty thouſand men, inveſted the city by land. But when he opened the ſiege he had only Philippino's eight gallies. Thoſe of Venice came very late, and Andrea Doria, who was diſpleaſed with the king of France, and had thoughts of entering into the emperor's ſervice, detained the ſixteen gallies at Genoa, under divers pretences. Mean while a ſea fight between Philippino and the Imperialiſts, wherein Moncada was ſlain, and the marquis del Vaſto taken priſoner, made Lautrec hope he ſhould reduce Naples by famine, though himſelf wanted all things in his camp. His hopes were encreaſed by the arrival of the two and twenty Venetian gallies, which joined thoſe of Philippino. The buſineſs now was to ſee who could bear famine longeſt, the beſiegers or the beſieged, who were equally in want of proviſions. But the French had, beſides ſcarcity, a very great diſadvantage, as the plague made terrible ravage among them, and continually diminiſhed their number. At length, Andrea Doria, having agreed with the emperor, recalled his nephew, Philippino, with his eight gallies. Shortly after, the Venetian gallies being obliged to go upon the coaſt of Colabria to provide themſelves with biſcuits, the beſieged took that opportunity to convey into the city abundance of proviſions, whilſt Lautrec remained in a very bad condition, without victuals or money, and with an army grievouſly afflicted with the plague. Moſt of his general officers were dead or ſick, and, to compleat the misfortune, he was himſelf ſeized with the peſtilence, which carried him off the 16th of Auguſt [e]. The marquis of Saluzzo, who took upon him the command of the ruined army, reſolving at laſt to raiſe the ſiege, with great difficulty retired to Averſa, where he was immediately beſieged, and in few days, forced to capitulate, ſurrendering himſelf with all the principal officers of his army, into the hands of the Imperialiſts. Thus, the fine army Lautrec had led before Naples, was entirely diſ-perſed. Moreover, France had lately loſt Genoa, taken by Andrea Doria, in the emperor's name; after which, purſuant to his agreement with that monarch, he reſtored his country to liberty, and eſtabliſhed a government which ſtill ſubſiſts to this day. Thus the affairs of Italy, which in the beginning of the year had ſo promiſing an aſpect for Francis, were ſo entirely altered, that he had ſcarce any thing left in that country.

The knowledge of what paſſed in Italy this campaign, will be of no little ſervice to diſcover the motives of the pope's conduct in the affair of the divorce. Henry deemed the affair ended, when he heard the pope had left it to cardinal Wolſey's deciſion. But when, after many difficulties, he had obtained the commiſſion for the cardinal, with a bull decretal, declaring the marriage void, and a diſpenſation to marry again, he found however, there was yet nothing done. The commiſſion was dated from the caſtle of St. Angelo, whilſt the pope was a priſoner, which rendered it entirely null, and conſequently there was a neceſſity of renewing it. The decretal had no clauſe to hinder the pope from revoking it if he pleaſed. In fine, the diſpenſation was only conditional, in caſe the king's marriage with Catherine ſhould be declared void. Beſides, there were certain reſtrictions inſerted, leaving the pope at liberty to repeal it. For inſtance, he granted the diſpenſation, "as far as might be without offending God. Notwithſtanding any prohibitions of the divine law, or other conſtitutions and ordinances whatever to the contrary, as far as the authority apoſtolical reached [f]." Henry was not a little concerned to ſee that he could not uſe theſe bulls, without being liable to be moleſted. Nevertheleſs, in the belief, that all this was owing to inadvertency, he ordered ſir Gregory Caſſali, his embaſſador at Rome, to demand bulls leſs liable to diſpute. Baſſali ſpoke of it frequently to the pope, but could obtain no poſitive anſwer. Only the pope finding himſelf preſſed, told him as a ſecret, that he adviſed the king to proceed, and get his marriage annulled, by virtue of the commiſſion given the legate [g], but with as little noiſe as poſſible, and marry the woman deſired. He grounded this advice upon its being much eaſier to confirm a thing when done, than to permit him to do it. He charged Caſſali however, not to let the king know this ſuggeſtion came from him. Henry looked upon this advice as a ſnare laid for him by the pope. He conſidered, it was not poſſible to have ſuch a cauſe tried without noiſe, ſince it was neceſſary the queen ſhould be heard, otherwiſe the ſentence would be evidently void. In the next place, had he done what he was adviſed to, he would have been entirely at the pope's mercy, who according to the opinion of the canoniſts, might have refuſed to confirm the legate's ſentence, as well as the conſequent marriage. So, the affair being taken into conſideration, it was thought more proper to apply directly to the pope for new bulls. Purſuant to this reſolution, the king ſent [h] Stephen Gardiner, cardinal Wolſey's ſecretary, and Edward Fox [i], to manage the affair. Their inſtructions were to demand for the cardinal a new commiſſion, appointing him judge of the cauſe, with powers to null the king's marriage, if he thought proper, and yet to declare his daughter legitimate; to preſs the pope to give him a promiſe under his hand, not to revoke the legate's commiſſion; to demand a bull decretal to null the king's marriage, and a diſpenſation to eſpouſe another wife without any reſtriction. In ſhort, the envoys had orders to acquaint the pope, that the divorce was not adviſed by the cardinal, and to diſplay the extraordinary merit of the lady the king intended to eſpouſe. This was Anne Bullen, as may eaſily be gueſſed, ſince the king no longer concealed his love for her. It was very proper to tell the pope, that the cardinal was not author of the counſel which had induced the king to ſue for a divorce, ſince he was required for judge. And yet the letters he ſent by Gardiner and Fox, and which are in the hiſtory of the reformation, clearly ſhew he was infinitely deſirous the thing ſhould ſucceed. Finally, it appears, that the king was ſtill willing to have ſome condeſcenſion for the queen, and the emperor, her nephew, ſince he required that the legate ſhould have powers to declare Mary legitimate. Perhaps, too, this was an effect of the love he had for her.

When Gardiner and Fox came to Orvieto [k], Lautrec was marching to Naples. But his progreſs was yet ſo inconſiderable, that it was difficult to judge of the ſucceſs of his undertaking, eſpecially as the Imperialiſts were now departed from Rome in order to oppoſe his paſſage. Nay, it was likely there would be a battle, and as the event was doubtful, the pope took care not to incur the emperor's reſentment, in caſe his arms were victorious. So, to gain time, he ſent the king a letter in cypher, as if he meant to acquaint him with a ſecret, and yet it was not poſſible to diſcover his intention. The letter not being very welcome, the envoys had orders to inſiſt upon their demands. But at that time the face of affairs was a little altered. Lautrec had now made conqueſts in the kingdom of Naples, and the prince of Orange, unable to ſtop his march, was retired to the metropolis, which, probably, was going to be inveſted. It would therefore have been very imprudent to diſoblige Henry, when the king of France, his ally, was upon the point of becoming very powerful in Italy. So, Clement being greatly embarraſed in ſo nice a juncture, had recourſe to his uſual artifices to try to gain time. He feigned to deſire nothing ſo ardently as to ſatisfy Henry, though he was reſolved in his own mind to do nothing effectual in his favour. His aim was to become maſter of the affair of the divorce, and prolong it till the events of the war ſhould determine him to content either the emperor or the king. The intereſt of his houſe required that he ſhould manage the emperor, becauſe it was by his means that he hoped to reſtore the Medicis to Florence. That of his ſee was no leſs important. Henry demanded that he ſhould revoke a diſpenſation granted by a pope his predeceſſor, upon the ſuppoſition that this pope had not power to grant it; that is, properly ſpeaking, that he ſhould declare the Roman pontiffs had hitherto aſſumed a prerogative which belonged not to them. This was a very difficult ſtep to be taken, at a time when great part of Germany had thrown off the pope's dominion, and nothing was every where heard but complaints and murmurs againſt the exorbitant power they had uſurped. So, Clement's real deſign was to amuſe the king with hopes he would conſent to his divorce, till it was in his power to oppoſe it with ſafety. There is no occaſion to look for other myſteries in the pope's conduct, as will more plainly appear in the ſequel. As for the arguments and authorities alleged on both ſides, with reſpect to the main point in queſtion, from the holy ſcriptures, the fathers, and the canons, they were only ſo many amuſements which were extremely ſubſervient to the pope's deſigns, but made little or no impreſſion upon him.

Clement VII. being in this diſpoſition, ſcrupled not outwardly to grant the king whatever he required. On the 13th of April 1528, he ſigned a bull, appointing cardinal Wolſey judge of the cauſe, jointly with the archbiſhop of Canterbury, or any other Engliſh prelate he ſhould think fit to chuſe, and gave him as ample powers as the king deſired. But, beſides the above mentioned inconveniences in the decretal and diſpenſation, the king's council found two in cardinal Wolſey's new commiſſion. The firſt was, that there was no clauſe to hinder the pope from revoking it. The ſecond, that to appoint for ſole judge of the cauſe a cardinal devoted to the king, and actually his prime miniſter, would be a manifeſt nullity. Theſe conſiderations obliged the king to deſire the pope that he would join another legate with cardinal Wolſey, and poſitively promiſe not to revoke the commiſſion. As, when this was demanded, Lautrec was now before Naples, and it was not doubted he would become maſter of the city, as well as of all the reſt of the kingdom, the pope granted whatever was deſired [l]. He appointed, therefore, by a bull, dated at Orvieto the 6th of June, Thomas Wolſey, cardinal of York, and Lorenzo Campegio, cardinal biſhop of Saliſbury, for his legates a latere, giving them the ſame powers he had granted to Wolſey alone, appointing them his vicegerents in the affair of the divorce, and committing to them his whole authority [m]. He gave likewiſe, the 13th of July, the promiſe, under his hand, deſired by the king. In a word, he delivered to Campegio a decretal, nulling the king's marriage, expreſſed in the very terms which had as it were been dictated to him. It ſeemed Henry could deſire nothing more.

But all the artifices of the court of Rome were not yet known in England. The pope only intended to gain time, in order to ſee the iſſue of the Naples expedition. To that end, he always placed ſome interval between his favours to the king. Wolſey was made ſole judge in the affair of the divorce, the 13th of April; Campegio was, in a conſiſtory, declared his aſſociate, about the end of the ſame month; but the bull was not drawn till the 6th of June. His promiſe not to revoke the commiſſion was not ſigned before the 23d of July. In all appearance, the decretal was not drawn till Auguſt, nor did Campegio begin his journey till after Lautrec's death, or perhaps after raiſing the ſiege of Naples; that is, when the pope was no longer in dread of France, and it was more neceſſary than ever to manage the emperor. So, it may almoſt be affirmed, that when Campegio departed from Rome, the pope was reſolved not to grant the divorce. It was however requiſite he ſhould ſtill ſeem willing to ſatisfy Henry, in order not to be delivered to the emperor's mercy, with whom he was determined to agree, and nothing was more capable to procure him advantageous terms, than his ſeeming union with France and England. This was moſt certainly the ſecret of the pope's policy, and the real motive of all his artifices in this affair. In purſuance therefore of the reſolution he had taken, he gave the following inſtructions to his legate: Firſt, to prolong the affair as much as poſſible. Secondly, not to give ſentence upon the divorce, before the reception of his commands in writing. Thirdly, he expreſly enjoined him not to ſhew the bull to any perſon but the king and cardinal Wolſey, nor to part with it out of his hands, without his order, upon any pretence whatever.

Campegio, departing with theſe inſtructions, arrived not in England till October, ſix or ſeven months after he was appointed legate. Whilſt he was on the road, the emperor's miniſters at Rome raiſed a freſh obſtacle to the divorce, by the pretended diſcovery of a brief of Julius II.[n] confirming the bull of diſpenſation for Henry's marriage with Catherine. But there was this difference between the bull and the brief, that the pope in the bull ſaid, the marriage was perhaps conſummated; whereas in the brief, the word perhaps, was omitted. They inferred from thence, that Julius II. was not ſurpriſed, ſince he looked upon Catherin's firſt marriage as conſummated. But the brief, of which they only gave an authentic copy, without ſhewing the original to the king's miniſters, was, probably, propoſed ſolely to cauſe time to be loſt in examining it. For there were two reaſons, among many others, which manifeſtly proved it to be a forgery: The firſt was, that this brief, granted at Catherine's requeſt, ſuppoſed that princeſs's marriage with Arthur to have been conſummated, and yet ſhe had ſworn the contrary. And upon that her agents had grounded the validity of Julius's diſpenſation. The ſecond reaſon was ſtill more ſtrong, namely, that the brief was dated the 26th of December, 1503. Now, as in the date of the briefs, the court of Rome begins the year the 25th of December, being Chriſtmas-day, this date anſwered to the 26th of December 1502, of the common year, that is ten months before Julius II. was pope.

Campegio, being arrived in England, began his legateſhip with gravely exhorting the king to live in a good underſtanding with the queen, and deſiſt from a farther proſecution of the matter. This was taken very ill from a legate who was thought to be ſent into England to judge the cauſe in favour of the king. After that, he talked the quite contrary to the queen, endeavouring to perſuade her, that ſhe ought to comply with the king's deſire [o], and even intimated, it would be in vain to oppoſe it. But whether the queen was told beforehand what ſhe was to ſay, or naturally ſpoke her own thoughts, ſhe anſwered, ſhe was the king's wife, and would be ſo, till parted from him by the pope's ſentence [p]. Campegio not being able to prevail with the king or queen, affirmed he could not proceed without freſh orders, as if his whole commiſſion was only to make theſe exhortations. But it was ſix months before his inſtructions arrived. Mean while he kept the king in hopes of obtaining his deſires, and even inſinuated, that he was himſelf ſatisfied of the juſtice of his cauſe. To amuſe him the better, he ſhewed him the bull he had brought with him, and gave the cardinal his colleague a ſight of it alſo. But when he was preſſed to ſhew it to ſome of the lords of the council, he replied, he had very poſitive orders to let no perſon ſee it but the king and Wolſey. Henry, ſurpriſed and angry at ſuch a proceeding, complained of it to the pope, who, inſtead of blaming his legate, anſwered, he had done very well to follow his orders: that the decretal was granted on condition it was ſhewn to none but the king and cardinal Wolſey, and on purpoſe to prevent Wolſey's ruin, which otherwiſe, he was told, would be infallible: that in fine, the bull was not to be publiſhed, unleſs the legates gave ſentence for the king [q].

Whilſt Campegio amuſed Henry in England, the pope was taking meaſures to conclude his treaty with the emperor, and ſeeking pretences to leave the kings of France and England, whom he no longer feared, ſince the Naples expedition had miſcarried. He complained, that theſe two monarchs had diſappointed him, in not cauſing Ravenna and Cervia to be reſtored to him according to their promiſe; thereby inſinuating, that it was not to be thought ſtrange he made no haſte to ſatisfy Henry, ſince that prince had neglected to do him juſtice by the Venetians [r]. He would fain have had it believed that the affair of the divorce was retarded ſolely on that account, and was very deſirous to have theſe two places in his power before he concluded with the emperor. But, what caution ſoever he uſed, his negotiation in Spain could not be ſo private but Francis and Henry had ſome intelligence of it. They complained to him, by their embaſſadors, but he conſtantly denied he intended to depart from his neutrality. Mean while, under colour of removing theſe groundleſs ſuſpicions, he diſpatched into England one Campana, to give the king freſh aſſurances of his good intentions; but withal ſent by him expreſs orders to cardinal Campegio, to burn the bull decretal, and defer the ſentence of the divorce as long as poſſible. Campegio immediately obeyed the firſt of theſe orders, and as for the ſecond, never ceaſed finding freſh pretences to retard the proceedings.

At laſt, Henry tired to ſee ſo many affected delays, and perceiving they came from the pope, ſent, about the end of the year, ſir Francis Brian and Peter Vannes [s] to Rome, to diſcover the true cauſe. They had likewiſe ſeveral other commiſſions: Firſt, to ſearch the pope's records for the pretended brief of Julius II. Secondly, to propoſe, as of themſelves, ſeveral expedients ſpeedily to end the affair of the divorce, and to conſult, under feigned names, the canoniſts of Rome, whether they were practicable. Thirdly, in caſe they ſaw the pope over-awed by the emperor's threats, they had orders to offer him a guard of two thouſand men. Laſtly, if this had no effect, they were to balance the emperor's menaces with others for the king. They found the pope in a real or pretended fright, at the Imperial miniſter's threats to have him depoſed for a baſtard. His anſwer therefore to the offer of two thouſand men for a guard, was, that it would not be capable of ſecuring him, but rather render him more ſuſpected. He took care not to put himſelf in the king's power when he was thinking to break entirely with him. The two envoys, ſeeing the pope inclined to the emperor's ſide, plainly told him at laſt, "That if he continued to deny the king, their maſter, the ſatisfaction he demanded, he might be aſſured England would be loſt to him: that the Engliſh were already but too much diſpoſed to withdraw their obedience to the holy ſee, and, upon the leaſt encouragement from the king, would openly publiſh what they kept concealed in their hearts: that the king, their maſter, and the king of France, were powerful, and very ſtrictly united, and therefore the pope would run a great hazard if he ſhould cauſeleſsly make theſe two monarchs his enemies: that though the Naples expedition had miſcarried, he could not be ſure it would be the ſame with thoſe that ſhould be hereafter undertaken; nay, it was eaſy to ſee, by the dangerous ſtate of the emperor's affairs, what might happen another time: that if, out of exceſſive condeſcenſion for the emperor, he dealt ſo unjuſtly by the king of England, as to refuſe him what even equity and the law of God required, he muſt likewiſe expect no favour or regard when affairs ſhould be altered: that he ought to conſider, the king of England had engaged in this war to free him from captivity, and if, inſtead of making a grateful return, he ſhould join with his enemy, all chriſtians would abhor his ingratitude." All this was not capable to divert the pope from his deſign, and yet he would ſtill be thought unreſolved. He replied, with a ſigh, that he was between the hammer and the anvil, and, which way ſoever he turned, ſaw nothing before him but dangers; and therefore he placed all his hopes in the protection of God, who would not forſake his church: that, as to the reſt, he had done for the king of England more than could be reaſonably expected, in committing the trial of his cauſe to two legates, who were both devoted to him: that, not content with this, he ſtill preſſed him to do more; to diſregard the cuſtomary rules of the church on the like occaſions, and publicly ſacrifice to him, the emperor, the archduke his brother, queen Catherine, the honour, dignity and intereſt of the holy ſee: that this was aſking too much, and the king ſhould at leaſt ſuffer the affair to be decided by the legates appointed for that purpoſe: that it was not his fault if matters were delayed, and in caſe it was owing to Campegio's negligence, he had acted contrary to his orders. This anſwer was a plain indication of the pope's thoughts. Accordingly, the envoys told the king, nothing was to be expected from the pope, and that the only way was to cauſe the legates to give a ſpeedy ſentence. The truth is, the pope was now reſolved to agree with the emperor; and if he ſhewed any farther regard for Henry, it was only to avoid an open rupture with him, for fear the emperor ſhould take advantage of it in the treaty they were concluding.

The expedients Brian and Vannes were commiſſioned to propoſe, were, 1. Whether, if the queen vowed religion, the king ſhould have liberty to marry again? 2. Or, if the king ſhould vow religion as well as the queen, whether the pope would diſpenſe with his vow, and allow him to take another wife whilſt the queen was alive? 3. Or whether the pope would grant him a diſpenſation to have two wives? But it does not appear how theſe points were decided. As for the brief produced by the Imperial miniſters, there was not the leaſt trace of any ſuch thing among the pope's records, of which the Engliſh envoys [t] had good certificates. In this manner paſſed the whole year 1528; at the cloſe whereof the king found himſelf no more advanced than at the beginning, except that he had ſtill ſome hope from Campegio, who all along pretended to be entirely in his intereſt. It may be affirmed, that Francis, in neglecting to aſſiſt Lautrec, was the cauſe of the turn which the affair of the divorce took, ſince he thereby gave occaſion to the pope to join with the emperor [u].

Whilſt the king was thinking of his divorce, cardinal Wolſey was very diligently employed in founding his colleges. As the pope made the king very uneaſy at his affected delays, he endeavoured to gratify him otherwiſe, in granting his favourite whatever he deſired for his foundations. Among the public acts of the year 1528, there are ten or twelve bulls, as well for the ſuppreſſion of ſeveral ſmall monaſteries [w], as for other things concerning the two colleges, the endowment whereof the cardinal ſo paſſionately deſired. Wherefore, knowing how fair an opportunity preſented to obtain private favour from the pope, he forgot not to improve it. Had he ſtayed a year longer, he would have run great riſk of leaving the work unfiniſhed.

I have for ſome time been ſilent concerning the affairs of Scotland, becauſe there has been no occaſion to ſpeak of them. But as their ſituation was changed during the courſe of this year, it is neceſſary briefly to relate what had paſſed in that country. The earl of Angus, George Douglas his brother, and their uncle Archibald, had ſtill the king's perſon in their power, and governed in his name. Queen Margaret however, who had cauſed her marriage with the earl of Angus to be annulled, and was married again to Henry Stewart, had ſtill a powerful party in Scotland. But as her party could not act openly without being liable to be deemed rebels, ſince the king was in the hands of the Douglaſſes, the queen made uſe of another expedient to accompliſh her deſigns. She perſuaded the king her ſon, by ſome perſons about him, to make his eſcape, and retire to Sterling. The contrivance ſucceeded according to her wiſh. James took this opportunity, and eſcaping from the earl of Angus, withdrew to Sterling, where it was publiſhed that the Douglaſſes ſhould be no longer acknowledged for regents, and withal were forbidden the court. This order was notified to the earl of Angus whilſt he was marching to recover the king's perſon. As he had but few troops, and was unable to enter Sterling by force, where ſeveral great men were come to the king's relief, he obeyed and retired.

Shortly after, the king called a parliament at Edinburgh the 3d of September, and came himſelf to hold it. The Douglaſſes, perceiving what was preparing againſt them, attempted to ſurpriſe Edinburgh, and become maſters of the king's perſon, with deſign to diſſolve the parliament. But being repulſed, they were forced to retire: Whreupon the parliament confiſcated their eſtates to the king. But they continued in arms, and made incurſions even to the gates of Edinburgh.

Henry, being informed of what paſſed in Scotland, and fearing the young king might ſuffer himſelf to be prejudiced againſt him, thought it adviſeable to ſend embaſſadors to make peace, ſince a war with Scotland could not but be very inconvenient in his preſent circumſtances. But it was not poſſible to ſucceed. A truce only for five years was concluded at Berwick, and ſigned the 14th of December. It was agreed, by a ſeparate article, that the Douglaſſes might take refuge in England, on condition they delivered to their ſovereign the places they held in Scotland; and, in caſe they entered the kingdom, and committed any diſorders, Henry ſhould be reſponſible, as if done by his own ſubjects [x].

Since the pope had determined to agree with the emperor, his feeding the allies with hopes was only to obtain the better terms from that monarch. On the other hand, Francis, ſuſpecting the pope's intentions, perceived likewiſe that a peace only would procure him his ſons, and therefore continued a ſecret negotiation with the emperor. But at the ſame time, he made great promiſes to the Venetians, Florentines, duke of Milan, and the pope himſelf, to let the emperor ſee, in caſe he did not make haſte and conclude, it would perhaps be too late when he deſired it. About the ſame time the emperor had certain advice that the Turks were making great preparations to invade Hungary, and penetrate even into Germany. So, finding a diverſion in Italy might greatly embarras him at ſuch a juncture, he was the more inclined to peace. Theſe diſpoſitions in the principal parties could not in the end but produce the peace which was univerſally expected with impatience. Mean while the war was continued, though faintly, in the kingdom of Naples, and the duchy of Milan, where the French and Venetians had kept ſome places, but it was eaſy to ſee that nothing deciſive would happen.

In the mean time the pope was wholly intent upon his own private affairs. His aim was not only to be reſtored to Florence, but alſo to become maſter of Peruſa and Ferrara, and recover Ravenna and Cervia, taken by the Venetians during his captivity. Under colour of uſing his intereſt to procure a general peace, he had ſent a nuntio to Spain to conclude a private treaty with the emperor. During the negotiation the affair of the divorce was at a ſtand. Clement VII. was fully reſolved to ſatisfy the emperor, and by that Henry daily loſt the hopes of ſucceeding in his purſuit. Mean while a violent diſtemper, which ſeized the pope in the beginning of the year 1529, had like to have very much changed the face of affairs [y]. Cardinal Wolſey having notice of the pope's dangerous illneſs, had ſent an expreſs to Gardiner, to conjure him to neglect nothing that he thought capable of procuring him the papacy. Henry himſelf had wrote to ſeveral cardinals in his behalf, and the king of France, who was not yet ſecure of a peace, had given him all thoſe of his faction. It is pretended, Wolſey would have been ſure of more than a third of the votes in caſe the pope had died. Indeed that was not ſufficient to make him pope; but it was enough to hinder any other from being ſo. This affair was even carried ſo far, that the king had ordered his embaſſadors at Rome, that if, notwithſtanding the cardinals of Wolſey's faction, another perſon ſhould be deſigned, they ſhould ſo manage that theſe cardinals ſhould proteſt againſt the proceedings in the conclave, and then, withdrawing to ſome ſecure place, ſhould themſelves come to a new election. I do not know whether it would have been eaſy for the embaſſadors to obtain ſo abſolute a reſignation to the king's pleaſure. However, it is not ſtrange that Henry ſhould be ſo very deſirous of procuring the papacy for his miniſter and [u] About this time, ſome murmurs and ſeditious words being diſperſed among the common people on account of the divorce, king Henry proteſted publicly in an aſſembly of lords, judges, &c. at his palace at Bridewell, that nothing but deſire of giving ſatisfaction to his conſcience, and care of eſtabliſhing the ſucceſſion to the crown in a right and undoubted line had firſt procured him to controvert this marriage; being for the reſt, as happy in the affection and virtues of his queen, at any prince living. favourite. But it is surprising that a prince who was called protector of the church, and defender of the faith, should not scruple purposely to endeavour to form a schism in the church, in order to gratify his passion. As for cardinal Wolsey, nothing in his conduct ought to be thought strange; since it is certain he was ready to sacrifice every thing to his ambition. The pope's recovery put an end to all these cabals, which, however, could not be so private but they came to his knowledge. This made him consider Wolsey as a dangerous rival, and capable of supplanting him if an opportunity offered, by using for pretence the defect in his birth.

When Clement VII. was fully recovered, the proceedings for the divorce continued upon the same foot as before. The pope gave hopes the affair should be decided in England for the king, by a sentence of the legates, which he would himself confirm to make it more authentic. His aim was to gain time, and prevent the appearance of any misunderstanding between him and the court of England, before he had concluded his treaty with the emperor, because it was a means to obtain better terms. To this end, and to hinder Henry from being impatient, he had put into Gardiner's hands a brief, promising not to revoke the powers given the legates. But, besides that the brief was expressed in ambiguous terms, he knew sentence would not be passed without his positive orders. This management, which the pope continued with many artifices, afforded the king some hopes of gaining him to his interest. To succeed the better, he prevailed with the king of France to send to the pope the bishop of Bayonne, with orders earnestly to sollicit the decision of the affair. He could have wished that the pope of his own accord would have granted a bull to annul his marriage, and dispense with his taking another wife, or at least have given the legates such a commission, as it should not be in their choice to judge otherwise than in his favour. The pope, pleased at his being so intent upon his own projects, still fed him with hopes of success. But withal he expressed great fear of what the emperor might do against him; and used that pretence to delay the favour he seemed to intend to grant. In every thing else he was always ready to content the king. The bishopric of Winchester being vacant by the death of Richard Fox, and Henry desiring him to bestow it on Wolsey, the bulls for that purpose were immediately dispatched. It is true, they were rated at fifteen thousand ducats; but Wolsey would give but six thousand, alleging, he did not want them, since the king had already granted him the temporalities of the bishopric. This shews in what spirit he thus heaped upon him the church preferments. But herein is nothing surprising, since the pope himself made no scruple to own in his bull that he conferred the bishopric on the cardinal to help him to bear the expence to which he he was obliged by his rank.

Whilst these things passed, the emperor hastened, as much as possible, the conclusion of his treaty with the pope; being resolved to grant whatever he required, rather than give him occasion to join with his enemies. Before the pope was assured of this agreement, policy required he should keep the emperor in fear that the affair of the divorce would be determined to the king of England's satisfaction. Consequently, it was his interest that the affair should remain undecided, to let the emperor see it depended on the success of the negotiation at Barcelona. But when he had just brought him to his own terms, he began insensibly to seek pretences to break his engagements with Henry. So the restitution of Revenna and Cervia was again moved, the pope feigning to believe that if Henry had desired it, he should have had these two cities before now, and from thence took occasion to be displeased. On the other hand, the emperor knowing the pope's intention, protested, [z] in queen Catherine's name, against whatever should be done in England in the affair of the divorce, declaring that she excepted against the two legates, as one was notoriously devoted to the king, and the other, bishop of Salisbury. The king's ministers used their utmost endeavours to persuade the pope to reject the protestation. But he replied, he could not, without shewing himself too partial to the king, since a protestation was no prejudice to the cause itself. That it would be a very strange thing to refuse a queen the right of protesting, which the meanest person could claim. All this, added to many other circumstances, and to certain advices that the pope was treating with the emperor, took from the English ministers all hopes of prevailing with him. Wherefore they wrote to the king that they were only amused, and if the process was not speedily decided in England, there was danger of its being brought to Rome. Whereupon, the king resolved to proceed before the legates, and not suffer himself to be any longer amused by deceitful promises. Mean while, when the instrument, whereby the pope had promised not to revoke the legate's commission, came to be examined, it was found to be worded in general or ambiguous terms, which left him at liberty to do what he pleased. So, to know whether he had acted with sincerity [a], when he signed that instrument, Gardiner was ordered to represent to him, that the paper on which it was written being wet, by the carelessness of the courier, and the words almost quite defaced, the king desired he would sign another. But Clement found some artifice to be excused. Wherefore the king, being satisfied there was nothing to be expected from the court of Rome, where the emperor's interest was too great, recalled Gardiner [b] and Brian, and sent Bennet to Rome, only to hinder, as much as lay in his power, the avocations of his cause. Bennet carried a letter from the two legates, directed to the pope and cardinals, wherein they said, That the principal point in the cause they were to judge, consisted in knowing whether Julius II. could grant a dispensation, or exceeded his power: that since the sole point was to decide concerning the authority of the head of the church, they conceived it to be beyond their commission, and therefore were of opinion the pope would do well to avocate the cause: that they doubted not the king would consent to it, provided he had some assurance it should be decided in his favour. It is hard to conceive what could induce cardinal Wolsey to sign such a letter, so directly contrary to the king's interest. For, though the legates seemed to suppose his consent, it was evident the reason of the avocation subsisted, whether the king consented or not. Consequently they afforded the pope a plausible pretence to avocate the cause, which the king dreaded of all things. Was Wolsey deceived by Campegio? or did he sacrifice his master's interest? It is difficult to believe either; and yet historians affirm, that one of the principal causes of his disgrace, was a letter he had written to the pope, which came to the king's knowledge by Bennet's means, and it might very well be this. Indeed he was inexcusable if he signed it without the king's approbation; and, on the other hand, it cannot be conceived that the king should be so blind as not to see the consequence of such advice.

Though Campegio came to England in October last year, it was now the end of May, and nothing done towards the trial of the cause which brought him thither. The king, having suffered himself to be amused by the pope, whose interest it was to gain time, had been ever in hopes of obtaining a bull to null the marriage, without being obliged to go through the usual forms of a process. But at length, his agents convincing him that his expectations were vain, he resolved to proceed before the legates. To that end, on the 31st of May, he granted them a licence to execute the pope's commission. They met the same day, and appointed assistants [c] to examine the papers and evidences. From the very first session, it appeared that Campegio intended to prolong the process, since, after the commission was read, he ordered the king and queen to be cited to appear the 18th of June. This was too long a term, if there had been any design to dispatch the affair, especially as the parties were in London, or in one of their palaces near the city. Though Wolsey was the senior cardinal, he let Campegio preside, to shew he intended to act without partiality. So, from the first day to the last, Campegio did all, without Wolsey's ever appearing to oppose the affected delays of his colleague between the sessions. I shall not enter any farther into the particulars of this famous process, which may be seen at large in the excellent history of the reformation of England, known to all the world, but content myself with relating in general the most remarkable circumstances.

In the second session, the queen's proctors [d] excepted against the two legates. But the exception not being deemed valid, she had a further day given her to the 21st [e]. On that day the king and queen appeared in perſon [f]. But the queen, without ſaying any thing to the legates, went and kneeled down before the king, and made a very moving ſpeech, concluding, with imploring his juſtice and pity; after which ſhe withdrew, and would never more appear, nor ſuffer any perſon to defend her cauſe [g]. As ſoon as ſhe was retired, the king declared he was very well pleaſed with the queen, and, in ſuing to be divorced from her, acted ſolely from a motive of religion and conſcience [h]. Adding, that his ſcruples concerning his marriage ſprung from thoſe of the biſhop of Tarbe, and were confirmed by the opinion of all the biſhops of England. The archbiſhop of Canterbury confirmed what the king ſaid, concerning the biſhops. But Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, denied he ever ſet his hand to the writing which was preſented to the king. Mean while, the queen was cited again for the 25th of June, but inſtead of appearing, ſhe ſent in her appeal to the pope in form, from whatever had been or ſhould be done hereafter. Nevertheleſs, ſhe was declared contumacious. The ſame day, the proceſs was reduced to twelve articles, upon which witneſſes were to be examined. The principal article was, prince Arthur's conſummation of his marriage with Catherine, which the queen had denied with an oath, and which notwithſtanding was proved by the teſtimony of ſeveral perſons, as far as a thing of that nature can be. Theſe proofs conſiſted in the age, health, and vigorous conſtitution of the prince, and in his diſcourſes the next morning after the nuptials: ſo that Arthur and Catherine muſt not have ſpoken the truth; the one out of vanity, or the other out of intereſt [i].

Whilſt the trial was proſecuting in England, the emperor's miniſters were earneſtly preſſing the pope to avocate the cauſe to Rome, and Henry's as vehemently ſolliciting the contrary. What is more, both ſides threatened to depoſe him, on account of his being a baſtard. The pope feigned to be terrified by theſe menaces; and this ſeeming fear to declare for either, afforded him a pretence to remain undetermined, till he received advice of the concluſion of his treaty with the emperor. At length, the agreeable news being come, he reſolved to avocate the cauſe before the publication of the treaty, leſt it ſhould be thought to be one of the ſecret articles. Weak precaution to efface or prevent ſuch a ſuſpicion.

The ſubſtance of the treaty which was ſigned at Barcelona the 29th of June, was, That the emperor ſhould reſtore the family of the Medici to Florence, on the ſame foot as formerly: that he ſhould cauſe Ravenna and Cervia to be delivered to the pope: that he ſhould put him in poſſeſſion of Modena and Reggio, ſaving the rights of the empire: that he ſhould aid him to become maſter of Ferrara: that Franceſco Sforza ſhould be reſtored to Milan, if innocent, but if guilty the emperor ſhould not diſpoſe of the duchy to any prince the pope ſhould diſlike: that the pope and emperor ſhould employ their temporal and ſpiritual arms againſt the heretics of Germany: that Alexander de Medici ſhould eſpouſe Margaret, the emperor's natural daughter: that the pope ſhould grant the emperor a fourth of the eccleſiaſtical revenues in his dominions, to wage war with the Turks: that he ſhould abſolve all that were any way concerned in the taking and ſacking of Rome. What greater advantages could the pope have expected, ſuppoſing he had been victorious in the late war? But the emperor believed he could not purchaſe the pope's friendſhip too dear, who might ſtill have greatly embarraſed him, if he had joined with France, England, and the republic of Venice.

The pope, having concluded his treaty with the emperor, told the Engliſh ambaſſadors himſelf, on the 9th of July, his reſolution to avocate the cauſe to Rome. They uſed all poſſible endeavours to diſſuade him from it; repreſenting to him that the holy ſee was going irrecoverably to loſe England. But it was all to no purpoſe. By his late treaty with the emperor, the family of the Medici was to be reſtored to the government of Florence. This alone was ſufficient to outweigh in his mind all the dangers to which he expoſed the holy ſee; ſo great was his affection for a family from whence he was deſcended, though not born in Wedlock. So, the 15th of July he ſigned the bull of avocation. The next day he notified it to Caſſali, the king's embaſſador in ordinary, and to Bennet, who had been ſent to him laſt. He alleged, in excuſe of the avocation, ſeveral reaſons which might have been of ſome weight in the beginning of the proceſs, on ſuppoſition he had been entirely impartial, but which had loſt all their force after all his proceedings, and the concluſion of his treaty with the emperor. Three days after, he diſpatched a meſſenger, with the bull of avocation, into England, where proceedings were very dilatory by the artifices of cardinal Campegio, who preſided in the affair.

The queen, who was cited for the 25th of June, not appearing that day, ſhe had farther time given her to the 28th, and was ſummoned again to appear by the biſhop of Bath and Wells, though in vain. On the 28th, ſome depoſitions were read, after which the ſeſſion was adjourned to the 5th of July, when, by reaſon of certain holidays kept at Rome, the ſeſſion was deferred till the 12th. The court met again on the 12th, the 14th, the 17th, the 21ſt, and the 23d. As there was nothing more to do but to pronounce the ſentence, every one thought all would be ended the laſt ſeſſion; but people were ſtrangely ſurpriſed when cardinal Campegio was heard to adjourn the court to the 1ſt of October. He alleged for reaſon, that it was the time of the great vacation at Rome, and he was indiſpenſibly obliged to comply with that cuſtom [k].

Thus did that legate, who was in the pope's ſecrets, amuſe the king in the ſame manner as the pope had amuſed him at Rome near two years, ever ſince the affair was begun. Henry was as much enraged as ſurpriſed at the proceedings of the legate, but diſſembled both his ſurpriſe and reſentment. Shortly after, he plainly perceived to what all theſe affected delays tended, when he came to know that, notwithſtanding his engagement, the pope had avocated the cauſe. The bull of avocation being arrived [l], he would not ſuffer it to be notified to him, but intimated to the legates, that he was content they ſhould obey the pope's orders. It was not without reaſon that he would not have the bull notified to him. He was cited therein to appear at Rome within forty days, which he could not have done without acting contrary to the laws of the land, which prohibited to obey ſuch citations, and carry cauſes to a foreign court. Upon this foundation it was that he had always inſiſted that the proceſs ſhould be determined in the kingdom. Beſides that, cenſures were denounced againſt him in the bull, as againſt a private perſon, if he obeyed not the citation. Some time after, the pope made him a ſort of reparation, in revoking theſe cenſures by a brief [m], wherein he proteſted they were inſerted contrary to his intention. But as to the citation itſelf, he only prolonged the day to Chriſtmas.

The figure cardinal Wolſey made, during the pretended judgment of the proceſs, was very extraordinary. Of all mankind he was the proudeſt and moſt haughty; he was ſenior cardinal to his colleague, and yet gave place to him in every thing, and ſuffered him to act as he pleaſed, without ever oppoſing his opinion. If the affair had ſucceeded according to the king's deſire, his conduct would doubtleſs have been praiſed. But, as every thing turned againſt the proxies. But the queen appeared in perſon, and excepted againſt the legates as incompetent judges, alleging the cauſe was already avocated by the pope, and deſired a competent time to prove it. The legates aſſigned her the 21ſt, and adjourned the court till then. Burnet, T. I. p. 72.

[g] Biſhop Burnet, from the original regiſter of the proceſs, ſays, the king was never in the court. Ref. T. III. p. 46. But the contrary is affirmed by the king himſelf, in a letter, dated June 23, to his embaſſadors at Rome, in theſe words: "Both me and the queen appeared in perſon." See Collect. to vol. I. p. 78. To reconcile this contradiction, the biſhop ſuppoſes that they were indeed together in the hall where the court ſat; but that it was before the cardinals ſat down, and had formed the court. Pref. to vol. II. p. 8.

[h] When the king and queen were called on, the king anſwered, Here; but the queen, riſing from her ſeat, kneeled down, and ſaid to the king, "She was a poor woman, and a ſtranger in his dominions, where ſhe could expect neither good counſel nor indifferent judges; ſhe had long been his wife, and deſired to know wherein ſhe had offended him: ſhe had been his wife 20 years and more, and had borne him ſeveral children, and ever ſtudied to pleaſe him, and proteſted he had found her a true maid, about which ſhe appealed to his own conſcience. If ſhe had done any thing amiſs, ſhe was willing to be put away with ſhame. Their parents were eſteemed very wiſe princes, and no doubt had good counſellors and learned men about them when the match was agreed; therefore ſhe would not ſubmit to the court; nor durſt her lawyers, who were his ſubjects, and aſſigned by him, ſpeak freely for her; ſo ſhe deſired to be excuſed till ſhe had heard from Spain." That ſaid, ſhe roſe up, and making the king a low reverence, went out of court. Her counſel were the biſhops of Rocheſter and St. Aſaph, and Dr. Ridley. Burnet, vol. I. p. 73.

The king's counſel, it ſeems, inſiſting moſtly on the conſummation of the marriage, it led them to ſay many things that were indecent; of which the biſhop of Rocheſter complained, and ſaid, they were things deteſtable to be heard; but cardinal Wolſey checked him, and there paſſed ſome ſharp words between them. Lord Herbert has given the ſubſtance of all the depoſitions, p. 115. Compl. Hiſt. King king, it was not poſſible for the cardinal to avoid the ſuſpicion of betraying his maſter's intereſts, or at leaſt of ſerving him very ill. Henry himſelf thought ſo, though he did not preſently ſhew it[n]. On the other hand, Anne Bullen, who had always believed the cardinal in her intereſt, was extremely ſurpriſed when ſhe was informed of what had paſſed. The king had removed her from court[o], whilſt the legates were employed in the judgment of the proceſs; but ſhe was ſent for the moment the bull of avocation was arrived. It is pretended, ſhe did not a little contribute to confirm the king's ſuſpicions of the cardinal. She was perſuaded, if Wolſey had pleaſed, the affair would have taken another turn, but that he had altered his reſolution. Whether her opinion was well grounded, or the vexation to ſee herſelf ſtill ſo remote from her hopes exaſperated her againſt the cardinal, ſhe looked upon him as an enemy deſerving her whole vengeance. So, finding the king diſpoſed to give ear to whatever was ſaid againſt his miniſter, ſhe neglected nothing that could help to ruin him. In this, ſhe was aſſiſted by ſeveral perſons of the higheſt rank, who had no reaſon to love that proud prelate.

It is eaſy to gueſs Henry's concern to ſee himſelf on a ſudden ſo remote from his aim. The pope had joined in league with the emperor, which was properly his party. Francis I. from whom he had expected a powerful aid in caſe of need, had juſt concluded at Cambray a treaty with the emperor, whereby he engaged not to aſſiſt that prince's enemies. In a word, queen Catherine remained obſtinate not to accept any expedient that might debar her from being his wife. On the other hand, Henry's love for Anne Bullen, which he had pleaſed himſelf with the hopes of gratifying by a lawful marriage, helped not a little to increaſe his concern. He did not know which way to get rid of the queen, who by her obſtinacy had very much leſſened that eſteem and affection he had always had for her[p]. With a mind full of theſe troubleſome thoughts, and uncertain what to determine, he reſolved to take a progreſs into ſome of his counties, to try to diſpel his melancholy.

During his journey, he lodged one night at Waltham, where Edward Fox, and ſecretary Gardiner, happened to lye at a gentleman's houſe[q], who had two ſons committed to Thomas Cranmer's care. Cranmer was a doctor in divinity, who, having been profeſſor at Cambridge[r], had loſt his place upon being married. He had travelled into Germany, where he had read Luther's works, and embraced his doctrine, but with more moderation than was uſually ſeen in the firſt diſciples of that reformer. Whilſt they were at ſupper, Cranmer being at table with Fox and Gardiner, the converſation ran upon the affair of the divorce, and as the maſter of the houſe had informed the two courtiers of Cranmer's merit and capacity, they deſired him to give his opinion upon that ſubject. Cranmer at firſt modeſtly declined it, but they preſſed him ſo much that he could not excuſe himſelf. So, after ſtating the queſtion, he ſaid, he ſaw no better way to extricate the king out of his difficulties than to procure in writing the opinions of all the univerſities in Europe, and of the firſt eminent divines and civilians[s]. That one of theſe two things would follow: either the univerſities and the learned would judge Julius the ſecond's diſpenſation ſufficient, or deemed invalid. That in the firſt caſe, the king's conſcience would have reaſon to be eaſy; and in the ſecond, the pope would never venture to paſs ſentence contrary to the opinion of all the learned and able men in Chriſtendom. Fox and Gardiner, reliſhing this advice, imparted it to the king, who immediately taking the author's meaning, cried out in a tranſport of joy, That he had got the right ſow by the ear; an expreſſion, which in its coarſeneſs ſhewed how much the king was pleaſed with the expedient. At the ſame time he ſent for Cranmer, who explained more at large what he had but juſt hinted at table, ſo gained his eſteem, that from that moment he was ordered to follow the court. This is the ſame doctor who will quickly be ſeen to make a conſiderable figure in England, and lay the firſt foundations of the reformation in that kingdom.

The king being returned from his progreſs, cardinal Campegio, whoſe commiſſion was revoked, took his audience of leave as having no further buſineſs in England. Henry had ſo much command of himſelf, as to take no notice of his proceedings, and looked pleaſantly upon him. But, juſt as the cardinal was going to embark, the cuſtom-houſe officers ſearched all his baggage. under colour of looking for contraband goods[t]. Probably, the king hoped to find the decretal bull, which he had ſeen in his hands, not knowing it was burnt[u]. Campegio loudly complained of the inſult, and wrote to the king to demand ſatisfaction, as for an affront done to the legate of the holy ſee. Henry, coldly anſwered[w], that his cuſtomers had done their duty, in executing orders long ſince eſtabliſhed with regard to perſons going out of the kingdom: that he was ſurpriſed he ſhould talk of his being legate, when recalled, and much more, that being biſhop of Saliſbury, he ſhould be ſo ignorant of the laws of the land, as to dare to aſſume that title without his licence. Campegio perceiving by this anſwer, that the king intended not to give him ſatisfaction, thought himſelf very happy in being ſuffered to depart.

The cardinal had good reaſon to wiſh himſelf out of the kingdom. With what moderation ſoever the king behaved to him, he could not be ignorant how angry he was, after ſeeing, ſome days before his departure, the courſe that was taking with his colleague, cardinal Wolſey. The 9th of October, the attorney general[x] had preferred a bill of indictment againſt Wolſey, as guilty of breaking the ſtatute of præmunire. The 17th of the ſame month the king ſent and demanded the great ſeal, though it was given him for life: for which reaſon, the cardinal made ſome ſcruple to deliver it; but he obeyed a ſecond command[y]; and in a few days the king gave the great ſeal to ſir Thomas More, a perſon univerſally eſteemed for his great integrity. The cardinal had no ſooner delivered the great ſeal, but the attorney general preferred other articles of impeachment againſt him. The king having given him leave to appoint attornies to anſwer for him, he choſe two, who appeared for him, and proteſted, in his name, that he did not know the obtaining of the bulls, whereof he was accuſed, was contrary to the laws of the land, and prejudicial to the prerogative royal. As for the particulars wherewith he was charged, they ſaid, he confeſſed them, and caſt himſelf entirely upon the king's mercy. He was accuſed twice, as I ſaid, namely, on the 9th and 18th of October, and both times found guilty, and declared to be out of the protection of the laws. Probably he was indicted firſt, for obtaining ſeveral bulls without the king's expreſs licence, and the ſecond time, for exerciſing in England the office of legate a latere, without the king's letters patent to that end, contrary to the intent of the law.

As ſoon as the cardinal was out-lawed, the king commanded him to leave York Place, and retire to a country houſe belonging to him, as biſhop of Wincheſter. Then he ordered an inventory of all his goods to be taken, which contained immenſe riches[z], acquired by many acts of injuſtice. 'Tis ſaid, that of fine holland alone, there was found in his houſe a thouſand pieces. One may judge of the reſt by this ſample. Some time after, he cauſed a very humble petition to be preſented to the king, praying a protection for his perſon, without which, he ſaid, he was expoſed to the inſults of the meaneſt enemy that would abuſe

But after the ſuit concerning the divorce was commenced, they parted. See Stow, p. 546. About December Anne Bullen returned to court, and was more waited on than the queen had been for ſome years. At this the people appearing uneaſy, and ſeeming inclined to revolt, it was reſolved to ſend all the ſtrangers out of the kingdom. Burnet, T. III. p. 43, 44.

It

him. The king granted it November the 17th, with a power to anſwer for himſelf in all actions that ſhould be entered againſt him for the future. Moreover, he left him the archbiſhopric of York and the ſee of Wincheſter. It is difficult to account for the king's behaviour with reſpect to the cardinal, ſince, at the very time he ſeemed moſt incenſed againſt him, he ſent him a certain ring, which was a token betwixt them of the continuance of his affection. The cardinal, who was then on the road to his country houſe near Wincheſter [a], was ſo tranſported with joy at the ſight of the ring, that he alighted from his horſe, and fell upon his knees in the dirt to receive it [b]. But his hopes were not long lived. His enemies, who had the king's ear, took ſo much pains to exaſperate him againſt him, that at laſt his affair was brought before the parliament [c].

Lord Herbert has inſerted in his hiſtory the 44 articles of impeachment preſented to the king againſt the cardinal by the houſe of lords, which differ much from thoſe preferred by Hales, the attorney general, either in the Star-Chamber or elſewhere. Hales had accuſed him of breaking the ſtatute of præmunire, and exerciſing the office of legate a latere, without the king's licence. Therein he proceeded according to the tenor of the ſtatute of præmunire; which ran, that no perſon ſhould be exempt from the penalty, but thoſe to whom the king ſhould be pleaſed to grant his letters patents. Now, as the cardinal had not taken care to have a licence in form, he was liable to the penalty, according to the rigour of the law. But in the articles of the houſe of lords there is no ſuch thing; and, indeed, it would have been contrary to equity to accuſe the cardinal of exerciſing the authority of legate without the king's permiſſion, ſince the king was known to conſent to it, though not in the manner preſcribed by the law. The attorney general did well to keep to the letter of the law, purſuant to the duty of his office. But it would have been wrong in the houſe of peers to take advantage of the want of a formality to deſtroy one of their body. So the articles exhibited by the lords, ran upon crimes which had no relation to the ſtatute of præmunire. The cardinal was chiefly accuſed of abuſing his legatine power, contrary to his oath when admitted to the exerciſe of his legateſhip; of unjuſt proceedings as chancellor; of making himſelf, on ſeveral occaſions, equal to the king [d]; of iſſuing out divers orders of moment without the king's knowledge; of acting arbitrarily on many occaſions, as if he was rather ſovereign than miniſter. All the reſt of the articles were of the ſame nature, importing the ill uſe he had made of his power, as legate, chancellor, prime miniſter, and favourite. But I cannot paſs over in ſilence a very extraordinary article, namely, that the cardinal, knowing he had the great pox upon him, had the confidence daily to approach the king's perſon, frequently whiſpering in his ear, without fearing to infect him with his breath. Theſe articles being ſent down to the commons, Thomas Cromwell, member of parliament, and the cardinal's ſervant, ſo undertook his defence, as did him great honour, and was one of the principal cauſes of his future advancement. It is true, he pretended not to clear him of the crimes he was charged with, but only to ſhew he was not guilty of treaſon, as the houſe of peers aſſerted, wherein he ſucceeded to his wiſh.

It is neceſſary now to ſpeak of the peace of Cambray, which was only mentioned by the way. The differences between Charles V. and Francis I. ſo concerned all Europe, that it is very difficult to underſtand the hiſtories of the other ſtates, without a clear notion of the affairs of theſe two monarchs. Francis laboured, during the firſt part of the year 1529, to negotiate a peace with the emperor. After his ill ſucceſs in the war of Naples, he ſaw there was no other way to recover his two hoſtages. He knew the pope continued a ſecret negotiation in Spain, and that it lay in the emperor's power to make peace with all the ſtates of Italy, by reſtoring Sforza to Milan. So, though France and England had made the greateſt efforts, probably it would have ſerved only to haſten the peace of Italy. But the king of France was not even ſure of prevailing with Henry to act, who was ſtill deſirous to manage the pope and emperor, in hopes of obtaining their conſent to his divorce rather by fair means than by arms. Beſides, though he was bound to contribute large ſums for the war, he payed them only in paper, by acquittances of what was due to him from Francis. So, properly ſpeaking, this was no aſſiſtance to France, drained by the former wars of men and money. Francis had, therefore, no buſineſs to ſtand in ſuſpence. It was neceſſary for him to make peace at any rate. However, to obtain as good terms as poſſible, he amuſed the Venetians, the duke of Ferrara, and the Florentines, with great promiſes, for fear they ſhould prevent him, and after they had made their peace with the emperor, his condition became worſe. He told them he was reſolved to lead, in perſon, a ſtrong army into Italy. He continued this management till he had concluded the treaty of Cambray, wherein he left them all to the emperor's mercy. Probably, Henry was the only ally that knew his intentions. The emperor was not ignorant of the ſituation of the French king's affairs, and doubtleſs would have made it turn more to his advantage, had not the invaſion the Turks were preparing againſt Hungary and Auſtria, and the commotions raiſed by the proteſtants in Germany, made him deſirous to leave Italy in quiet. Beſides, he ſaw that a peace was the only way to break the ſtrict union of France with England. If theſe two monarchs had joined in the league which the proteſtants of Germany were projecting for their common defence, they would have created him troubles which might have broke all his meaſures. Theſe were the motives that inclined the emperor to peace, which however he made France purchaſe very dear. Charles and Francis being in the ſame diſpoſition, agreed together by ſecret negotiation, upon the chief articles of the peace, the whole honour whereof they were pleaſed however to leave in appearance to the ladies. In July, Margaret of Auſtria, the emperor's aunt, and governeſs of the Low Countries, Louiſa, of Savoy, ducheſs of Angoulême, Francis's mother, repaired to Cambray [e], and ſigned, the 5th of Auguſt, a treaty, the ſubſtance whereof was as follows:

That the emperor ſhould renounce his demand concerning Burgundy, his right to that duchy remaining however entire.

That the king of France ſhould pay him two millions of crowns of gold de ſoliel, for the ranſom of his ſons, and withdraw all his forces out of Italy.

That he ſhould reſign to him the ſovereignty of Flanders and Artois.

That he ſhould reſtore to him the earldom of Aſti, with whatever he held in the duchy of Milan.

That he ſhould renounce all his pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples.

That he ſhould marry queen Leonora, with whom the emperor her brother would give in dower two hundred thouſand crowns.

In ſhort, beſides ſeveral other private articles, he promiſed to reſtore the heirs of the late duke of Bourbon to all that prince's forfeited eſtates.

The treaty being ratified [f], it was ſome time before Francis durſt give audience to the embaſſadors of Venice and Florence, becauſe he could not, without confuſion, hear their

[c] This parliament met on November 3, and was, on December 17, prorogued to the 21ſt of April enſuing. The moſt remarkable ſtatutes enacted now, were theſe: 1. That part of the executors which take upon them the charge of a will, may ſell any land deviſed by the teſtator to be ſold. 2. That for probates of wills, where a man dies worth only five pounds clear, there ſhall be paid but ſix-pence; if worth forty pounds, three ſhillings and ſix-pence; and if worth above forty pounds clear, five ſhillings. 3. That mortuaries ſhall be paid only where they have been uſed to be paid; and according to the following rate; when a man dies worth, in moveables, above ten marks clear, there ſhall be paid three ſhillings and four pence; if worth above thirty pounds, ſix ſhillings and eight pence; and if worth above forty pounds clear, ten ſhillings; and this to be paid only by houſekeepers. None to be paid in Wales or Berwick. 4. That ſervants embezzling their maſters goods to the value of forty ſhillings, ſhall be puniſhed as felons. 5. That no ſpiritual perſon ſhall take any lands to farm, upon pain of forfeiting ten pounds a month. That no clergyman, having one benefice with cure of ſouls of the yearly value of eight pounds or above, ſhall take another, unleſs qualified as being a doctor or bachelor of divinity, or chaplain to a nobleman. In this ſame act, the number of chaplains every peer may qualify is thus ſpecified: an archbiſhop eight; a duke or biſhop ſix; a marquis and earl five; a viſcount four; the high chancellor, every baron, and knight of the garter, three; every ducheſs, marchioneſs, counteſs, and baroneſs, being widows; and the treaſurer, and controller of the houſhold, the king's ſecretary, dean of the chapel, almoner, and maſter of the rolls, two; the chief juſtice of the king's bench, and warden of the Cinque Ports, one. See Statute 21. Hen. 8. Hall, fol. 187, &c. There was finally, a very extraordinary act paſſed, by which the king was diſcharged of all the obligations or aſſignations made for the payment of all the ſeveral ſums lent him at ſeveral times by his ſubjects. Burnet, tom, I. p. 83. Coll. p. 82.

[d] He uſed to write in his letters and inſtructions, The king and I. And I would ye ſhould do thus. The king and I give unto you our hearty thanks, &c. See Herbert, p. 126. Strype's Mem. tom. I. p. 119.

[f] King Henry ſent ſir Nicolas Carew, maſter of his horſe, and Dr. Samſon, to Bologna, to ratify it in his name. Hall, fol. 187.

And

juſt reproaches. At laſt, he put them off with ſome poor excuſe, and freſh promiſes, which he performed no better than thoſe before the peace. What was very ridiculous, even after the peace was concluded, the biſhop of Tarbe, his embaſſador at Venice, not having timely notice, ſtrenuouſly ſolicited the ſenate to ſupport the war, upon the hopes he gave them a powerful aid.

It was alſo very ſtrange, that Henry having proclaimed war with the emperor, by herald, there ſhould be, however, no particular treaty between them. Henry was ſatisfied with an article, inſerted in that of Cambray, whereby the king of France was bound to pay him the two hundred and ninety thouſand crowns due from the emperor, and redeem the rich fleur-de-lis, pawned by the emperor Maximilian to Henry VII. for fifty thouſand crowns. He did more, for he generouſly forgave Francis the firſt ſum, and made a preſent of the ſecond to the duke of Orleans, his god-ſon [f]: this ſhews, that in making peace, Francis I. had not dealt with Henry as with the princes of Italy, but had convinced him of the neceſſity he was under to conclude it.

The emperor, being agreed with Francis upon the principal articles of the peace, departed from Barcelona before he received advice of the concluſion, and arrived the 12th of Auguſt at Genoa, with nine thouſand men. The peace of Cambray being publiſhed ſhortly after, the Venetians, the duke of Milan, the duke of Ferrara, and the Florentines, whom the king of France had forſaken, ſaw no other refuge than the emperor's clemency, who had it in his power to make them pay dear for their attachment to France. The diſcuſſion of their affairs being referred to a conference which the emperor was to have with the pope at Bologna, each ſent embaſſadors to take care of their concerns. Here it was that the emperor enjoined the Venetians to reſtore to the pope Ravenna and Cervia, and to himſelf ſome places they ſtill held in the kingdom of Naples. Franceſco Sforza was reſtored to the duchy of Milan, on condition of paying to the emperor four hundred thouſand crowns in hand, and five hundred thouſand in the ſpace of ten years, at ten payments. The duke of Ferrara having offered to make the emperor arbiter and judge of his differences with the pope, his offer was accepted, Clement VII. thinking nothing could be more for his advantage than to ſubmit to the emperor's deciſion, who was now bound by the treaty of Barcelona to procure him Modena and Reggio, and aſſiſt him to take poſſeſſion of Ferrara. As to the Florentines, it was not poſſible to reconcile them with the pope. They would not hearken to any agreement, unleſs they were aſſured of preſerving their liberty, being reſolved to defend it to the laſt drop of their blood. They offered however, to purchaſe it with a ſum of money. But the pope on his part, offered them all ſorts of advantages, provided the family of the Medici were reſtored to Florence, upon the ſame foot as before the expulſion of the legate. The parties not agreeing, the emperor ordered the prince of Orange to beſiege Florence and reſtore the Medici.

The emperor, having ended his affairs in Italy, was impatient to return into Germany, where the affairs of religion began to give him diſturbance. For ſome time, the proteſtants had inſiſted continually upon a free council in Germany, which was poſitively promiſed, though never intended. During the late war, the emperor had all along amuſed them with the hopes of granting this council. But no ſooner was the peace concluded, than, in his conference with the pope, at Bologna, he promiſed him to do his utmoſt to reduce them without a council. Mean while, the proteſtants, knowing his deſign, by his menacing anſwer to their envoys after the concluſion of the peace, were thinking of joining in a league for their common defence; and this made the emperor uneaſy, and obliged him ſpeedily to finiſh his affairs in Italy, in order to ſettle thoſe of Germany. Before his departure from Bologna, he received the Imperial crown at the pope's hands the 24th of February 1530, on St. Matthias's day, which was his birth-day, and which, on ſeveral occaſions, had been very fortunate to him [g]. He ſet out at length from Bologna on the 22d of March 1530, for Germany, being attended by cardinal Campegio, who was to aſſiſt, from the pope, at the diet of Augſburg.

The prince of Orange inveſted Florence, according to the emperor's order, and was ſlain at the ſiege, which the Florentines deſperately maintained. At length, on the 10th of Auguſt, they were forced to capitulate, but however, on expreſs condition that they ſhould enjoy their liberty, leaving it to the emperor to ſettle the form of their government. But ſome days after, the adherents of the Medicis, raiſing a tumult in the city, and finding themſelves ſupported by a great number of Spaniſh officers, who had entered on divers pretences, Clement VII. was again put in poſſeſſion of the government. Then the emperor, without regarding the article of the capitulation, eſtabliſhed Alexander de Medici, his ſon-in-law, at Florence, on the ſame foot that his anceſtors had formerly been, and made the ſovereignty hereditary in his family.

The 1ſt of June, this year, Francis received his two ſons, who were hoſtages in Spain, upon paying the emperor twelve hundred thouſand crowns in hand, and giving ſecurity for the reſt of the ſum. After that, he married Leonora, purſuant to the treaty of Cambray. Had he been obliged to find ready money to pay Henry what the emperor owed him, according to the tenor of the treaty, very probably he would not ſo ſoon have recovered his ſons. But Henry proved a generous friend, who, to enable him to redeem them, freely gave him the emperor's bonds to reſtore them to him, as well as the pawned jewel above-mentioned [h]. Moreover, he renounced all demands of his charges in aſſiſting him, which, according to Francis's confeſſion, extant in the collection of the public acts, amounted to the ſum of five hundred twelve thouſand two hundred twenty-two crowns of gold ſol, two and twenty-pence ſix farthings, in ready money, and acquittances upon the two millions Francis owed him. He clogged this great generoſity but with one ſingle condition; that in caſe Francis violated the peace and alliance they had made together, he ſhould ſtill be accountable for all theſe ſums, to which Francis bound himſelf by letters patents.

By the execution of the treaty of Cambray, the king of France ſaw himſelf at length in profound tranquillity, though the late war had coſt him immenſe ſums, the loſs of Genoa and Milan, the ſovereignty of Flanders and Artois, a year's captivity, numberleſs vexations, and perhaps ſome of his honour and reputation. But it was not ſo with Henry: after a vaſt charge to ſupport the intereſts of his ally, he was ſtill embarraſed with the affair of the divorce, and in danger of a ſpeedy quarrel with the emperor. However, as he was naturally ſteady in his projects, all theſe obſtacles were not able to diſcourage him, and he reſolved to ſee the end of the affair, let what would be the conſequence. Thomas Cranmer being then very much in his eſteem, he ordered him to write upon the divorce; and the doctor did it with univerſal approbation. After that, he was commanded to accompany the embaſſadors ſent by the king to the pope and emperor, to try, for the laſt time, to find ſame expedient to end the affair, which ſo greatly embarraſed him. Theſe embaſſadors found the pope and the emperor at Bologna, and had audience of both. The pope ſhewed an inclination to content the king, but durſt not act without the emperor's conſent, who openly proteſted, he would never forſake the queen his aunt. Cranmer maintained his maſter's cauſe with great warmth, which hindered not the pope from making him his penitentiary in England to pleaſe the king, whom he ſtrove to oblige in things of little conſequence, whilſt he did nothing for him in the principal affair.

Mean while, Henry, purſuant to Cranmer's advice, had ſent able and learned men [i] into France, Italy, Germany, and Switzerland, to conſult the univerſities concerning the divorce. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, the opinions of the univerſities of Angers, Paris, Bourges, Orleans, Thouloufe, Bologna, Ferrara, Padua, all uniform, declaring that Julius IId's diſpenſation for Henry's marriage with Catherine, being contrary to the divine law, could not be deemed valid. It might be objected, that the determinations of the French univerſities were ſuſpicious, by reaſon of the ſtrict union at that time between Francis and Henry; but the ſame thing cannot be ſaid of thoſe of Padua and Ferrara, and ſtill leſs of that of Bologna, a city belonging to the pope. Dr. Burnet having largely handled this ſubject, thoſe who have a mind to examine the matter more fully, may conſult his hiſtory of the reformation. It will ſuffice to obſerve here, that the queſtion was, whether Henry's marriage with his brother's widow was contrary to the law of God, and upon that ſuppoſition, whether the pope had power to grant a diſpenſation. The univerſities maintained, that ſuch a marriage was contrary to the law of God, with which the pope had not power to diſpenſe. Oxford and Cambridge being likewiſe conſulted, decreed the ſame thing, though not without great oppoſition from ſome of the members [k]. It ſeems at firſt very ſtrange, that the two Engliſh univerſities ſhould be more ſcrupulous in the matter than the foreign. But the ſurpriſe ceaſes, when it is conſidered that theſe ſcruples aroſe, not from the queſtion itſelf, but from the conſequence their determination might occaſion. Moſt of the members of the univerſities were furiouſly averſe to Luther's doctrine, which began to ſpread in England, and were afraid of countenancing it by deciding againſt the pope. Beſides, they ſaw that the king's marriage with Anne Bullen would follow upon his divorce with Catherine, and this ſecond marriage they would have gladly prevented, becauſe Anne Bullen was much inclined to the reformation [l], and expreſſed a very particular eſteem for Cranmer, whoſe preferment for the ſame reaſon they dreaded.

To Orleans and Thouloufe were ſent ſir Francis Brian, Edward Fox, afterwards biſhop of Hereford, and Mr. William Paget. To Paris, Reginald Pool, of the blood royal. In Italy, the king's agents were Dr. Richard Crooke, at Padua; Hieronimo de Ghinucci, biſhop of Worceſter, and ſir Gregory Caſſali, at Rome; Dr. Stokeſley, at Venice; Dr. Cranmer, Andrew and John Caſſali, were likewiſe employed in Italy. Burnet, T. I.

The embaſſadors who had been ſent into Italy [m], returning without effecting any thing, Henry, who till then had ſhewn great regard for the pope, reſolved to alter his behaviour towards him. He might have known by experience, that Clement was to be gained only by his intereſt. It is certain, if at firſt he had proceeded with more vigour, and powerfully ſupported the war in Italy, the pope would never have thought of joining with the emperor. A good Engliſh fleet in the Mediterranean would have made Francis maſter of Naples, and ſaved the city of Genoa. The pope would thereby have been kept in awe, that he would have been glad to have always the king of England for his friend. Inſtead of acting in this manner, Henry remained quiet during the whole campaign of 1528, ſuffering himſelf to be amuſed by the deceitful hopes given him by the pope. So the French were driven out of the kingdom of Naples, and the pope was at liberty to treat with the emperor concerning the recovery of Florence, which he would never have thought of, had the French been ſuperior in Italy. Henry perceived his error when it was too late to repair it, that is, after the pope was united with the emperor, and Francis bound by the treaty of Cambray, he was left alone to ſupport himſelf againſt the emperor and pope, and it was very happy for him that the Turks and the proteſtants of Germany ſo embarraſed the emperor, as to hinder him from thinking of England. So, all means failing to accompliſh his deſign, but what could be found in his own kingdom, he began, though a little too late, to make uſe of the inclinations of his ſubjects, who for the moſt part were not very fond of the pope.

We have ſeen in ſeveral places of this hiſtory, how, at all times, the Engliſh complained of the tyranny of the popes, and the remedies applied by the parliaments to that grievance. It is true, the private intereſt of the kings rendered theſe remedies in ſome meaſure ineffectual, becauſe, as they frequently wanted the popes for their temporal concerns, the laws were not put in due execution. But that altered not the inclinations of the Engliſh. The principles of the Lollards were ſtill deeply imprinted in the minds of great numbers. Beſides, Luther's books, whereof many were brought into England, had opened the eyes of multitudes; ſo that it may be affirmed, at the time I am ſpeaking of, the Engliſh in general had quite another notion of religion than their anceſtors, eſpecially with reſpect to the papal authority. The three laſt popes, Alexander VI. Julius II. and Leo X. had ſhewn ſo little of religion in their conduct, and Clement VII. ſo cloſely followed their ſteps, that it was naturally inferred, it was impoſſible Jeſus Chriſt ſhould have given the government of his church to ſuch vicars. Thus the Engliſh were very ready to ſhake off the pope's yoke, if the king, for the ſake of his own private intereſt, had not ſupported the exorbitant power ſo long complained of. But Clement VII. had no ſooner joined with the emperor, than the king's intereſt became the ſame with the people's. To this chiefly are to be aſcribed all the changes mentioned hereafter.

Henry, having reſolved to make the pope ſenſible of the danger of loſing England, if he continued any longer to favour the emperor, cauſed a letter worded in ſtrong terms to be ſent him by the great men of the kingdom, according to the example of their anceſtors in the reign of Henry III [n]. They plainly told him, "That the king's cauſe being their own, if he continued to deny them what was abſolutely neceſſary for their quiet, they were reſolved to apply the remedy themſelves, which was vainly expected from him." This was ſufficient to ſatisfy him that the patience of the Engliſh was almoſt worn out, and they would not ſuffer themſelves to be curbed, or even amuſed, any longer by the court of Rome. Indeed, the letter had not the deſired effect, but however it ſhewed the pope the diſpoſition of the Engliſh, and how neceſſary it was to uſe them gently. Wherefore he returned the great men a very moderate anſwer, vindicating his conduct with reſpect to the king in the beſt manner poſſible. Mean while, he ſent for ſir Gregory Caſſali, the king's embaſſador in ordinary, and hinted to him that the affair might be adjuſted, by means of a diſpenſation, for the king to have two wives. This we learn from the embaſſador's letter of the 18th of September, wherein, after acquainting the king with what the pope ſaid, he added, that the emperor's miniſters were alſo deſirous that the affair ſhould be ended by this expedient. But Henry was ſo aware of all the pope's artifices, that he took no notice of the overture. His reſolution was, either to have a bull to null the marriage, or to procure himſelf, at any rate, the ſatisfaction he required. And therefore, fearing that the pope would unexpectedly ſend into England a bull of excommunication or interdict, he iſſued out a proclamation, forbidding, under ſevere penalties, to receive any bull from Rome, contrary to the prerogatives of the crown. His deſign was to bring the affair before the parliament and clergy, and after gaining theſe two bodies to his intereſt, to cauſe it to be determined in England, without regarding the pope's proceeding againſt him. The difficulty was to prepoſſeſs the people in his favour. To that end, he ordered to be printed and publiſhed, an abſtract of the reaſons for the divorce, that theſe reaſons being known to all the world, he might meet with leſs oppoſition in the parliament. The abſtract [o] contained two principal points. The firſt was, That the king's marriage with Catherine was contrary to the law of God. The ſecond, That Julius II. had not power to grant a diſpenſation for that marriage, and conſequently the diſpenſation could not render it lawful. As this affair was the origin of the great events which will hereafter occur, it will not be perhaps unacceptable to the reader to ſee the ſubſtance of the arguments alleged on both ſides.

It was ſaid for the king, I. That the levitical law, forbidding a man to marry his brother's wife, was not a poſitive precept, which bound only thoſe to whom it was given, but obliged all mankind without exception: that this evidently appeared, in its being found among many others, which forbid the crimes wherewith the Canaanites were polluted. Now the Canaanites could not be polluted with crimes forbidden only by a poſitive law given to another nation.

II. Another argument was taken from what John the Baptiſt ſaid to Herod, in the new teſtament, "It is not lawful [k] At Cambridge, it was carried at laſt with much ado in a convocation, that the matter ſhould be left to a committee of twenty-nine, viz. the vice-chancellor, Dr. Edmonds, head of Peter Houſe, ten doctors, ſixteen bachelors of divinity, and the two proctors; the majority of whom, voted the king's marriage unlawful, but decided not whether the pope had power to diſpenſe with ſuch a marriage. The king's agents at Cambridge, were Gardiner and Fox. At Oxford, the regent maſters ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the king, and the doctors and heads were for him. So that the matter remained in agitation from the 12th of February to the 8th of April. At laſt it was carried in a convocation (from which by an order from the chancellor, ſays Wood, all the maſters of arts were excluded, but, according to Burnet, conſiſting of all the doctors and maſters) that the buſineſs ſhould be decided by thirty-three doctors and bachelors of divinity, who declared the marriage of the brother's wife to be contrary to the laws of God and nature, and put the common ſeal of the univerſity to their decree on April 8. He was accompanied by John Stockeſley, elect biſhop of Lincoln, and Edward Lee. Burnet, vol. I. p. 87, 95.

The letter it ſeems was ſent about to the chief members for their hands, and Cavendiſh tells us with what cheerfulneſs cardinal Wolſey ſigned it. It was ſubſcribed by the two archbiſhops, four biſhops, two dukes, two marquiſſes, thirteen earls, two viſcounts, twenty-three barons, twenty-two abbots, eleven commoners, moſt of them the king's ſervants. for thee to take thy brother's wife," becauſe St. John could allude only to the law of Moſes, and conſequently owned them to be divine.

III. It was ſhewn, from ſeveral paſſages of Tertullian, and writings of the popes, that the church always deemed the levitical prohibitions as parts of the univerſal law of nature and all mankind. To this was added, the authority of divers provincial ſynods, of the Conſtantinopolitan general council, of the council of Conſtance in the condemnation of Wickliff, of many Greek and Latin fathers, and of ſeveral ſchoolmen.

IV. It was proved, by the authority of the popes and councils, that a marriage is compleated by the mutual contract of the parties, though it be never conſummated. For that reaſon, it was ſaid, Adonijah could not marry Abiſhag, who had been his father David's wife, though David never knew her: that upon the ſame account, Joſeph could not put away Mary without a bill of divorce; a clear evidence that their marriage was compleat, though not conſummated. Hence it was inferred, that though prince Arthur had not conſummated his marriage, it was not the leſs valid. But it was maintained, that it was as certain as a thing of that nature could be, that the marriage was conſummated. It was proved firſt, by violent preſumptions; ſecondly, becauſe after Arthur's death, the princeſs, his widow, was ſuppoſed to be with child, and ſhe never ſaid any thing to the contrary. It is true, it might be objected, that Catherine had ſince ſworn, ſhe was never known by that prince. But it was replied, the canon law forbids the taking of oaths when there are ſtrong preſumptions to the contrary. Beſides, the queen's oath could not be reckoned deciſive, ſince it was deſtroyed by the brief produced by her own advocates.

V. Julius's diſpenſation being the ſole foundation on which the validity of the king's marriage was eſtabliſhed, it was ſhewn, by a crowd of witneſſes, both ancient and modern, that the pope has not power to diſpenſe with the laws of God. Nay, it was affirmed, that if he diſpenſed with the decrees of the church, it was uſurpation, and that ſeveral biſhops in England itſelf had reſiſted the popes, when they would have aſſumed ſuch a liberty.

On the other ſide, the queen's advocates replied to theſe reaſons;

I. That the prohibitions in Leviticus were not parts of the moral law, ſince God himſelf had diſpenſed with them, in commanding the brother to marry his brother's widow. But of what nature ſoever the law was, if it were diſpenſed with by Moſes to the Jews, why might it not be as well done by the pope to the Chriſtians?

II. It was ſaid, the law, in Leviticus, againſt marrying the brother's wife, muſt be underſtood of not taking her while the brother was alive; for after he was dead, by another law, a man was commanded by God himſelf to marry his brother's wife.

III. The crime St. John Baptiſt reproached Herod with, might be adultery as well as inceſt, ſince, according to Joſephus and Euſebius, Herod's brother Philip was alive when St. John ſpoke.

IV. The popes daily diſpenſed, contrary to the laws of God, with vows and oaths, without being cenſured. Beſides, it was maintained, the pope was the only judge whether the prohibition was moral or not.

V. It was alleged, the pope had granted the diſpenſation upon a very weighty conſideration, to keep peace between the two crowns of Spain and England.

VI. It was urged, that the marriage had ſubſiſted near twenty years, and never been thought invalid.

VII. Laſtly, It was affirmed, if there were any nullities in the bull of diſpenſation, the pope was the only competent judge of it.

The king's advocates replied to theſe arguments, and were anſwered again by the writers on the queen's ſide, both practiſing what is very common on ſuch occaſions, that is, they evaded the force of the reaſons of the oppoſite party, by keeping to generals. I ſhall ſay no more of it. Thoſe that are curious to ſee the arguments on both ſides, may be ſatisfied by reading the hiſtory of the reformation of England, where they are fully ſet forth. It will ſuffice to remark, that in theſe diſputes was ſpent the whole year 1530, Henry being very glad the people ſhould be thoroughly informed of the affair, before it was brought to the parliament.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, cardinal Wolſey remained at his country houſe, living betwixt hope and fear, without being able to form any probable conjecture of the king's behaviour towards him. Though all his goods were ſeized, and that ſeemed to denote he intended to ſhew him no favour, yet he ſaw, from time to time, ſome rays of goodneſs ſhine upon him [p], which made him hope that his maſter, who had loved him ſo well, would not be for ever inexorable. And indeed, the 12th of February, the king granted him a general pardon of all his offences, of what nature ſoever. Among all the pardons in the Collection of the Public Acts, there are none ſo full and particular as this. Then the king came to an agreement with the cardinal, by which he left him the archbiſhopric of York, with all its revenues and dependencies, except York Place. As to the ſee of Winchеſter, and abbey of St. Alban's, the king reſerved to himſelf the revenues, though he left him the titles. But the cardinal was bound to reſign theſe two benefices when required. In conſideration whereof, the king aſſigned him a thouſand marks ſterling a year, out of the biſhopric of Winchеſter, with a promiſe to grant him the like penſion upon ſome other benefice, in caſe this was taken from him. Moreover, he gave him to the value of ſix thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four pounds three ſhillings and ſeven-pence halfpenny, in money and goods, part of thoſe belonging to the cardinal, which had been confiſcated [q]. All the reſt remained to the king with the cardinal's conſent, who owned it as a particular favour that the king was pleaſed to leave him any thing. This was all he preſerved of the immenſe riches acquired during his credit. But what afflicted him moſt ſenſibly, was, that his two colleges, founded with ſo much pains, and called by his own name, to be an everlaſting monument of his glory, were likewiſe confiſcated. He wrote to the king upon that ſubject, in a manner that perfectly ſhewed his extreme concern for that loſs: he even entreated Cromwell to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to hinder his two colleges from being involved in his ruin: but it was all in vain. The king took poſſeſſion of all the lands belonging to them [r], and, depriving them of the name of their founder, endowed them anew in his own.

Notwithſtanding all this, Wolſey had ſtill hopes, by reaſon of ſome marks of friendſhip given him by the king upon certain occaſions. He had permitted him to remove to Richmond, where he was nearer his perſon. Moreover, hearing he was ſick, he ſent a lord to viſit him in his name, and even cauſed Anne Bullen to write to him [s]. But at the ſame time that the compaſſion expreſſed for him by the king cheriſhed his hopes, it made his enemies apprehenſive of his return to court, and therefore they never ceaſed to exaſperate the king againſt him. In ſhort, as they could not ſee him ſo near the court without fearing the revival of the king's affection for a miniſter he had ſo paſſionately loved, they cauſed an order to be ſent him [t] to withdraw to his dioceſe of York.

[q] That the curious reader may form an eſtimate from thence, of the real proportion the value of money bears now to what it did then, here is a liſt of the money and goods, as we find it in the original grant: Firſt, in ready money, three thouſand pounds. Item, in plate, nine thouſand five hundred ſixty-five ounces and one eighth, at three ſhillings and eight-pence the ounce, amounteth to one thouſand ſeven hundred fifty-two pounds thirteen ſhillings and ſeven-pence halfpenny. Item, divers apparel of houſhold, as hangings, &c. amounting to eight hundred pounds. Item, eighty horſes and geldings, with their furniture, valued at one hundred and fifty pounds. Item, in mules for the ſaddle, four, with their furniture, valued at ſixty pounds. Item, in mules for carriage, ſix, with their furniture, valued at forty pounds. In ling, one thouſand, valued at fifty pounds. In cod and haberden, eight hundred, valued at forty pounds. In ſalt, eight wave, valued at ten pounds. In implements of the kitchen, as pots, &c. at eighty pounds. In mutton (ſheep) ſeventy, valued at twelve pounds. In fifty-two oxen, valued at eighty pounds. In wearing apparel, to the value of three hundred pounds. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XIV. p. 375.

[r] They remained in the king's hands till 1532, in which time ſeveral of the manors, and other eſtates, particularly in Eſſex and Oxfordſhire, were granted to ſir Richard Page, and other courtiers. In 1532, the king, by Cromwell's and Gardiner's advice, founded anew the college in Oxford, (now called Chriſt Church) and ſettled on it two thouſand pounds a year; but it was diſſolved again, by commiſſion, in 1545, and two months after was revived by the king's letters patents; and the next year the king removed the epiſcopal ſee from Oſney to this college. As for the building, Wolſey finiſhed only the hall and the kitchen. Fiddes's life of Wolſey, p. 306, &c. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XIV. p. 409, 410, 443. But Very probably, Anne Bullen contributed moſt to his diſgrace, ſince none but a miſtreſs could poſſibly make the king forget ſuch a favourite. However this be, the cardinal, being forced to ſubmit, began his journey [u] to the north with a train, though not ſo large as uſual during his proſperity, yet conſiſting ſtill of a hundred and ſixty horſe [w]. He arrived about the end of September, at Cawood [x], where he ſtaid, according to the cuſtom of the archbiſhops of York, till things were ready for the ceremony of his inſtallment, which was to be performed in a month, with a magnificence little ſuitable to his preſent condition. But whilſt he was preparing to enjoy in his archbiſhopric the ſmall remains of authority, which he imagined would be ſtill left him, he was arreſted by the earl of Northumberland [y] for high treaſon. He would have inſiſted at firſt upon his privilege as cardinal. But the earl told him, that ſhould not hinder him from executing the king's orders. At the ſame time his phyſician was ſeized, and ſent to London with his legs tied to his horſe. It is not known to this day, whether the king had been poſſeſſed that the cardinal had a deſign upon his life, which however is not very probable. Be this as it will, he ſet forward by eaſy journies to London, extremely concerned to think he was going to appear as a criminal in a city, where he had before commanded with almoſt a ſovereign authority. But in all likelihood his grief turned to his advantage, as it threw him into a fit of ſickneſs, which conſtrained him to ſtop at Leiceſter abbey, where he ended his days the 30th of November [z]. Before he expired, he ſaid to the king's officer who ſtood near his bed: "If I had ſerved God as diligently as I have done the king, he would not have given me over in my grey hairs." But I do not know whether he had reaſon to boaſt of his zeal and diſintereſtedneſs in the ſervices he had done the king. He added, ſpeaking to the ſame officer, that if, as he thought him worthy, he ſhould ever be admitted to the king's council, he ſhould take care what he put in his head, for he would never be able to put it out again. This ſeems to intimate, he had counſelled the king to undertake the divorce, which afterwards he would have diſſuaded him from. And indeed, he deſired the ſame perſon to tell the king, that he prayed him to call to remembrance what had paſſed betwixt them about the divorce, and hoped, that when he ſhould be leſs prejudiced, he would do him more juſtice. This ſhews that he looked upon that affair as the ſole cauſe of his diſgrace. Thus died this famous cardinal, the proudeſt and moſt haughty of men, and we may add, the moſt ambitious and moſt greedy of eſtates and honours. It is affirmed, that while he governed the king, he never gave him advice without a view to his own intereſt. This alone would be ſufficient to obſcure all the fine qualities he might otherwiſe have, but which in the main amounted only to a great penetration, whereof he made an ill uſe. The king ſhewed a concern for his death [a]. And yet, ſince he had ordered him to be arreſted for high treaſon, very probably his ruin was determined. Henry was of a temper to accompliſh whatever he undertook [b]. This will plainly appear hereafter, in his extraordinary ſeverity to perſons, who doubtleſs were not ſo guilty as this favourite.

The affair of the divorce [c] and its conſequences employing Henry during the reſidue of his life, it will for the future be the principal thing I ſhall have to ſpeak of to the end of this reign. But as by the alterations introduced by this prince into his kingdom, his affairs led him to concern himſelf with the troubles of Germany, it is neceſſary, for the underſtanding of the ſequel, briefly to mention what paſſed in that country.

The emperor's aim in calling the diet of Augſburg, was rather to inflame than appeaſe the religious troubles. Since he made peace with France, and Italy was, as it were, ſubject to his yoke, he was forming vaſt projects. He ſaw himſelf maſter of Spain, Italy, and the Low Countries; his brother Ferdinand was now king of Bohemia, and had been elected king of Hungary. With theſe advantages he hoped to be able to ſubdue the reſt of Europe. It was neceſſary to begin with Germany, where he had great power, as emperor and archduke of Auſtria, becauſe if he once became abſolute in the empire, and could diſpoſe of the forces of the German princes, he imagined France and England would not be able to reſiſt him. The troubles cauſed by religion in Germany ſeemed to him a very ſpacious pretence to arm againſt the proteſtants, judging, that after ruining them by the help of the catholics, theſe would in their turn be eaſily ſubdued. I cannot be accuſed here of aſcribing to this monarch deſigns he never really had, ſince it is notorious that himſelf and ſucceſſors purſued gradually, and I, may ſay, openly, the execution of the ſame project. The wars that afflicted Europe for more than a century, were ſolely excited by the boundleſs ambition of the houſe of Auſtria, whom the other ſovereigns were concerned to oppoſe.

Since Luther's preaching in Germany, the reformation had made ſo great progreſs, that ſeveral princes of the empire, and many Hans Towns had openly embraced it. As they were accuſed of introducing many innovations in religion, in anſwer to that charge, they proteſted, their intent was only to adhere to the doctrine of the goſpel and religon of the primitive church. And therefore, they demanded that a free council might be held in ſome city of Germany, where the religious differences might be calmnly examined by the word of God. But this was a method which their adverſaries could not allow. They ſuppoſed, as a thing certain, that the religion profeſſed before Luther's appearance, was the true religion, and being without ſpot, wrinkle, or the like, had no need of reformation. According to that principle, they thought the point was not to examine it at all, but to compel the recuſants or heretics to conform. This was the conſtant maxim, long ſince followed by the Romiſh clergy, and which cauſed them to uſe fire and ſword to exterpate thoſe they were pleaſed to term heretics. But in the ſituation of Germany, at the time I am ſpeaking of, it was not eaſy to practiſe that maxim. It was not private perſons only who declared againſt the Roman church, but cities, whole nations and ſovereigns. So the zealous abettors of the old religion were not in condition to reduce them by force. Therefore they choſe to feed them with hopes of a free council, till the affairs of Europe were ſo diſpoſed that it might be hoped to reduce them by way of authority. Several diets had been held upon that ſubject in Germany, where, contrary to the opinion of the court of Rome, the emperor and the catholic princes had been obliged to conceal their ſentiments and conſent to a toleration, which however left them at liberty to act another time according to their real principles.

When Luther began to appear, the religious diſputes turned only upon the exceſſive abuſes of the papal power and a few other points. Then Luther had on his ſide almoſt all the lay princes of Germany, and many Hans Towns, each of which was a republic. From that time he made new diſcoveries, and publiſhed them to the world. But he had not upon all the articles the ſame number of followers as upon that of the papal authority. Beſides, the emperor and the zealous catholics oppoſed with all their power the progreſs of the reformation. Care was taken to intimidate ſuch as inclined that way, or to continue them in the old religion by promiſes, by places, by poſts, which did not little help to confirm them in their firſt ſentiments. So, for ſome years, the reformers uſed all poſſible endeavours to gain proſelytes, and the Romiſh clergy were as diligent to hinder their progreſs. Mean time, whilſt they ſtrove only in this manner,

By the mediation of the earl, ſir William Kingſton, conſtable of the Tower, (the perſon to whom he ſpoke his laſt words) was ſent by the king to convey him to London. With much ado, being hardly able to ſit his horſe, he got to Leiceſter abbey, where, upon their coming out to receive him, he ſaid, Father abbot, I am come to lay my bones among you. He was buried in the abbey chapel, of which even the ruins are not at preſent to be diſcovered. He died the 28th of November, according to Burnet; and according to Fiddes, the 29th, of a dyſentary, p. 529. He had begun a monument for himſelf with his own image, which one Benedetto, a ſtatuary of Florence, took in hand in 1524, and continued till 1529, receiving for ſo much as was already done four thouſand two hundred and fifty ducats. The deſign whereof was ſo glorious, that it exceeded far that of Henry VII. But upon his death the king ſeized what was finiſhed, and called it his. Thus the cardinal's tomb had the ſame fate with his college. He is ſaid to behave mighty well during the time he was in the north, after his diſgrace, and to become very popular. As no man (ſays Polydore) did ever riſe with fewer virtues, ſo (ſays lord Herbert) few that ever fell from ſo high a place had leſſer crimes objected againſt him. the reformation daily took root, which obliged the adverſaries to ſeek other means to prevent its growth, thoſe hitherto uſed not proving very effectual.

In 1524, Charles V. coming to the diet of Worms, ſent for Luther, and, after a hearing, baniſhed him the empire, with all his adherents, by a formal decree in the diet's name. But ſome pretend, the diet was not concerned in the decree: however, the emperor perſiſted to maintain it. But it ſeems the Germans conſidered it not as obligatory. The next year the diet, held at Noremberg, produced againſt the court of Rome a hundred grievances, of which they demanded the redreſs by means of a free council.

Another diet, held at the ſame place, paſſed a decree, whereby it was reſolved to demand a free council in Germany. But, upon their diſſolution, the catholics aſſembled by themſelves at Ratiſbon, and ordered the decree of Worms to be executed.

In another diet, at Spires, in 1526, the emperor cauſed it to be declared, that he meant not that any reſolution ſhould be taken concerning the affairs of religion, but only concerning the method of executing the decree of Worms, till there ſhould be a general council. But as this council was yet very remote, the diet decreed the emperor ſhould be prayed to procure a council in Germany within a year, and in the mean while, every one ſhould ſo govern himſelf in point of religion, as to be able to give an account of his conduct to God and the emperor.

During theſe tranſactions, the war which the Turks had carried into Hungary ſuſpended for ſome time the execution of Charles V.'s projects againſt thoſe who had embraced the new religion, becauſe he wanted the aſſiſtance of all the German princes, as well proteſtants as catholics [d]. Beſides, his war then with France ſuffered him not to think much of the affairs of Germany. But in 1529, being upon the point of making peace with France, he thought he might talk in a higher ſtrain. He called a diet at Spires, where it was ordered, that thoſe who had hitherto obeyed the decree of Worms, ſhould continue to obſerve it, and the reſt that had not ſubmitted ſhould make no innovations in religion, nor hinder their ſubjects from going to maſs. Againſt this decree the elector of Saxony and Brandenburgh, the landgrave of Heſſe, and the princes of Lunenburg, made a ſolemn proteſtation, from whence all their party were called proteſtants. The emperor, who was then in Italy, very roughly received the proteſtation brought to him by deputies, and thereby obliged the proteſtants to unite for their common defence, the emperor diſcovering by his words that he had ill deſigns againſt them. In the diet, which was to meet at Augſburg in April 1530, but did not, however, aſſemble till June, he was reſolved to lay the foundation of his projected war againſt the proteſtants.

At the opening of the diet, the emperor's chancellor made a long ſpeech, complaining, in his maſter's name, of thoſe who had hitherto endeavoured to alter the ancient faith, and cardinal Campegio exhorted the Germans to extirpate the errors that were crept into Germany. That done, the proteſtants deſired they might declare their belief before the diet. This was denied them, and they were made to take as a favour the leave granted them to deliver their confeſſion of faith in writing. The landgrave of Heſſe, ſeeing ſo great partiality in the diet, withdrew without taking leave; whereupon the emperor commanded the gates of Augſburg to be ſhut, ſhewing, he intended to uſe violence towards thoſe that remained in the city. But upon the elector of Saxony's remonſtrances, he ordered them to be opened. In ſhort, after many debates [e], he cauſed to be publiſhed, in the diet's name, a decree entirely againſt the proteſtants, and which, upon the hopes he gave them of a general council, obliged them to deſtroy whatever had been done in point of religion to that day.

The diet ending in this manner, the emperor ordered the archbiſhop of Mentz to aſſemble the electors to proceed to the election of a king of the Romans, intending to cauſe his brother Ferdinand to be choſen. The proteſtants ſtrenuouſly oppoſed this meeting, affirming there was no occaſion to elect a king of the Romans, and demonſtrating the inconveniencies which would ariſe from his deſign to render the Imperial crown as it were hereditary to the houſe of Auſtria. In fine, ſeeing that notwithſtanding their remonſtrances, it was deſigned to proceed to the election, they met at Smalcald the 22d of December 1530, and concluded a defenſive league againſt all who ſhould attack them on account of religion. Then they made a formal proteſtation againſt the intended election of a king of the Romans without their conſent. In this ſituation were the affairs of religion in Germany about the end of the year 1530.

[1531] After the emperor had quitted Italy, the pope's nuntio continually preſſed him to pronounce judgment upon the affair of the duke of Ferrara. The pope could not imagine but the judgment would be in his favour, conſidering the emperor's engagement with him by the treaty of Barcelona. But whether the emperor had more fully examined the matter, or for ſome other reaſon, he gave ſentence, that Modena and Reggio belonged of right to the duke of Ferrara; but, to ſatisfy the pope, he ſhould pay a hundred thouſand ducats, for which the pope ſhould be obliged to give him the inveſtiture of Ferrara, as granted to his predeceſſors; and to begin to execute this ſentence, he delivered Modena to the duke. The pope, extremely diſpleaſed with a judgment ſo different from what he expected, refuſed to ſubmit to it, and in hopes of ſeizing Ferrara, would not receive the hundred thouſand ducats offered him by the duke.

Clement VII. being thus incenſed againſt the emperor, had great inclinations to be reconciled with the kings of France and England, imagining he ſhould be received with open arms. Indeed, Francis I. had unwillingly agreed to the treaty of Cambray, and ſolely becauſe there was no other way to recover his ſons. But ſince he had received them, he had been thinking how to retrieve what he had loſt by that treaty. To this end, he privately laboured to ſow jealouſies among the princes, by making them apprehenſive of the emperor's ambition, and promiſing them aſſiſtance. As ſoon as he was informed of the pope's diſcontent, he thought nothing ſhould be neglected to gain him to his intereſt at ſo favourable a juncture. Wherefore he propoſed a marriage between Catherine de Medici, daughter of the late duke Lorenzo, and the duke of Orleans her ſecond ſon; an honour to which the family of the Medici durſt never aſpire, if the king had not offered it himſelf. On the other hand, Henry, knowing the union between the pope and the emperor was the ſole cauſe of the obſtacles in the affair of the divorce, did not queſtion he ſhould eaſily effect his deſigns if he could ſet them at variance. But two things hindered him from applying himſelf to that means. The firſt was, he could not truſt the pope. The ſecond, that he began to find his ſubjects much more inclined to ſhake off the papal yoke than he had imagined, and therefore did not think himſelf under a neceſſity to depend upon the pope. If he had at firſt humbly addreſſed the pope, it was partly becauſe he feared the pope's prejudice in favour of Chriſt's vicar. But when he found this prejudice was not ſo ſtrong as he had believed, he never troubled himſelf about the pope's oppoſition. His kingdom being ſafe from invaſions by land, he had nothing to fear from any prince in Europe, provided his ſubjects were not terrified with the thunders of the Vatican. But the Engliſh were not, in that reſpect, the ſame as formerly. Wickliff had begun to enlighten them; the conduct of the late popes had increaſed their light; and Luther's books and followers had quite opened their eyes. Since the ſpreading of the new doctrine in England, the pope's authority was ſo diſcredited, that the Engliſh for the moſt part wiſhed for a favourable opportunity to throw off a yoke they had ſo long groaned under. This made the king reſolve to have his cauſe tried by the parliament and convocation.

The parliament meeting the 6th of January, the chancellor opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, declaring, that the king earneſtly wiſhed to annul his marriage, not from diſhoneſt motives, as ſome laboured to make his people believe, but for the peace of his conſcience, and the welfare of the kingdom, being unwilling to leave the ſucceſſion of the crown in danger of being diſputed. Then he cauſed a great number of books and treatiſes written on that ſubject, with abſtracts of ſeveral authors both antient and modern, to be brought, with the determinations of the univerſities of France, Italy, and England, which were all left upon the table to be examined at leiſure [f]. The king's deſign was

[d] January 21ſt, king Henry empowered Thomas, earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond; John Stockeſley, biſhop elect of London; Dr. William Lee, and Dr. William Bennet, to conclude a league with the pope, the emperor, the kings of France, Portugal, &c. againſt the Turk. See Rymer's Fœd. tom. XIV. p. 354.

[e] In one of which, upon the proteſtants affirming theirs was the ancient religion, the emperor would needs diſpute himſelf; which the Spaniſh writers ſay he did with that eagerneſs that he drew his dagger. Herbert, p. 150.

[f] The king firſt brought in the books and determinations of the univerſities to the houſe of Lords, and after they were read and conſidered there, the chancellor did on the 20th of March, or (according to lord Herbert, on the 31ſt) with twelve lords ſpiritual and temporal, go down to the houſe of alſo brought before the convocation, who declared they were ſatisfied the king's marriage was contrary to the law of God. The king required no more at that time. He had another important affair to debate with the clergy, which was to be decided before this was farther examined. Very likely the convocation, being informed of the king's intent, the more readily gave their opinion for him, as they perfectly knew how much they ſhould want his favour in the buſineſs in hand, which was of the utmoſt conſequence.

Cardinal Wolſey had been accuſed, by the attorney general, of exerciſing in England his legatine authority without the king's ſpecial licence, and of diſpoſing, as legate, of ſeveral benefices, contrary to the ſtatutes of proviſors and præmunire. Hence it naturally followed, that thoſe who had owned his authority, and appeared in his courts, were equally liable to be indicted. By this means, all the clergy were in the ſame caſe, ſince there was ſcarce one but what had applied to him during the courſe of his legateſhip. So, after the king had procured of the convocation an approbation of his proceedings concerning the divorce, he ordered an indictment to be brought into the king's-bench againſt all the clergy, for breaking the laws of the realm[g]. He had in this a double view; the firſt, to draw a good ſum from the clergy; the ſecond, to humble that powerful body, and ſo leſſen their great credit with the people, who before had always ſeen them ſupported by the royal authority. He knew he ſhould meet with the greateſt oppoſition from the clergy in the affair of the divorce. For that reaſon he was very glad to put it out of their power to hurt him, by keeping them as it were in dependence, and by ſowing a kind of diviſion between the clergy and people, by the ſatisfaction theſe would probably expreſs at the diſgrace of the eccleſiaſtics, who had ever treated them with great haughtineſs. He thereby put the clergy under a neceſſity of recurring to the royal protection, and conſequently of ſhewing leſs zeal for the intereſt of the court of Rome. This ſucceeded according to his expectation. In vain did the clergy plead, that the king himſelf had connived at the cardinal's proceedings. What had not been ſerviceable to Wolſey, was not capable of excuſing them that had owned his authority. So the court proceeded to a ſentence, that the clergy were all out of the king's protection, and liable to the pains in the ſtatute of præmunire. The people were extremely pleaſed, and particularly the favourers of the new religion, to ſee the clergy humbled to ſo great a degree. On the other hand, the clergy plainly perceived, that, as the laity ſtood affected, it would be in vain to reſiſt the king. They could expect no more aſſiſtance from Rome. Since the pope had quarreled with the king, he had loſt all his power; and as the king ſhewed he would no longer regard him, the thunders of the Vatican were looked upon with contempt. The clergy, in this their ill ſituation, reſolved to purchaſe the king's favour at any rate, finding they could no longer depend upon the people, who were much altered from what they were formerly. So the convocation of Canterbury, having debated upon the affair, reſolved[h] to offer the king a hundred thouſand pounds for a pardon. Purſuant to the reſolution, ſome of their members were ordered to draw an act for that purpoſe. Probably they who were charged with this commiſſion were friends of the court, and had a mind to take this opportunity to give the king a prerogative which none of his predeceſſors had ever enjoyed. Lord Herbert and doctor Burnet ſay, the convocation reſolved to preſent a petition to the king, to pray him to accept of a hundred thouſand pounds. But as this inſtrument is extant in the Collection of the Public Acts, it may now be ſpoken of with greater exactneſs. It was not a petition, but a public act of the clergy, in form of letters patents, whereby they gave that ſum to the king. It was ſaid in the inſtrument, that it was, firſt, in conſideration of his great merit. Secondly, in teſtimony of the clergy's gratitude for the great benefits he had procured the catholic church, as well by his pen as his ſword. Thirdly, for his zeal againſt the Lutherans, who were labouring to deſtroy the church of England, of which the clergy acknowledged the king ſole protector, and ſupreme head[i]. Laſtly, in hopes he would be pleaſed to grant the clergy and all their members a pardon of all the offences committed againſt the ſtatutes of proviſors and præmunire.

When this inſtrument was read in the convocation, many diſliked that the clergy ſhould be made to ſay, that they acknowledged the king for protector and ſupreme head of the church of England. Some imagined it was inſerted through inadvertency and exceſſive flattery, whereof the penners of the inſtrument had not conſidered the conſequence. Others ſaid, it was intended to ſurprize the convocation, by inſerting theſe words in the body of an inſtrument, which was only to grant a ſum to the king. They added theſe words, which ſeemed to be put in by accident, and without deſign, were however of very great conſequence, and as the convocation had not taken any reſolution upon that point, they were for razing them out. But, on the other hand, thoſe who were in the ſecret, pretended the words could not be put out by a formal reſolve, without diſpleaſing the king, and giving him occaſion to refuſe the offered compenſation. This cauſed ſuch debates, that they were forced to put off the deciſion of the affair to the next day. It was not without reaſon that ſeveral dreaded the conſequence which might very naturally be drawn from theſe words, ſince it was evident, the clergy was thereby engaged to acknowledge the pope no longer head of the church of England, which could not have two ſupreme heads at once. This was in effect the king's intention, as well as theirs who had penned or drawn the inſtrument, as plainly appeared the next day. Thomas Cromwell, with others of the king's council, going to the convocation, very clearly hinted, that the point in debate yeſterday was very agreeable to the king, and he could not but conſider the oppoſers as very diſaffected perſons. After ſuch a declaration, there was not one that durſt directly oppoſe it, eſpecially as the archbiſhop and ſeveral other prelates openly maintained, that the king was truly the ſupreme head of the church of England. So the act paſſed as it was drawn; only ſome moved to add this reſtriction, "as far as is conſiſtent with the law of Chriſt." But it was not the king's intention to leave a door for thoſe to eſcape, who ſhould hereafter diſpute his ſupremacy[k]. The inſtrument, being ſealed the 22d of March, was preſented to the king, who very graciouſly accepted both the clergy's preſent and his new title, of which he afterwards made great uſe. The convocation of the province of York reſolved likewiſe to give the king eighteen thouſand eight hundred and forty pounds. But as they omitted in the grant to acknowledge the king ſupreme head of the church of England, they were told that their preſent would not be accepted, if they ſpoke not like the convocation of Canterbury. So the clergy of York province were forced to inſert the ſame acknowledgment in their inſtrument. In this manner the king procured, or rather extorted, from the clergy, the title of ſupreme head of the church of England. It is certain, that though ſome freely gave it him, yet the major part were not of that opinion[l]. This is evident from the method uſed to obtain it. The acknowledgment was procured in the manner we have ſeen, by Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, Thomas Cromwell, and ſome others, who verily believed there was no occaſion for the pope. Thoſe who flattered themſelves at firſt, that the words were inſerted without deſign in the inſtrument brought into the convocation of Canterbury, might have ſeen their error, if they had attended to another article in the ſame inſtrument, and which was alſo inſerted in that of the province of York, namely, that the clergy did promiſe for the future neither to make nor execute any conſtitution without the king's licence. This was, in other words, acknowledging the king for ſupreme head of the church of England. We ſhall ſee hereafter what uſe Henry made of this new title.

The king, being ſatisfied with the clergy, granted them a pardon in ample form. But when the pardon was brought into the houſe of commons, they refuſed to paſs it, unleſs the laity, who might have been guilty of the ſame offences, were alſo included[m]. Henry, offended at their oppoſition, commons, and ſhewed them the books, and produced twelve original papers, with the ſeals of the univerſities to them, which ſir Brian Tuke read openly in the houſe; when that was done, the chancellor ſpoke the ſpeech mentioned above. So that he did not open the ſeſſion of parliament with it, as Rapin ſays, a few lines above. See Burnet, tom. I. p. 105. Herbert, p. 152. Hall, fol. 195.

[k] Though archbiſhop Parker and our author ſay, the act paſſed without the reſtriction, yet it appears, by ſeveral paſſages in Henry's letter to biſhop Tunſtal, who in the convocation at York had proteſted againſt it, that the words quantum per Chriſti legem licet were inſerted, and the act ſo paſſed, by nine biſhops (the biſhop of Rocheſter being one) and fifty-two abbots and priors, and the major part of the lower houſe of convocation, and particularly Stephen Gardiner. ſent them word, he would be maſter of his own favours, and not ſuffer them to be forced from him. The king's reſolution terrified the commons, who, to avoid his indignation, paſſed the pardon as it was, throwing themſelves upon his mercy as to what concerned the laity. Then the king, ſatisfied with their ſubmiſſion, granted to his temporal ſubjects a pardon like to that of his ſpiritual. It ſeems, however, that the colleges and monaſteries were excepted, who, not being included in the pardons, were forced to compound with the king, as we find in the Collection of the Public Acts.

So far were the people from riſing (as they would doubtleſs have done, had they been under the ſame prejudice with their anceſtors in the reigns of Henry II. and king John) that, on the contrary, joy was viſibly painted on their faces, being highly delighted to ſee the clergy humbled. Thus that body, ſo formidable theretofore, inſtead of daring to reſiſt the king, were conſtrained to fly to his protection, becauſe they ſaw plainly the people ſhewed no concern at their diſgrace, and they had no remedy elſewhere [n].

When the pope heard what had paſſed in England, he was terribly embarraſed. He ſaw Henry purſuing ſuch meaſures as would probably be attended with fatal conſequences. However he durſt not venture to proceed haughtily, for fear of engaging in a quarrel, which he foreſaw would not be to his advantage. Beſides his not being pleaſed with the emperor, he ſaw him upon the point of being fully employed by the Turks and the German proteſtants, at a time when France and England were in ſtrict union. So, perceiving no aſſiſtance ſpeedy enough, in caſe he ſhould attempt to exert his authority, he choſe to be ſilent, in expectation of a proper ſeaſon to act, or at leaſt to be reconciled to the king.

This affair being ended, Henry prorogued the parliament [o]. Then he ordered the determinations of the univerſities to be printed, with the opinions of the learned concerning his marriage, that againſt the next ſeſſion every one might be informed of the ſtate of the caſe, and of his motives to proſecute the divorce. Mean while, as in putting away the queen, his intent was to marry Anne Bullen, he paſſionately wiſhed the queen would be perſuaded to conſent to the divorce, in order to avoid the inconveniencies which might ariſe from her obſtinacy. To that purpoſe, he ſent ſome biſhops and lay-lords [p], earneſtly to preſs her, either to conſent to the divorce, or refer the deciſion of the affair to four prelates and four ſeculars. But as ſhe could not be prevailed with to deſiſt from her appeal to the pope [q], he ſent her word to chuſe where ſhe would reſide in any of his manors, and, the 14th of July 1531, took his leave of her at Windſor, intending never to ſee her more [r].

What had lately paſſed in the parliament and convocation encouraged the well-wiſhers to a reformation in the church, to which they already ſaw ſome preparatives. For this reaſon, religious diſputes became more frequent and public than formerly. But the king perceiving what inferences would be drawn from the firſt proceedings, was pleaſed to ſhew, that in throwing off the papal yoke he deſigned not to ſtrike at the fundamental truths of religion. So, to fruſtrate thoſe who had any ſuch thought, he commanded the laws againſt heretics to be rigorouſly executed. This occaſioned the death of three proteſtants, namely, Bilney, Bayfield, and Baynham, of whom the two firſt were burnt this year, and the other in the following April [s].

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting in England, the affairs of Germany were more embroiled. In the beginning of the year, Ferdinand of Auſtria, king of Bohemia and Hungary, was elected king of the Romans, notwithſtanding the protection of the confederates of Smalcald, and crowned a few days after at Aix la Chapelle. This was in conſequence of a league concluded between the catholic princes of Germany in the foregoing November. But this league was offenſive, whereas that of Smalcald was only defenſive. Never had the proteſtants any deſign to force the conſciences of ſuch as differed from them in opinion. But the intent of the catholic league was, to compel the proteſtants to return to the church they had forſaken. Theſe proteſted againſt Ferdinand's election, as unneceſſary and contrary to the uſual forms. But their proteſtation had no effect.

The reſt of the year was ſpent in ſundry negotiations, wherein the emperor ſeemed to have no other aim than to adjuſt the religious differences, though in effect his deſign was only to amuſe the proteſtants, and hinder them from taking meaſures for their defence, when they ſhould be attacked. As they were not ignorant of his artifices, they wrote on that ſubject to the kings of France and England, who returned them favourable anſwers, with a promiſe of aſſiſtance in caſe it was attempted to oppreſs them. Not that theſe two monarchs deſired to countenance the reformation, but it was their intereſt to protect the German proteſtants, becauſe their deſtruction could not but exceedingly increaſe the emperor's power. Indeed, this was one of the chief means whereby that prince intended to execute his vaſt deſigns.

[1532] Whilſt the emperor was forming projects to become maſter of Germany, under colour of ſupporting the intereſts of religion and the empire, Francis I. was trying to create him troubles capable of producing ſome change, which he might improve. His vexation to have been forced to ſign the treaty of Cambray threw him upon earneſtly ſeeking means to repair his loſſes, and eſpecially to recover Genoa and Milan. To that end, he careſſed or threatened the pope, according as he ſaw it proper to uſe one or other of theſe means, and put the proteſtants of Germany in hopes of a powerful aſſiſtance, in caſe they were attacked by the emperor [t]. But chiefly he laboured to ſecure the king of England, becauſe he could be moſt ſerviceable to him. He confirmed him, as much as poſſible, in his reſolution to puſh the affair of the divorce, in order to keep him always at variance with the emperor and the pope. Sometimes he intimated to him, that if the juſtice due to him was obſtinately refuſed, he would join in a league with him to withdraw their dominions from the tyrannical power of the court of Rome. Then fearing he would agree with the emperor, he adviſed him ſpeedily to marry Anne Bullen, well knowing it would be a certain means to widen their breach. Nay, he ſent a letter to the pope, wherein he appeared no leſs concerned than Henry himſelf in the affair of the divorce. Among other things he told him, that if out of complaiſance or fear he continued to be governed by the emperor, he muſt not think it ſtrange that the king of England ſhould endeavour to procure by extraordinary means the juſt ſatisfaction he had ſo long expected in vain; adding, that his intereſt was ſo ſtrictly united with Henry's, that he was indiſpenſibly obliged to aſſiſt to the utmoſt of his power a prince whom he gloried to be the perpetual ally. In ſhort, he prayed him to conſider, whether it was prudent to give thoſe, who could not be compelled to obey, the opportunity and will to withdraw their obedience. But Clement ſeeing only the emperor's forces in Italy, took care not to follow ſuch dangerous counſels.

The two kings finding at length it was impoſſible to gain the pope, reſolved upon an interview, to contrive means to break the emperor's meaſures. But they thought proper firſt to ſpread a report they were going to make a new league, in order to frighten the pope, and hinder him from cloſing again with the emperor, from whom he was a little alienated by the affair of Ferrara. Accordingly, they concluded a league at London, ſigned the 23d of June. But it is manifeſt the treaty was made only with the forementioned view, ſince it contained but two articles that could have reaſonably alarmed the pope or the emperor, had they been known to them. The firſt was, that in caſe the emperor ſeized the Engliſh mer-

The perſon was apprehended, and by act of parliament (22 Hen. VIII.) poiſoning was declared treaſon, and Rouſe was attainted and ſentenced to be boiled to death, which was to be the puniſhment of poiſoning for all times to come; (but was repealed 1 Ed. That no maſter, wardens, or fellowſhip of crafts and trades, nor any rulers of fraternities, take from henceforth of any apprentice, or any other perſon, for the entry of any apprentice into their ſaid fellowſhip, above two ſhillings and ſixpence; nor for his entry, when his years and term is expired, above three ſhillings and fourpence, upon pain of forfeiting forty pounds. 2. That four juſtices of the peace in every ſhire, whereof one to be of the quorum, ſhall have power and authority to enquire, hear, and determine, in the general ſeſſions of the peace, all matters relating to bridges and highways. This act alſo explains by whom bridges and highways are to be repaired. See Statute 21 Hen. VIII.

[t] And alſo ſtirred up the Turks to invade the German dominions. Herbert, p. 154.

When

chants effects in the Low Countries, the king of France would do the ſame with reſpect to the emperor's ſubjects, the Germans excepted: nay, this article was guarded by ſo many reſtrictions on the part of the French king, that it plainly appeared to be only a mere pretence to make a treaty. By the ſecond, if the king of England was attacked by the emperor, Francis was to ſend him an aid of five hundred lances; and if the king of France was invaded, Henry was to aſſiſt him with a body of foot not exceeding five thouſand men [u]. As the public was not acquainted with the particulars of the treaty, ſeveral reports were ſpread. Some ſaid, the two kings had agreed to join in the league of Smalcald, or at leaſt to ſend a powerful aid to the German proteſtants. Others fancied, that as the Turks threatened Auſtria, and the emperor would be unavoidably obliged to lead his forces into that country, Francis would invade at the ſame time the duchy of Milan, and Henry carry war into the Low Countries. All theſe reports, though uncertain, made the emperor very uneaſy, becauſe they were grounded upon very probable conjectures.

The interview of the two kings, between Calais and Boulogne, was not till October [w]. They had principally two things in view. The firſt to divert the blame thrown on them by the emperor, in ſpreading over all Europe, that whilſt Chriſtendom was going to be invaded by the infidels, they remained idle ſpectators of the danger, without offering the leaſt aſſiſtance to thoſe who were preparing to defend her. Their other view was, to keep the Italians and Germans in the expectation of a freſh war, for fear they ſhould become too compliant to the emperor's will. To effect their deſign, they gave one another letters patents, whereby they engaged jointly to raiſe an army of eighty thouſand men to ſtop the progreſs of the Turks, and to lead the ſame either into Germany or Italy, as there ſhould be occaſion. But this pretended agreement was never put into the form of a treaty. Du Tillet ſpeaks of it in his inventory of the treaties between France and England, by the name of letters of agreement: but there are no ſigns of it in the Collection of the Public Acts of England. Wherefore it is not probable, theſe two monarchs deſired to execute this pretended project, the ſole aim whereof was to juſtify them to the world, and inſpire the emperor and pope with terror. Doubtleſs that was the reaſon of their affecting to publiſh it.

During the interview, Henry complained much of the pope, and Francis even improved upon him, in a long enumeration of the complaints he had received from the Gallican church, on account of the court of Rome's exactions. But this was only to amuſe Henry, ſince he was at that very time in ſecret negotiation with the pope concerning the duke of Orleans, his ſecond ſon's marriage with Catherine de Medici. It manifeſtly appears, by that prince's whole conduct, that his ſole aim was to make the king of England's friendſhip ſubſervient to gain the pope, in order to recover Genoa and Milan, which he had always in view. Wherefore he outwardly expreſſed a ſtrong attachment to Henry's intereſt. He even preſſed him not to ſtay for the pope's diſpenſation to marry his miſtreſs, who was preſent at the interview, having lately been made marchioneſs of Pembroke [x]. Whilſt the two kings were together, they feaſted one another ſeveral times, a particular account whereof is needleſs in this place. Henry came to ſee Francis at Boulogne, and Francis returned his viſit at Calais [y]. They parted the 30th of October, to return, the one to Paris, the other to London. But, by reaſon of the bad weather, Henry ſtaid ſome days at Calais [z], where it is ſaid he privately married Anne Bullen [a]. It is more probable, however, as ſome affirm, that it was not till the January following [b].

During this whole year, the emperor was greatly embarraſed. Soliman, emperor of the Turks, threatened to invade Hungary with a powerful army, which he accordingly did. Germany was in trouble, becauſe the proteſtants, who had now been menaced, were taking effectual meaſures for their defence, and refuſed to acknowledge Ferdinand of Auſtria for king of the Romans. On the other hand, the emperor was not ignorant of the pope's diſcontent on account of the duke of Ferrara's affair, and that the kings of France and England were uſing their utmoſt endeavours to draw him off from his party, in order to diſturb Italy. Moreover, the Italians were quiet, only becauſe there was ſtill an Imperial army in Italy, and no preparation in France to ſupport them in caſe they attempted to hold up their head. Mean while, in the midſt of this ſeeming tranquillity, they eagerly wiſhed to ſee ſome revolutions to free them from their apprehenſions of the emperor's over-grown power. In fine, the interview of Francis and Henry extremely troubled the emperor, apprehenſive as he was, that if Soliman proſpered in Hungary they would embrace that opportunity to invade the duchy of Milan and the Low Countries. It was neceſſary therefore to think without loſs of time of preventing the dangers which might proceed from theſe quarters, and to begin with the moſt urgent affair, the ſatisfying the proteſtants in order to have their aſſiſtance againſt the Turks. To that purpoſe, he came the beginning of the year to the diet of Ratiſbon, where he found means to negotiate with the proteſtants an agreement, whereby no perſon was to be diſturbed on account of religion till a council was called. He intended not punctually to perform an agreement, extorted from him by neceſſity. He received however this benefit by it, That all the princes and ſtates of Germany, as well proteſtant as catholic, furniſhed him with a powerful aid, which enabled him to aſſemble an army of eight thouſand foot and thirty thouſand horſe.

Whilſt this army was forming, the emperor, willing to ſound the king of France's intentions, ſent and deſired his aſſiſtance againſt the Turks, but received an unſatisfactory anſwer, which, added to the interview of the two kings, confirmed his ſuſpicion that they were contriving ſomething againſt him. But Soliman haſtening his campaign in Hungary, hindered him from thinking of means to prevent the miſchief he feared from the two confederate kings. Indeed, the Turks not only advanced into Hungary, but even into Auſtria, with deſign to give him battle. But he wiſely avoided it, ſince in loſing it he would have been without refuge, and Auſtria with part of Germany would inevitably have fallen under the dominion of the Turks. Whereas by ſtanding, as he did, upon the defenſive, with an army of above a hundred thouſand men, he prevented them from making any conſiderable progreſs, and compelled them at length to return into their own country, as ſoon as he had certain advice that Soliman was upon his march to Conſtantinople, he departed for Italy, from whence he deſigned to return into Spain.

About the middle of November he came to Bologna, where the pope waited to confer with him. As their deſigns were very oppoſite, there was not that harmony between them as at their interview in the year 1529. The emperor thought only of ſecuring Italy, and preventing the king of France's return. The pope, on the contrary, wiſhed to keep him always uneaſy on that account, as well to render himſelf neceſſary as to be freed from a ſtate of dependence. The emperor required the pope to call a council in Germany, otherwiſe he ſaw no poſſibility of finding a lawful pretence to ruin the proteſtants. But after what had paſſed at Conſtance and Baſil, the very name of a council was become ſo odious to the court of Rome, that Clement VII. could not reſolve to call one. He knew what had befallen John XXII. and Eugenius IV. and therefore had no mind to have his authority queſtioned. The emperor demanded moreover the pope's conſent to a league he intended to form between all the ſtates of Italy, to which each ſhould contribute in proportion to its forces, in order to ſecure the country from all invaſion. That is to ſay, he would have in Italy an army maintained at the expence of others, and always ready to defend the duchy of Milan, in caſe the French king ſhould think of invading it.

[y] Francis went back from Boulogne with Henry, in this order, that while Francis was on French ground, he gave place, but when he came to the Engliſh pale, Henry gave him the precedence. Being now come near Calais, the duke of Richmond, Henry's natural ſon, a goodly young gentleman, bravely attended, met them. The lodging which Francis was brought to was moſt richly furniſhed with cloth of gold and tiſſue, embroidered in ſome places with pearls and precious ſtones. There ſeveral ſervices were brought in a hundred and ſeventy diſhes, all of maſſy gold. The marchioneſs of Pembroke made them a curious and rich maſk, in which both kings danced. The dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk were made knights of St. Michael. Stow ſays, there was no leſs than eight thouſand perſons in Calais on this occaſion. See Hall, fol. 207, &c.

Burnet, T. III. p. 17.

Or

The pope approved of the project, not in order to keep Italy in its preſent ſituation, ſince it was very much to his prejudice that the emperor ſhould remain ſo powerful there, but to have a pretence to be rid of the German and Spaniſh troops, who were a terror to the Italians. He foreſaw that a league of ſo many parties, whoſe intereſts were different, would not long ſubſiſt, and that after it was broken, he ſhould himſelf become more neceſſary and conſiderable. He deſired only that the Venetians ſhould come into the league, and bear their part of the charge. In ſhort, the emperor farther demanded of the pope, that he ſhould give his niece Catherine de Medici to the duke of Milan; his aim being to engage him for his niece's ſake in the defence of the Milaneſe, for fear in the end the king of France ſhould find a favourable opportunity to gain him to his intereſt. But Clement alleged againſt this propoſal, his engagement with the king of France, who had done him the honour to demand Catherine for the duke his ſecond ſon. He repreſented to the emperor, that he could not prefer the duke of Milan to the duke of Orleans, without making the king of France his irreconcileable enemy, who would never forgive ſuch an affront. So their whole negotiation ended only in the projected league, in which the Venetians refuſed to be included. They contented themſelves with promiſing the emperor, they would punctually perform their engagement with reſpect to the duchy of Milan. In fine, the emperor having ſent for embaſſadors from Milan, Ferrara, and Mantua, it was endeavoured for ſome time to ſettle the terms of the league. But the diſpute between the pope and the duke of Ferrara very much retarded the concluſion, becauſe the duke would not come into the league before he was ſecure of peace at home. However, after great pains, the emperor prevailed with the pope to allow the duke an eight months reſpite. This affair was the reaſon the league could not be ſigned till February the next year.

Henry's proceedings againſt the clergy, and his diſpoſition with regard to the pope, greatly encouraged thoſe who longed to ſee a reformation in the church. To conceive a right notion how the Engliſh ſtood affected in this reſpect, it is neceſſary to know what the people's ſentiments were concerning religion. It may be undeniably affirmed, that as to the reformation of the pope's exorbitant power and the clergy's immunities, there was ſcarce an Engliſhman, if you except all or moſt of the eccleſiaſtics, but what heartily wiſhed it. It was now three hundred years ſince the parliament firſt began to endeavour it, but without a perfect ſucceſs, becauſe it was contrary to the intereſt of the kings. But as for a reformation of doctrine, the well wiſhers to it were very far from being the majority. Theſe were not ſufficiently numerous to venture to propoſe it openly, eſpecially as they were not countenanced by the king. But when the pope's exceſſive authority, or the pride and riches of the clergy, were exclaimed againſt, they boldly joined with the reſt of the people, without fear of being diſcovered; becauſe that was the ſentiment of all the people, or at leaſt of almoſt all the laity. But, in expreſſing their zeal againſt the clergy, their aim was to promote the reformation of doctrine, becauſe they knew the chief obſtacle would always proceed from the governors of the church. Here therefore they believed they ought to begin, in order to arrive at a thorough reformation. So, among thoſe that wiſhed to reduce within due bounds the papal power, and the clergy's immunities, there were doubtleſs many who had no farther views, and imagined the reformation would end there. Others, on the contrary, hoped that, after taking this firſt ſtep, it would be impoſſible to ſtop, wherein they had for warrant what had happened in Germany. But they took care not to undeceive the others, for fear of cooling their zeal, by ſhewing them too ſoon the conſequences of the firſt ſtep in the buſineſs of the reformation.

The parliament meeting the 15th of January 1532, the commons were almoſt unanimouſly inclined to redreſs the grievances, ſo long complained of in vain, with reſpect to the papal power and the eccleſiaſtical privileges. There had never been ſo favourable an opportunity. When formerly the parliaments were diſpoſed to make any attempt of this nature, the kings were unwilling to concur with them, becauſe the ſtate of their affairs permitted them not to break entirely with Rome. But the affair of the divorce had put things upon another foot. The king was diſſatisfied with the pope, and conſidered the clergy, both ſecular and regular, as ſecret enemies, by reaſon of their attachment to the court of Rome. So his intereſt required that the pope and clergy ſhould be humbled, and diviſion ſown between them and the people, knowing that the former could hurt him only in proportion to their credit with the latter. As for what foreigners might do, he thought himſelf in no danger, ſo long as he remained ſtrictly united with France, and the more, as the emperor was then employed by his war with the Turks, and the troubles of Germany.

All this being artfully inſinuated to the houſe of commons, they preſented an addreſs to the king [c], praying him to conſent to a reformation of ſundry grievances, occaſioned by the immunities of the clergy [d]. The king anſwered, that before he gave his conſent to their requeſt, which ſeemed to him of great moment, he wiſhed to hear what the clergy had to ſay for themſelves. But, under this ſhew of equity, his intent was to intimate to the clergy how much they wanted his protection, ſince he could either promote or reſtrain the proceeding of the commons as he pleaſed. Some time after, the parliament paſſed certain acts, which only glanced at ſome of the clergy's privileges the people had moſt reaſon to complain of [e]. But for that time the reformation was carried no farther. Nay, care was taken to make the eccleſiaſtics amends, by paſſing an act to releaſe them from the payment of annates [f], which was become a heavy burthen. The act ran, that the kingdom was daily impoveriſhed by the great ſums paid to the ſee of Rome, for firſt-fruits, for palls, for bulls, &c. That ſince the ſecond year of the reign of Henry VII. one hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds had been paid to thoſe uſes, and that more was like to be ſhortly exported, by reaſon many of the biſhops were very aged: that beſides, the annates were firſt introduced only as a contribution for the war againſt the infidels, to which however they were never applied. And therefore it was enacted, that all payments of annates ſhould ceaſe for the future: that as for the bulls, there ſhould only be paid five pounds in the hundred, according to the clear annual value of the biſhoprics. That if, on account of this regulation, bulls ſhould be denied by the pope, the biſhop elect ſhould be preſented by the king to the archbiſhop of the province for his conſecration: that in caſe the archbiſhop ſhould refuſe it, on pretence of want of palls, bulls, and the like, any two biſhops appointed by the king ſhould perform the office, and the biſhop ſo conſecrated acknowledged for lawful. Nevertheleſs the parliament declared, it ſhould be in the king's power to null or confirm the act within ſuch a time; and if in this interval, he ſhould make an amicable compoſition with the court of Rome, it ſhould have the force and authority of a law. But if, upon this act, the pope ſhould pretend to vex the realm by excommunications or interdicts, ſuch cenſures ſhould neither be regarded nor publiſhed, and, all interdicts notwithſtanding, the prieſts might lawfully, without any ſcruples of conſcience, celebrate divine ſervice as before [g].

Mean while, among the great number of repreſentatives in the houſe of commons, there were ſeveral who were entirely againſt a rupture with the pope. They perceived however, it would infallibly follow upon the king's divorce. Wherefore they uſed all poſſible endeavours to prevent it. One Temſe a member of parliament, was ſo hardy as to move, that the houſe ſhould go in a body and addreſs the king to take his queen again. Henry hearing of this, ſent for Thomas Audley, the ſpeaker, and in his perſon ſeverely reprimanded the commons, for ſuffering a motion to be made concerning an affair which fell not under their cognizance [h].

[c] Or rather a liſt of their grievances compriſed in a book. It was preſented April 30. Herbert, p. 155. Hall, fol. 205.

That no perſon in holy orders, convict of petit treaſon, wilful murder, &c. ſhall be admitted to make his purgation before the ordinary, and be ſet at liberty, but ſhall remain in priſon till he has given ſureties for his good behaviour. 2. That clerks convict, breaking the priſons of their ordinaries, ſhall be adjudged felons. There were alſo other good ſtatutes made: for erecting gaols in ſeveral parts of the kingdom; againſt perjury, and untrue verdicts; about the commiſſion of ſewers; that no perſon ſhall be cited out of the dioceſe where he lives, except in ſome particular caſes; as alſo againſt making feoffments of eſtates to chauntries, pariſh churches, &c. [g] This bill began in the houſe of lords: from whence it was ſent to the commons, and being agreed to by them, received the royal aſſent; but had not the final confirmation mentioned in the act, before the 9th of July 1533, and then by letters patents, in which the act is at length recited, it was confirmed. [h] He told the ſpeaker moreover, it touched his ſoul; he wiſhed his marriage were good, but the learned had determined it to be null and deteſtable, and therefore he was obliged in conſcience to abſtain from her, which he aſ-

Some days after [i] the king ſent again for the ſpeaker, and told him, that having compared the oath taken by the biſhops to the pope with that they took to the king, it ſeemed to him they were but half-ſubjects, and therefore he deſired the commons to examine the matter, and take care of the intereſts of the crown. But the plague, which raged then at London, and conſtrained the parliament to break up preſently after [k], hindered the commons from debating upon this affair at that time [l].

The power given the king by the parliament to aboliſh the annates, or make an amicable compoſition with the pope, was a clear evidence that the act had been procured by the intrigues of the court. The pope was extremely offended at it. But when he complained to the king's agents, he was told, he might have ſaved himſelf that vexation, and there was ſtill a remedy, ſince the king had power to repeal the act. This was an intimation, that he might depend upon it the king would behave according as he had reaſon to be ſatisfied with his proceedings.

Thomas More, who was lord chancellor, and a perſon of excellent judgment, foreſaw now, the king's proceedings would in the end produce a total rupture with Rome. He would have readily conſented that ſome abuſes ſhould be reformed. But he found, as matters were managed, the reformation would go much farther than he deſired. He put great difference between withdrawing entirely from the pope's obedience, and retrenching ſome of his uſurpations. So, being unwilling to be inſtrumental in the rupture, he reſigned the great ſeal on the 16th of May. Some days after, the king made ſir Thomas Audley, lord keeper of the great ſeal, till the 26th of January 1533, when he was made lord chancellor.

Whilſt Henry uſed ſundry means to ſhew the pope his danger, in obſtinately refuſing what he required, the emperor was no leſs ardently endeavouring to obtain a ſentence in favour of queen Catherine. The way theſe two monarchs applied to the pope, was not by humble intreaties, but by menaces, which had the greater effect, as he was naturally timorous, and ſlow to reſolve upon things that required a ſpeedy reſolution. By theſe two oppoſite demands he ſaw himſelf indeed between the hammer and anvil, as he ſaid himſelf in the beginning of the affair. On the other hand, he found, by Henry's late proceedings, that England was going to be loſt to him and his ſucceſſors. This conſideration was very capable of putting him upon ſeeking expedients to content that monarch, without prejudice to the honour of the holy ſee. He would thereby have preſerved a kingdom which had been ever devoted to the popes, and from whence they had drawn large revenues. But, on the other hand, the emperor had ſtill an army in Italy, and was able to revenge his refuſal. Clement, of all things, feared the loſs of Florence, which the emperor could take from him with more eaſe than he had procured him the poſſeſſion. It is no wonder, therefore, if this fear, being the moſt imminent, prevailed. It would be a great miſtake to aſcribe to the pope any motives of juſtice, equity, good, and benefit of the church, or religion. Theſe things for ſome time had ſerved only for preambles to bulls. His own and his family's intereſt was the ſole rule of his conduct. So, finding himſelf extremely preſſed by the emperor to paſs ſentence upon queen Catherine's appeal, he could no longer be excuſed from giving him ſome ſatisfaction [m]. He declared, therefore, to the Engliſh agents [n], that having long expected in vain that their maſter would of himſelf return to the right way, he was obliged to cite him to Rome. Henry having notice of it, ſent with all ſpeed Edward Karne, doctor of law, with the new character of excuſator, to allege the reaſons againſt a citation to which the king of England could not be liable. Karne coming to Rome in March [o], the pope ſcrupled to receive him as excuſator, a character, whereof there was no precedent to be found in the chancery. However, he committed the examination of this title to a congregation, which made no haſte to give their opinion, that the excuſator might not have power before he was acknowledged, to oppoſe the reſolutions already taken.

At laſt, in a conſiſtory, the 8th of July, it was reſolved, that, without examining the king of England's reaſons for not appearing in perſon, he ſhould be intreated to ſend to Rome a proxy to defend his cauſe. Mean while, as the vacation, which was to laſt till the 1ſt of October, was then juſt begun, a delay till that time was tacitly given the king. During this interval the pope ſent him a brief, to require him to ſend a proxy to Rome. At the ſame time he cauſed the following overtures to be made to him: that the affair of the divorce ſhould be examined in any indifferent place by a legate and two auditors of the rota; which done, the pope himſelf would paſs ſentence. Secondly, that all the ſovereign princes of Chriſtendom ſhould agree to a truce of three or four years, within which time the pope promiſed to call a general council. The king replied, by ſir Thomas Elliot, who was ſent on purpoſe, That he could not agree to a truce without the king of France's concurrence; ſecondly, that it was not a proper juncture to call a council; laſtly, as for the affair of the divorce, being king of England, he was to take care of the prerogatives of the crown, and the laws of the realm, which allowed not that any proceſs ſhould be tried in a foreign court; that beſides, the canons of the church expreſly decreed, that all matrimonial cauſes ſhould be judged in the countries where the parties reſided.

To theſe reaſons he added a proteſtation in form, declaring that he was not obliged to appear at Rome, either in perſon or by proxy, and tacked to the proteſtation the determinations of ſome univerſities [p] he had conſulted. However, he propoſed three things to the pope: Firſt, he required that the caſe ſhould be decided by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and two other biſhops, or elſe by the whole clergy of the kingdom. But it muſt be obſerved, that the ſee of Canterbury had been vacant ſince Auguſt by Warham's death [q], and if the pope had cloſed with this propoſal, the king would not have failed to fill the ſee with a prelate devoted to him. His ſecond offer was, that the cauſe ſhould be judged by four arbitrators, one to be named by the king [r], another by the queen, a third by the king of France, and that the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould be the fourth. In the third place he propoſed, that the cauſe being judged by the archbiſhop, or by umpires, if the queen ſhould think fit to appeal from the ſentence, the appeal ſhould be brought before three judges, whereof he would name one, the pope another, and the king of France a third. The pope replied to theſe propoſals, that he ſaw the king would not recede from his pretended rights, and therefore it ſhould not be thought ſtrange that he reſolved to preſerve his own.

It is however certain, if the pope durſt have ſatisfied the king, he would gladly have done it, by reaſon of his fear to loſe England entirely. It was not the difficulties in the affair of the divorce that hindered him from proceeding. Had they been much greater than they were, he would have readily overlooked them all. For, ſuppoſing the unlimited power aſſumed by the pope, it was as eaſy for Clement VII. to null Henry's marriage, as it was for Julius II. to grant a diſpenſation. But he had to manage the honour of his ſee, and the intereſts of the emperor, who threatened him, and was able to execute his threats. Had not the emperor been concerned in the affair, it would have been very eaſy to find an expedient to content the king, without prejudice to the papal authority. It was only to aſſure the king, the cauſe ſhould be decided in his favour, and he would have willingly agreed that the pope ſhould have been the ſole judge. But the pope could give him no ſuch aſſurance, by reaſon of the emperor's oppoſition; and therefore Henry could not reſolve to put the affairs into his hands at the hazard of being condemned. Upon this account it was that he propoſed infallible expedients to gain his cauſe. But on the other hand, the pope could not accept of the expedients, without injuring his dignity. Thus the affair was ſolely retarded by the emperor's interpoſition. Had it not been for him, the pope would have contented the king, and the king would have ſubmitted to the pope, and remained as before an obedient ſon of the holy ſee. Hence therefore it may be inferred, that the king's proceedings, as well in the late parliament as afterwards, flowed not ſo much from his real opinion that the papal authority was uſurped, as from his ſeeing no other way to be delivered from his preſent difficulties, than by deſired him flowed from no luſt, or fooliſh appetite. He was then forty-one years old, and at that age thoſe heats abate. But except Spain and Portugal, it had not been heard of, that a man married two ſiſters; and he never heard that any chriſtian, before himſelf, had married his brother's wife. Therefore he aſſured him his conſcience was troubled, which he deſired him to report to the houſe. Ibid. p. 122. Hall, fol. 205.

nying it to be in the pope's power to do what Julius II. had done. It is however very likely, he was afterwards fully convinced of the truth of what he aſſerted at firſt only out of neceſſity. On the other hand, if the pope paſſed ſentence againſt Henry, as we ſhall ſee preſently, it was not from a belief that his marriage with Catherine was lawful, but ſolely to ſave the honour of the holy ſee, and through fear of the emperor. And here who can forbear admiring the ſecret ways of providence, which rendered a reconciliation between the pope and the king impracticable, in order to produce an event which was be be attended with ſo momentous conſequences for England?

At length, the vacation being over, Henry was cited the 4th of October to appear at Rome, either in perſon or by proxy, and Karne ſolemly proteſted [s] againſt the citation. What has been ſaid happened before the emperor's arrival at Bologna. Clement VII. who was going immediately after the citation to confer with that prince, promiſed Karne that all proceedings ſhould be ſuſpended, ſo long as the emperor was in Italy. This was all the favour Karne could obtain [t].

Whilſt Henry ſeemed wholly employed in the affair of his divorce, a quarrel aroſe between England and Scotland. Buchannan pretends, Henry willing to take the advantage of his union with France, and imagining Francis I. would ſuffer him to oppreſs king James, made inroads into Scotland [u], as if he intended to renew the war. He adds, that the only pretence of this rupture was, that the Scots had ſpoken ſome injurious words againſt the Engliſh. Be this as it will, the king of Scotland being prepared for his defence, Henry thought not fit to purſue his deſign. He choſe rather to agree that the difference ſhould be decided by the king of France's mediation, who for that purpoſe ſent an embaſſador to Newcaſtle. The king of Scotland was ſo offended with Francis for ſo coolly eſpouſing his cauſe, that he was going to join with the emperor. But at length all was happily adjuſted, and the two kings of England and Scotland remained friends as before.

It was not for Henry's intereſt to undertake a war againſt Scotland, when he was to prepare for his defence againſt the emperor. It was very probable the pope had not engaged to judge queen Catherine's appeal without being firſt aſſured, that the emperor, the queen's nephew, would execute the ſentence. This indeed was his deſign, but the troubles which came upon him hindered his engaging in that enterpriſe. He reckoned that the Italian league beforementioned would be a ſure defence for the duchy of Milan. But he ſoon perceived, he was himſelf the dupe of the politic pope. This league was at length ſigned at Bologna the 24th of February 1533, according to his wiſh. Every ſovereign that had dominions in Italy, the Venetians excepted, engaged to find a certain ſum monthly, for the maintenance of an army which Antonio de Leva was to command as general of the league. The emperor's intention was, that the army ſhould conſiſt of his own troops, and be conſtantly maintained: but the deſign of the confederates was very different. They had conſented to the league, only that the emperor, having nothing to fear for Italy, might withdraw all his troops. But they never meant that the army, maintained at their expence, ſhould ſerve to keep them in ſubjection, which would neceſſarily be the caſe, if the army continued always on foot, under the command of the emperor's general. They repreſented to him, therefore, that the league being only defenſive, it was not proper to continue an army, without neceſſity, to ruin them in expences; but, upon the firſt motion of the French, they would not fail to perform their agreements. What arguments ſoever the emperor alleged, it was not poſſible to bring them to what he deſired. He was forced, therefore, to be ſatisfied with their promiſes, becauſe he was not in condition to maintain an army in Italy at his own charge. Then he diſbanded part of his troops, and ſent the reſt to Naples and Spain. He departed from Bologna about the end of February, and came to Genoa, where he ſtaid ſome time; after which, on the 8th of April, he embarked for Spain, extremely diſpleaſed with the pope, who, through all his diſguiſes, could not help ſhewing his inclination to France. Indeed, he was now agreed with the cardinals of Tournon and Gramont, upon an interview with Francis, and the marriage of Catherine de Medici with the duke of Orleans.

[1533] The ſtate of Italy was not the only thing that employed the emperor. He had, as was obſerved, promiſed the proteſtants a free council in Germany. But though the word free was equally uſed by thoſe who demanded a council and by him that promiſed it, they were far from meaning the ſame thing. The proteſtants underſtood by that word, that a council ſhould be held in Germany, where not only they might have free acceſs and full liberty to produce their reaſons, but alſo that the points in diſpute ſhould be decided ſolely by the word of God. The emperor meant, on the contrary, to retain only an outward ſhew of the word, and, by rendering his party ſuperior in the council, to cauſe matters to be decided that the proteſtants ſhould be forced either to revoke all their innovations or reject the council's deciſions. In the latter caſe, which was moſt likely, the emperor plainly perceived they would give him a pretence to attack them, which was the thing he intended. But, in the execution of this deſign, a great obſtacle occurred; namely, a council, let it be what it would, was a terror to the pope. Though he knew the emperor demanded a council, not with intent to alter religion, yet he was afraid of being ſacrificed to the proteſtants, if that monarch's intereſt required it. Beſides, the ſtrict alliance between Francis and Henry made him uneaſy. In ſhort, he could not reſolve to call a council, without being ſure of managing it as he pleaſed; and this could ſcarce be expected, as matters then ſtood in Chriſtendom. Since his being on the papal throne, he had pleaſed neither the emperor, nor the king of France, nor the king of England, nor the potentates of Italy; and yet of the ſubjects of all theſe ſovereigns was the council chiefly to conſiſt. He knew himſelf to be a baſtard, and that alone to be ſufficient to depoſe him, in caſe his enemies were ſuperior in the council. What had paſſed at Conſtance and Baſil gave him juſt reaſon to dread that a council, held in a free city of Germany, might form the ſame deſigns. Upon all theſe conſiderations, when the emperor deſired him, at the conference of Bologna, to call a council, he forbore to give a poſitive anſwer. He contented himſelf with committing the examination of his requeſt of certain cardinals, under colour of being informed of the reaſons pro and con. The popes have a character to ſuſtain, which often throws them into great perplexity. In public, they muſt make ſhew of a great zeal for God's glory, for religion, and for the good of the church, and withal of a great diſintereſtedneſs for every thing which perſonally concerns them. But, for fear what they thus profeſs outwardly ſhould be taken literally, they muſt in private undeceive thoſe who treat with them, and diſcover to them that their own intereſt is the principal ſubject of the negotiation. So, what they ſay publicly is always juſt and right, and ſeems to tend only to the greater glory of God: but in the end it is too frequently perceived, that religion ſerves only for a cloak to the temporal concerns. On the preſent occaſion, a general council ſeemed abſolutely neceſſary, to put an end to the troubles cauſed by the religious differences in ſeveral places, and particularly in Germany. The pope not only agreed upon a council with the emperor, but even feigned to wiſh it heartily. Mean while, as a council was contrary to his intereſts, reaſons drawn from the good and advantage of religion were to be found to reject it, or defer the convening. This was done by the commiſſioners appointed to examine the emperor's requeſt. They drew a memorial ſetting forth the neceſſity of a council, but ſhewing withal the inconveniences of admitting the proteſtants to diſpute upon matters already ſettled, and the uſeleſsneſs of the council if they were not admitted. The memorial being communicated to Francis, he replied to it by another, demonſtrating that the inconveniencies mentioned in the firſt ought not to hinder the calling of a council. Moreover, he particularly chalked out the methods which were to be uſed to baniſh all partiality. But this memorial was not acceptable to the emperor, becauſe a free council was not what he deſired, but a council that would afford him an opportunity and pretence to attack the proteſtants of Germany; after which, he did not deſpair of bringing the catholics alſo under his yoke. Francis anſwered the emperor's reaſons againſt this memorial, but it was to no purpoſe. It was almoſt impoſſible that two princes, whoſe intereſts were ſo oppoſite, and who were ſo jealous of each other, ſhould agree in any one point. Thus the pope had his wiſh, ſince the calling of the council was deferred to a more proper ſeaſon. I muſt now ſpeak of what paſſed in England in the year 1533.

Whilſt the pope and emperor were conferring at Bologna, Henry aſſembled the parliament the 4th of February. As hitherto the pope had not relaxed in the leaſt, except that he had delayed the excommunication wherewith he had threatned the king, it was deemed proper to proceed farther, and let him ſee he was not at all feared. So the parliament paſſed an act, expreſly forbidding all appeals to Rome on pain of incurring a præmunire. This was to convince the pope there was no occaſion for him; ſince, at the very time that the point in queſtion between him and the king was to know whether the affair of the divorce ſhould be judged in England, people were forbid to carry their cauſes to Rome. But there was another reaſon which induced the king to procure this act, namely, having heard that Francis was going to make an alliance with the pope, he imagined that for the future his friend would act but faintly in his favour; and therefore he was now determined to have his cauſe tried in the kingdom, without troubling himſelf any farther about the pope's proceedings againſt him [w]. The archbiſhopric of Canterbury being vacant by Warham's death, it was neceſſary to fill the ſee, that the ſentence might be given by the primate of England. Wherefore Henry had caſt his eyes on Dr. Thomas Cranmer, then in Germany [x]. But, contrary to his expectation, he had found the doctor more averſe to accept, than others would have been eager to deſire, that high dignity. It was ſix months before he could be perſuaded to take upon him that burthen. In fine, his reluctance being conquered by the king's patience, he began his journey to London, though very ſlowly, in hopes the king might alter his mind. However, as a farther delay was directly contrary to the king's meaſures, Cranmer could no longer defer ſubmitting to his will. The king himſelf undertook to demand his bulls [y], which, though eleven in all, were rated but at nine hundred ducats [z]. The pope forbore of his own accord to require the annates, foreſeeing they would be refuſed. To enable Cranmer to be at this charge, the king made him a preſent of the revenues of the archbiſhopric, from the 9th of September the laſt year. Theſe obſtacles being removed, there aroſe another much more conſiderable. Cranmer refuſed to take the uſual oath to the pope, believing he could not do it with a ſafe conſcience. In his firſt journey into Germany he had read Luther's books, which entirely convinced him of the truth of many of the proteſtant tenets, and particularly of the little foundation in ſcripture for the ſpiritual power aſſumed by the pope over the whole church. Conſequently he could not reſolve to ſwear an obedience, which in his opinion was not due to him. Mean while, Henry conſidering Cranmer as a perſon who, by his principles and reſolution, could effectually ſerve him in the deciſion of the affair of the divorce, of which he deſired to ſee the end, preſſed him ſo earneſtly to ſwear the cuſtomary oath, that he was prevailed with at length, by an expedient propoſed to him, namely, to make a formal proteſtation againſt the oath he was to take [a]. This is by no means one of his moſt commendable actions. However, he was conſecrated the 13th of March, according to Burnet: and yet the king put him not in poſſeſſion of the temporalities till the 29th of April. This gives occaſion to ſuſpect there is a miſtake in the firſt of theſe dates.

This affair being ended, the king required the convocation of the province of Canterbury to give their opinion upon theſe two points: Firſt, whether pope Julius's diſpenſation for the king's marriage with Catherine was ſufficient and able to render ſuch a marriage valid? Secondly, whether it was ſufficiently proved that Arthur had conſummated his marriage with Catherine? Whereupon the convocation declared, on the 5th of April, that the pope had not power to diſpenſe contrary to the law of God, and that the conſummation of Arthur's marriage was proved, as far as a thing of that nature could be. The convocation of York made the like deciſion the 13th of May following.

Whilſt the clergy were employed in debating theſe points, Henry wrote to Francis, deſiring him to ſend a truſty perſon, to whom he might diſcover ſome things which he would not make public. Francis ſent William de Bellay, lord of Langeais, ordering him to acquaint the king that he had concluded a marriage between his ſecond ſon, the duke of Orleans, and Catherine de Medici; and that the pope and himſelf were to meet at Marſeilles to celebrate the nuptials: that in ſuch a juncture he believed his preſence would be very neceſſary to negotiate his own affairs himſelf with the pope: but, in caſe he did not think proper to be at the interview, he would do well to ſend ſome perſon on his part. Langeais being come to London, the king told him that Clement VII. having obſtinately refuſed to appoint him judges in England, he had determined at length to proceed; and therefore had already eſpouſed Anne Bullen, with a reſolution to have his marriage nulled by the archbiſhop of Canterbury. That however, he would keep his ſecond marriage private till May, to ſee what the king of France could do with the biſhop of Rome (for ſo he called the pope.) But if he could obtain nothing, his deſign was to withdraw himſelf wholly from the papal authority. He imagined then, the pope and Francis would meet in May, but it was not till October. He told Langeais further, that he had compoſed a treatiſe upon the incroachments of the biſhops of Rome and the prerogatives of ſovereign princes, but would not publiſh it till he ſaw no hopes of reconciliation.

Shortly after, the king's marriage with Anne Bullen was made public, which certainly was very wrong. Since the king was reſolved to have his firſt marriage nulled by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, he ſhould have ſtaid till the ſentence was prouounced. All that can be ſaid in excuſe of this irregular conduct is, that the new queen was four months gone with child, and her breeding could hardly be concealed any longer. But, notwithſtanding this, the king might have cauſed his firſt marriage to be nulled a little ſooner, or the ſecond to be publiſhed a little later, ſince there was but a month between the publication and the ſentence. However, Henry, deſpairing to prevail with the pope, and not much fearing him, thought to have no farther regard either for him or the public, being almoſt aſſured of ſucceeding in whatever he undertook, conſidering how the people ſtood affected. In ſhort, being fully determined to end the affair, he ſo ordered, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury demanded his leave to ſummon queen Catherine. Before he came to this extremity, he tried more than once to perſuade the queen to conſent to the divorce. But all his endeavours proving ineffectual, he granted the archbiſhop the leave he deſired. The queen was cited to appear at Dunſtable, in the neighbourhood of the place where ſhe reſided, the 20th of May [b]. But as ſhe refuſed to appear, the archbiſhop gave ſentence the 23d of the ſame month, declaring the king's marriage with Catherine null, as being contrary to the law of God. On the 28th, at Lambeth, by another [z] Theſe being the laſt bulls in his reign, it will not be amiſs to give an account of them, as they are ſet down in the beginning of Cranmer's regiſter. By the firſt, he is, upon the king's nomination, promoted to the archbiſhopric of Canterbury; this is directed to the king. By a ſecond, directed to himſelf, he is made archbiſhop. By a third, he is abſolved from all cenſures. A fourth, is to the ſuffragans. A fifth, to the dean and chapter. A ſixth, to the clergy of Canterbury. A ſeventh, to all the laity in his ſee. An eighth, to all that held lands of it, requiring them to receive him as archbiſhop. All theſe are dated February 21, 1533. By a ninth, of February 22, he was to be conſecrated, upon taking the oath in the pontifical. By a tenth, dated the 2d of March, the pall was ſent him. And by an eleventh, of the ſame date, the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhop of London, were required to put it on him. Theſe were the ſeveral artifices to make compoſitions high, and to enrich the apoſtolic chamber. Burnet, T. I. p. 128.

[a] This proteſtation imported, that he did not intend by that oath to reſtrain himſelf from any thing that he was bound to, either by his duty to God, to the king, or the country; and that he renounced every thing in it that was contrary to any of thoſe. Burnet, T. I. p. 129.

[b] The archbiſhop went to Dunſtable (about ſix miles from Ampthill, where the queen was) accompanied with Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, and the biſhops of London, Bath, and Lincoln, and ſat in court on the 10th of May, the king appearing by proxy, but the queen, not at all. Upon which ſhe was declared contumacious, and a ſecond and third citation were iſſued out. Then the evidences that had been brought before the legates of the conſummation of the marriage with prince Arthur were read. After that the determination of the univerſities, divines, and canoniſts, with the judgments of the convocations of both provinces, were produced, and the whole merit of the cauſe was opened. And then, on the 23d, with the advice of all that were preſent, it was declared, that the marriage had been only de facto, and not de jure, and conſequently null from the beginning. One thing is to be obſerved, that the archbiſhop is called in the ſentence, the legate of the apoſtolical ſee. Whether this went of courſe as one of his titles, or was put in to make the ſentence firmer, the reader may judge. Burnet, T. I. p. 131. Hall, fol. 210.

The

ſentence, he confirmed the king's marriage with Anne Bullen, and on the 1ſt of June the new queen was crowned.

Thus ended this famous proceſs, the iſſue whereof afforded no leſs matter for divers reflections than the beginning, every one reaſoning as ſwayed by prejudice or intereſt. Thoſe who were againſt the king took notice of his error in eſpouſing a ſecond wife, before his firſt marriage was legally diſſolved. They ſaid moreover, that of all the prelates in England, Cranmer was the laſt that ſhould have been choſen for judge, ſince he had ſo openly declared againſt the firſt marriage. This partiality was apparent, not only in his haſte to give ſentence, but alſo in his confirming the king's ſecond marriage, which had been conſummated while the firſt ſtill ſubſiſted.

Thoſe who were for the king, affirmed, the ſentence was but a mere formality, which rendered not the marriage void, but only declared it ſo. That it ſufficed, the ſentence was conformable to the determinations of the Engliſh clergy and all the univerſities in Europe, and to the ſentiments of the pope himſelf, who would have nulled the marriage, had he not been biaſſed by worldly conſiderations. They juſtified Cranmer by alleging, that having changed his character ſince his declaring for the divorce, that declaration ought not to hinder him from being judge, no more than a lawyer when he comes to ſit on the bench is debarred the trying of cauſes in which he formerly gave counſel. That though there were ſome default in the form, it could not be denied, the ſentence was juſt in itſelf, which was ſufficient to quiet the king's conſcience, who alone was concerned in the affair. As for the new queen, no fault could be found with her conduct, ſince ſhe proved not with child till after her marriage, whether the king eſpouſed her in November laſt year, or in the January following. As for queen Catherine, it could not be thought ſtrange that ſhe ſhould maintain the validity of her ſecond marriage. But it was juſtly wondered at, ſhe ſhould ſo obſtinately deny the conſummation of the firſt, which was proved by all poſſible evidence. But as moſt people were then biaſſed on one ſide or other [c], we are not to judge of the affair by what was publiſhed in thoſe days, but by reaſon and equity. Let us therefore briefly conſider it in that view, independently of the prejudices cauſed by the conſequences. It will not perhaps be unacceptable to the reader, to ſee here a ſhort recapitulation of the conduct of the chief actors in this ſcene. I ſhall confine myſelf to this, without fully examining the proceſs, which is not ſo much the buſineſs of an hiſtorian as of a divine or civilian.

It is almoſt impoſſible to know poſitively whether Henry, when he undertook the affair of the divorce, was convinced that his marriage was contrary to the law of God, or at leaſt was really troubled in conſcience upon that account. All that can be ſaid in his favour is, that he himſelf affirmed as much, and none but the ſearcher of all hearts can know, whether he thought as he ſpoke. It cannot be denied that the ſole conſideration of ſuch a marriage is of itſelf capable of breeding ſuch ſcruples, eſpecially as the king's might be confirmed by the archbiſhop of Canterbury's, and the biſhop of Lincoln's, his confeſſor. But on the other hand, it may be conjectured from ſeveral circumſtances, that it was only a pretence to put away Catherine and marry Anne Bullen. In the firſt place, he had lived eighteen years with the queen without ſhewing any ſcruple. In the ſecond place, if he was not in love with Anne Bullen when his ſcruples firſt ſeized him, it cannot be denied, he was very much ſo, when he moſt ardently preſſed the affair of the divorce. So, it may be conjectured, that his love might turn into belief what at firſt was only a doubt. In the third place, very probably it was cardinal Wolſey that inſpired, by himſelf or another, the king with theſe ſcruples, to be revenged of the emperor and the queen. This bold and daring miniſter imagined, either the affair would eaſily ſucceed, conſidering his great credit at the court of Rome, or, in caſe of oppoſition, it would be no more difficult on this than on ſeveral other occaſions, to cauſe the king to alter his mind. But Henry's love unexpectedly happening, Wolſey found he had taken wrong meaſures. Beſides, the determinations of the univerſities did not a little contribute, without doubt, to confirm the king in his opinion. However, without farther inquiry whether Henry was ſatisfied of the juſtice of his cauſe, let us conſider in few words how he behaved in ſo nice an affair. He ſuppoſed that Julius II. could not grant a diſpenſation for his marriage, and conſequently the marriage was void of itſelf. And yet he thought he wanted Clement VII.'s bull to declare it ſo. Herein was a contradiction which could not but greatly embaraſs him. If Julius's diſpenſation was null by the law of God, it was needleſs to revoke it, and if a revocation was neceſſary, conſequently it was good till revoked. Thus Henry was bound till the pope ſhould pleaſe to decide the point. When Cranmer had given him another notion of the affair, by intimating to him that, independently of the power aſſumed by the pope, the chief thing was to be aſſured of the right by the opinions of the learned, he cried out, in a tranſport of joy, "He had got at laſt the right ſow by the ear," that is, he found in Cranmer's advice a ſolution of the difficulties he could not get over in following the doubtful principles of the pope's power, becauſe its extent was not ſettled. He reſolved therefore to procure the opinions of the univerſities. But at length, weighing the conſequences of a rupture with Rome, he reſumed the firſt way, and applied again to the pope. By this he wronged his cauſe very much; for, in taking the pope for judge, it was no longer in his power to limit the authority he was willing to acknowledge. But he was excuſable, ſince it was hardly poſſible to throw off at once his prejudice with reſpect to the papal power, whereof he had not at firſt ſo clear an idea as afterwards. Then, finding the pope acted only from worldly conſiderations, which hindered him from giving him the ſatisfaction he required, he returned to the way he had left. So, proceeding upon his own conviction, and the determinations of the univerſities, he cauſed his marriage to be declared null, without regarding the pope's authority, which he was reſolved to forſake. I omit the reaſon he alleged to prove the neceſſity of his divorce. That of conſcience was doubtleſs the beſt, if ſincere; that relating to the uncertainty of the ſucceſſion was proper to demand a ſentence, but not to ground the divorce upon, becauſe the divorce ſuppoſed the marriage void, which was to be judged.

Let us now conſider the pope's conduct, where we find nothing favouring of Chriſt's vicar. Clement VII. never examined the caſe by the maxims of religion, juſtice, or equity, but always with reſpect to his own or his family's intereſts. If he had attended to what religion required, he would have examined whether Henry's marriage was contrary to the law of God, and whether, in that caſe, a pope had power to grant a diſpenſation. If he had been convinced that Julius II. aſſumed a right which belonged not to him, he ſhould have readily granted Henry the bull he demanded. But if, on the contrary, he was perſuaded the marriage was agreeable to the divine law, or not being ſo, it was in the power of a pope to grant a diſpenſation, he ſhould have confirmed it, and tried to remove the king's ſcruples, without ſeeking ſo many evaſions. That was the duty of a pope; but, inſtead of acting in that manner, he conſidered only what good or hurt might accrue to him from the king's demand, independently of the juſtice or injuſtice of the thing. Whilſt he was priſoner in the caſtle of St. Angelo, or fugitive at Orvieto, and thought he ſtood in need of Henry, he poſitively promiſed to content him. Afterwards he only amuſed him, till, by the emperor's means, he had recovered Florence. As ſoon as he was in poſſeſſion of that ſtate, which he had ſo much deſired, he avocated the proceſs to Rome, but, in all appearance, with intent never to decide it if he could help it; becauſe, whilſt the two parties remained uncertain of the deciſion, he made himſelf neceſſary to both. Can it therefore be ſaid, there was any ſign of juſtice or religion in his proceedings? Certainly, if Henry was to blame, as it is pretended, to feign ſcruples on purpoſe to gratify his paſſion, Clement was no leſs ſo, not to try to reclaim him before the affair was begun, or to content him in caſe his ſcruples were well-grounded. Though Henry had acted only through paſſion, which is, however, very uncertain, he would have been much more excuſable than the pope, who, in the poſt he filled, ought to have proceeded upon very different principles.

As for the emperor, he undoubtedly acted in this affair from motives of honour, intereſt, and policy, without juſtice or religion being concerned in his proceedings. He looked upon the queen of England, his aunt's divorce, as a diſhonour, which, added to his intereſt to create Henry troubles, who was in ſtrict alliance with France, was but too capable of inducing him to obſtruct it to the utmoſt of his power.

As for queen Catherine, very probably, ſhe acted with ſincerity. As ſhe believed the pope's authority unlimited, ſhe thought herſelf the king's lawful wife, and in that belief did not think herſelf obliged to reſign her right to another, on pretence of the king her huſband's ſcruples, which, in her opinion were groundleſs. Beſides, ſhe could not own her marriage null without greatly injuring her daughter the princeſs Mary. Though ſhe had been convinced her marriage was unlawful in itſelf, ſhe believed the pope had power to render it valid, being ready however to ſubmit to the ſame authority as ſoon as it ſhould be declared. Nevertheleſs, ſhe may be juſtly ſuſpected of having taken a falſe oath, to make her cauſe better.

Much has been ſaid againſt Anne Bullen. But without inſiſting upon Sander's invectives, which have been ſufficiently refuted [d], ſhe can be charged before marriage but with one ſingle fault, namely, her yielding to the king before his marriage with Catherine was nulled. But it was very difficult for a young lady of her rank, to have reſolution enough to reſiſt the temptation of being a queen, if ſhe could be ſo lawfully, as it is likely the king made her believe. It cannot however be ſaid, ſhe yielded to the king's deſires before her marriage. He eſpouſed her at the lateſt in January, and ſhe was not brought to bed till September [e]. So there is nothing in that which can give occaſion for any ſuſpicion.

As for the reſt who were concerned in the affair, as the cardinals, and the king's and the emperor's miniſters, it may affirmed, they acted only from worldly views, without any regard to religion.

It cannot be ſaid, the univerſities of France and England decided the queſtions propoſed with entire freedom, ſince it is known what an influence ſovereigns have upon the actions of their ſubjects, when they are concerned. As to the univerſities of Italy, both parties accuſed one another of having corrupted them, the one by money, and the other by threats. As for the Engliſh clergy, they had lately received ſuch a check, that they had reaſon to dread giving the king a freſh occaſion of anger. But it cannot be thence inferred, that they decided contrary to their ſentiments, ſince it often happens that truth is not oppoſite to intereſts. The ſame may be ſaid of Cranmer, who being now tinctured with Luther's doctrine, could not look upon Julius's diſpenſation as capable of rendering a marriage valid, which in itſelf was null and repugnant to the law of God. Indeed, he may have earneſtly embraced this opportunity, to give a mortal wound to the papal authority, in order to promote the reformation. But it cannot be affirmed that he acted againſt his knowledge, in pronouncing the ſentence of divorce. At leaſt his whole behaviour was directly oppoſite to ſuch obliquities.

By what has been ſaid, may be eaſily perceived, that in this affair, which was properly a caſe of conſcience, very few of the actors had any but political views, without much regard to the precepts of religion. Nevertheleſs, God, who directs all the actions of men, without their knowing very often to what they may tend, drew from the proceedings of Henry, Clement, and Charles, the end he deſigned, that is, the reformation of the church of England, as will be ſeen in the ſequel. If any one deſires fully to examine the caſe of Henry VIII.th's divorce, he would do well to caſt off all prejudice, and take care not to be miſled by the authors who have wrote on the ſubject. But if a man is contented with examining it hiſtorically, he is to conſider only the political views of the principal actors.

The ſentences of divorce being made public, Henry took care to acquaint Catherine with it, by the lord Mountjoy, who tried in vain to perſuade her to ſubmit. She ſtill remained inflexible, affirming, ſhe would be the king's wife till the pope had nulled the marriage. This anſwer being brought to the king, he ordered her to be ſtiled only princeſs dowager of Wales. But ſhe refuſed to be ſerved by any that would not treat her as queen: and the king thought not fit to remove ſuch as would ſhew her that reſpect [f]. Shortly after, he notified his divorce, and new marriage, to all the ſovereigns, and particularly to the emperor, who coldly told the Engliſh embaſſador [g], he would conſider what he was to do in the caſe.

The news of the king's marriage, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury's ſentence having reached Rome, the pope was extremely angry with Henry, and the more, as a copy of his book againſt the papal authority had now appeared in Rome itſelf. The cardinals of the Imperial faction improving this occaſion, very earneſtly preſſed him to give ſentence againſt the king; remonſtrating to him, that if he reſented not ſuch an affront, the authority of the holy ſee would be at an end. Theſe remonſtrances produced their effect. The pope nulled the archbiſhop's ſentence, and declared the king himſelf liable to excommunication, unleſs, during the month of September, he reſtored the cauſe to its former ſtate [h]. He contented himſelf for this time with only threatening him, becauſe he did not yet deſpair of reclaiming him by the king of France's means, with whom he was going to confer at Marſeilles.

The pope's aim in that interview was, firſt to celebrate the nuptials between Catherine, his niece, and the duke of Orleans. In the next place, to deviſe with Francis ſome expedient to adjuſt his differences with the king of England; or, if that could not be done, to diſengage Francis from Henry's intereſts. Francis wiſhed ſincerely that ſome way might be found to reconcile them, becauſe he hoped to join in a league with both, the more eaſily to recover the duchy of Milan. Henry had uſed his utmoſt endeavours to diſſuade him from the interview, being apprehenſive it would produce, between Francis and Clement, an union which could not but be to his prejudice [i]. He had ever reckoned that Francis would act in concert with him to frighten the pope, and that their menaces would induce him at laſt to give him the ſatisfaction he required. But, perceiving he could not prevail, he had publiſhed his marriage. From that time, he was fully bent to widen the breach with Rome, unleſs the pope and the king of France ſhould find, during their interview, ſome ſatisfactory expedient, for which he was very willing to wait. Mean while he ſent the duke of Norfolk [k] in embaſſy to Francis, with orders to accompany him to Marſeilles, and ſee whether there was yet any hopes of agreement.

The duke of Norfolk, coming to the French court the 1ſt of July, waited upon the king, who was then on his journey to Marſeilles [l], intending, however, to make ſome ſtay in Languedoc before he went to the congreſs. He accompanied him ſome time, but hearing, in the beginning of Auguſt, what was done at Rome againſt the king, his maſter, would have returned, imagining his preſence would be of little ſervice at Marſeilles. Nevertheleſs, at the king of France's ſolicitations, he contented himſelf with ſending the lord Rochfort for freſh inſtructions from the king, who immediately recalled him. However, Francis ſo artfully managed Henry, that he perſuaded him to ſend a perſon to Marſeilles, to be a witneſs of what ſhould paſs at the interview. Henry made choice of Stephen Gardiner, ſir John Wallop, and ſir Francis Brian, with Edmond Bonner, a very proper perſon to execute the orders he gave him.

The pope and Francis met at Marſeilles the beginning of October, and, within a few days, the duke of Orleans conſummated his marriage with Catherine de Medici [m]. This affair being ended, Francis ſolicited the pope in behalf of the king of England, and prevailed with him at laſt to give Henry entire ſatisfaction; but, to ſave the honour of the [d] Sanders has aſſured the world, that the king, liking her mother, ſent her huſband, ſir Thomas Bullen, embaſſador to France, and in his abſence, begot Anne Bullen upon his wife. At his return, he ſued a divorce againſt her in the archbiſhop's court, but the king letting him know ſhe was with child by him, he was, upon the king's deſire, reconciled to his wife. Thus Anne Bullen, though ſhe went under the name of ſir Thomas's daughter, yet was of the king's begetting. As he deſcribes her, ſhe was ill ſhaped and ugly, had ſix fingers, a gag tooth, and a tumour under her chin. At fifteen years of age, he ſays, both her father's butler, and chaplain, lay with her; and when in France ſhe led ſuch a diſſolute life, that ſhe was called the Engliſh hackney. That the French king liking her, ſhe was called the king's mule. But returning to England, ſhe gained the king's affection, by the appearance of a ſevere virtue, with which ſhe diſguiſed herſelf. The ſame author adds, that the king had likewiſe enjoyed her ſiſter; with a great deal more to the diſgrace of this lady and her family. Hence we may ſee to what a height of rancour and malice bigotry and blind zeal in religious matters are capable of carrying a man! Burnet, T. I. p. 41.

She ſaid ſhe would not damn her ſoul, nor ſubmit to ſuch an infamy; that ſhe was his wife, and would never call herſelf by any other name, ſince the proceſs ſtill depended at Rome. Mountjoy, having written a relation of what had paſſed between him and her, ſhewed it her; but ſhe daſhed with a pen all thoſe places in which ſhe was called princeſs dowager. Burnet, T. I. p. 132.

[h] The more moderate cardinals were for finding a temper, that the ſentence ſhould not be definitive, but ſhould be given upon what had been attempted in England by the archbiſhop of Canterbury (which in the ſtile of the canon law, was called the attentates) and it was done accordingly. The ſentence was affixed ſoon after at Dunkirk. Burnet, T. I. p. 133. Herbert, p. 172.

holy ſee, he would judge the cauſe himſelf in a conſiſtory, from which the cardinals of the emperor's faction ſhould be excluded. Thus far all went very well. But Bonner, to whom doubtleſs it was not thought fit to diſcover the ſecret, demanding an audience of the pope [n], acquainted him with the king his maſter's appeal to the next general council, from the ſentence given or to be given againſt him. The pope told him, before he declared himſelf, he would adviſe with the cardinals that were with him. Some days after [o], having ſent for Bonner, he gave him for anſwer, that according to the opinion of the cardinals, the appeal was unlawful. Bonner, without being ſurpriſed at the anſwer, acquainted him in the ſame manner with the like appeal of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, from the ſentence which nulled his judgment for the divorce. This put the pope in ſuch a rage, that he talked of throwing Bonner into a cauldron of melted lead [p]. Guicciardini, ſays Francis, was ſo offended with Bonner's inſolence, that he offered the pope to do all that lay in his power to procure him ſatisfaction for the affront. But if this be true, it was only a mere compliment.

Clement departed from Marſeilles the 12th of November, as much pleaſed with the king of France as he was diſſatisfied with Henry. Mean while, Francis not deſpairing yet to adjuſt this affair, ſent into England John de Bellay, biſhop of Paris, to propound new expedients to the king. This prelate, who had reſided ſome time at the court of England as embaſſador, wrought ſo with Henry, that he perſuaded him at length to agree to an expedient he propoſed to him [q]. So, pleaſed with having obtained more than he durſt have expected, he very readily undertook to carry the good news himſelf to the pope, though it was then in the depth of winter. He found the pope inclined to do what he could to end the affair amicably, and drew from him a poſitive promiſe, that the cauſe ſhould be jugded at Cambray by ſuch as the king of England ſhould have no reaſon to except againſt. But Clement, not truſting entirely to a verbal promiſe, deſired to have it under the king's own hand, that he approved of what was concerted. Moreover, to avoid all delays and evaſions, he fixed the day for the return of the courier, who was to be ſent into England.

This weighty affair being thus upon the point of concluſion, the emperor's agents were very urgent with the pope to revoke his engagement; but he told them he had given his word. However, they repeated their inſtances with ſuch earneſtneſs, that at length they got him to promiſe, if Henry's anſwer came not by the time appointed, he ſhould think himſelf diſengaged. The courier not returning on the day appointed, the Imperialiſts preſſed the pope to give ſentence againſt Henry, repreſenting to him that he was amuſed, and threatening him with the emperor's reſentment. In ſhort, they ſo ardently ſolicited him, that though the biſhop of Paris only deſired a delay of ſix days, he could not obtain it. The pope, frightened by the menaces of the Imperialiſts, was ſo entirely devoted to them, that what ſhould have been done, according to the uſual forms, in three conſiſtories, was done in one. In a word, the pope, without ſtaying for an anſwer from England, publiſhed a ſentence [r], declaring Henry's marriage with Catherine good and lawful, and requiring him to take his wife again, with denunciation of cenſures in caſe of diſobedience. Two days after came the courier with full powers for the biſhop of Paris, as the pope had deſired. Several cardinals moved to revoke what had been done: but the emperor's party preſſed him ſo cloſely, that the motion was rejected. Thus the pope, who had amuſed the king for ſix years by affected delays, could not be perſuaded to grant him ſix days, and by this precipitation, was the cauſe of the Romiſh church's loſs of the kingdom of England.

It muſt however be confeſſed, that it is very difficult to conceive what the king's view was in the agreement he pretended to make with the pope. Can it be ſuppoſed he meant to quit his newly acquired title of ſupreme head of the church of England? But he appeared ſo jealous, during the reſt of his days, of his ſupremacy, which kept the clergy in awe, whereas before, the clergy depended more on the pope than on him, that there is no likelihood he would think of parting with this prerogative. And yet, how could the king's ſupremacy ſubſiſt in caſe he agreed with the pope? Or how could the pope reſolve to content him with reſpect to his divorce, without requiring him to reſign his ſupremacy? Certainly it is impoſſible to reconcile theſe two things; which gives occaſion to ſuſpect the king acted not with ſincerity in his pretended agreement with the pope, and that after having juſtified his divorce by the pope's ſentence, he meant to drop him there, and withdraw from his obedience. This ſuſpicion is confirmed by what paſſed in England at the very time the king diſpatched the courier to Rome, with the engagement the pope had deſired. I have obſerved that the biſhop of Paris went poſt from London about the end of December; that upon his arrival at Rome, he ſent a courier to the king, to acquaint him with what he had obtained of the pope; and that the king ſent back the ſame courier with his approbation. Now what ſpeed ſoever the biſhop and courier could make, it is impoſſible the courier could return to Rome before the middle of January. But at the very time the king diſpatched the courier, he held at Weſtminſter a parliament, where acts were paſſed directly contrary to the agreement he ſeemed to deſire [s].

[1534] The parliament, meeting the 15th of January 1534, opened the ſeſſion with repealing the ſtatute of Henry IV. againſt heretics. This was not with deſign to exempt them from the penalties in that ſtatute, ſince was enacted in this that they ſhould be burned, but only to hinder the clergy from being ſole judges in cauſes of this nature. That was the real intent of the new act, whereby, for the future, heretics were to be proſecuted and tried according to the laws of the land, without any regard to the canon law [t].

By another ſtatute which the parliament paſſed at the ſame time, it was enacted, firſt, that all convocations ſhould be called for the future by the king's writ. Secondly, that the king ſhould name thirty-two perſons, ſixteen of both houſes of parliament, and as many of the clergy, to examine the canons and conſtitutions of the church, with power to abrogate or confirm ſuch as they thought fit. As it is certain the parliament acted by the directions of the court, it may eaſily be conceived the king was not much inclined to agree with the pope, though by the engagement he did ſend or had already ſent to Rome, he ſeemed reſolved.

Here is another argument of the little regard Henry had for the pope, at the very time he was going to obtain all his deſires. Before the news came to England of the ſentence againſt the king, the parliament paſſed an act of attainder againſt Elizabeth Barton, commonly called the Holy Maid of Kent, who, pretending to be inſpired, foretold, that "if the king married Anne Bullen, he ſhould not be a king a month longer." This nun, having been wrought upon and inſtructed by a certain curate, counterfeited the propheteſs, and mixed with her prediction invectives againſt the king's proceedings in the affair of the divorce, and threats againſt his chief counſellors. Several Franciſcans countenanced her pretended revelations, ſo that ſhe was in great repute with the people; nay, archbiſhop Warham, ſir Thomas More, and John Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, were deceived with the reſt. But at length, the nun and her accomplices being apprehended by the king's order, the affair was ſo carefully examined, that the whole contrivance was diſcovered, and the counterfeit propheteſs condemned to die with her corrupters. However, as the affair had made a great noiſe, the king was pleaſed it ſhould be brought before the parliament, to render their condemnation more authentic. Sanders would fain reckon this nun and her accomplices for martyrs, though their own confeſſions ſufficiently juſtified their condemnation [u]. If the king had really intended to be re[t] By the ſtatute of Henry IV. biſhops might, upon ſuſpicion of hereſy, commit any perſon to priſon, without preſentment or accuſation, contrary to what was practiſed in all other caſes. Therefore the ſtatute of Henry IV. was repealed, but thoſe of Richard II. and Henry V. were left ſtill in force, with the following regulation: that heretics ſhould be proceeded againſt upon preſentments, by two witneſſes at leaſt, and then committed, but brought to anſwer to their indictments in open court; and if found guilty, and would not abjure, or were relapſe, to be adjudged to death; the king's writ de hæretico comburendo being firſt had. This act is the fourteenth in the ſtatute book, thirty-third in the records, thirty-firſt in the journal. It may eaſily be imagined how acceptable this act was to the whole nation, ſince it was an effectual limitation of the eccleſiaſtical power in one of the moſt uneaſy parts of it. And this regulation of the arbitrary proceedings of the ſpiritual courts, was a particular bleſſing to the favourers of the reformation. Burnet, tom. I. p. 147.

[u] Elizabeth Barton, of Kent, in the pariſh of Aldington, being troubled with a ſort of hyſterical fits, which diſtorted her limbs ſo, that people began to think her inſpired of God, was perſuaded by Richard Maſter, the pariſh prieſt, conciled to the court of Rome, nothing could be more unſeaſonable than to paſs this act, when the affair of the divorce ſeemed to be upon the point of being adjuſted to his ſatisfaction.

Whilſt the parliament was employed in theſe matters, Henry received news of the ſentence [w] given and publiſhed againſt him at Rome, with all the circumſtances demonſtrating the little regard the pope had for his perſon and dignity. Theſe haſty proceedings convincing him there was nothing more to be expected from Rome, he no longer delayed to execute his reſolution to break off all correſpondence with the pope. The parliament was no leſs offended than the king with the pope's conduct. So the whole legiſlature, being in the ſame mind, reſolved utterly to aboliſh the papal authority in England. After what Clement had done, there was no other way; it was neceſſary either to withſtand him vigorouſly, or prepare to endure all the ſeverities and indignities, to which England was liable in the reigns of Henry II. and John Lackland. But the times were altered. The Engliſh were no longer willing to ſubmit to the baſe actions required by the popes of their anceſtors, neither was the king's intereſt different from that of his ſubjects. Thus every one being equally tired of the papal yoke, it was deemed more honourable to demoliſh at once that formidable power, under which the kingdom had ſo long groaned, than vainly to expect, it would of itſelf be reduced within due bounds. It may be eaſily judged, the favourers of the new religion were not ſparing of their pains to bring things to this ſtate. The reſolution that had been taken was quickly put in execution. In a few days an act was paſſed containing ſundry articles, all tending to the ſame point.

Theſi rſt confirmed the ſtatute for aboliſhing the annates, or firſt fruits.

By the ſecond it was enacted, that for the future, the pope ſhall have nothing to do in the nominating or preſenting of biſhops; but that, when a biſhopric ſhall become vacant, the king ſhall ſend to the chapter a congé d'elire, and in caſe the election ſhould not be over within twelve days after the licence, it ſhall belong to the king. That the biſhop elect ſhall ſwear fealty to the king, and then be recommended by his majeſty to the archbiſhop to be conſecrated. That if the biſhop elect or archbiſhop refuſe to obey the contents of this act, they ſhall be liable to the penalty of præmunire. Moreover all perſons were expreſly forbid to apply to the biſhop of Rome for bulls, palls, and the like.

By a third article, were aboliſhed Peter-pence, all procurations, delegations, expeditions of bulls, and diſpenſations coming from the court of Rome; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury was appointed to grant all ſuch diſpenſations, &c. as ſhould not be contrary to the law of God, on condition that part of the money thence ariſing ſhall be paid into the king's exchequer [x]. Moreover, all religious houſes, exempt and not exempt, ſhould be ſubject to the archbiſhop's viſitation [y].

By a fourth, it was enacted, that the king's marriage with Catherine, widow of his brother prince, Arthur, ſhould be held null and void, and that ſhe ſhould be reputed only princeſs dowager of Wales. On the contrary, the king's marriage with Anne Bullen is declared valid, and the ſucceſſion to the crown ſettled upon their iſſue. Moreover it is ſaid, that any perſon of what quality ſoever, who ſhall ſpeak or write againſt the king's marriage, ſhall be adjudged a traitor to the king and ſtate, and that all the king's ſubjects without diſtinction ſhall be obliged to ſwear they will obſerve and maintain the contents of this act. After this, follows a liſt of the marriages forbid by the law of God, among which is that of a man with his brother's widow; and it was enacted, that no ſuch marriages ſhould be allowed for the future, and that ſuch as were then in being ſhould be diſſolved.

Thus was the papal authority aboliſhed in England by act of parliament. Indeed there were few biſhops and abbots preſent when the act paſſed [z]. However, there was but one ſingle biſhop who refuſed to ſet his name to it, becauſe they made a great difference between ſubmitting to an act paſſed by a lawful authority, and giving their vote for it. The generality of the people expreſſed great joy to ſee themſelves freed from a yoke which neither they nor their forefathers could bear. None but the monks exclaimed againſt it, and drew upon themſelves the king's indignation, the effects whereof they afterwards felt. Thoſe who wiſhed for the reformation, were highly pleaſed to ſee the main obſtacle removed, believing the reſt would quickly follow. But this reformation, which they ſo impatiently expected, made not in this reign all the progreſs they imagined they had reaſon to hope.

The parliament breaking up the 30th of March [a], after all the members had ſworn to obſerve what was enjoined in the fore-mentioned act, the king ſent commiſſioners throughout the kingdom to adminiſter the ſame oath to all his ſubjects. The collection of the Public Acts contains the oaths of ſeveral abbots and friers, of all orders, to this effect: that they would be faithful to the king, the queen, their heirs and ſucceſſors; that they owned the king for ſupreme head of the church of England; that the biſhop of Rome has no more juriſdiction than any other biſhop; that they renounced his obedience; that they would preach ſincerely doctrines agreeable to the holy ſcriptures; that in their prayers they would pray, firſt for the king, as ſupreme head of the church of England, then for the queen and her iſſue, and, laſtly, for the archbiſhop of Canterbury [b]. Some time after, Lee, archbiſhop of York, certified by a writing of the 5th of May, prieſt, who hoped to draw great advantages from it, to pretend to prophecy and ſupernatural impulſe. Whereupon he taught her to counterfeit trances, and to utter ſpeeches againſt the wickedneſs of the times, particularly againſt hereſy and innovation. At length ſhe gave out, that on ſuch a day ſhe ſhould be perfectly cured, if ſhe went in pilgrimage to the image of the bleſſed virgin, in a chapel within the pariſh of Aldington, the reputation whereof the crafty prieſt had a mind to raiſe. On the day appointed, above two thouſand people were gathered together to ſee the miraculous cure. Being brought to the chapel, ſhe fell into one of her fits, and ſpoke many words of great piety, ſaying, that by the inſpiration of God, ſhe was called to be a nun, and that doctor Bocking (a canon of Chriſt-church in Canterbury, an aſſociate of the prieſt's) was to be her ghoſtly father. Preſently after ſhe ſeemed, by the interceſſion of our lady, to be perfectly recovered, and afterwards became a nun in the priory of St. Sepulchre's, in Canterbury, where Bocking frequently viſited her. He, with ſome others, being apprehenſive the king's marriage with Anne Bullen might be detrimental to the popiſh religion, perſuaded the nun to menace the king with death. The friers that were in the conſpiracy, had agreed to publiſh theſe revelations in their ſermons up and down the kingdom. They had given notice of them to the pope's embaſſadors, and brought the maid to declare her revelations to them. They had alſo ſent an account to queen Catherine, for encouraging her to ſtand out and not ſubmit to the laws. The king, who had deſpiſed the thing long, ordered, that in November the laſt year, the maid and her accompliçes ſhould be brought into the Star Chamber, where, before many lords, they all without rack or torture confeſſed the whole cheat, and were adjudged to ſtand in St. Paul's all the ſermon time, after which, every one on the Sunday following read his confeſſion openly before the people. Then they were carried to the Tower, where they lay till the ſeſſion of parliament. The matter being brought before the houſe, the nun, Richard Maſter, doctor Bocking, Richard Dering, Henry Gold, a London miniſter, Richard Riſby, were attainted of high treaſon, and executed at Tyburn, April 21. The biſhop of Rocheſter, Thomas Abel, and four more, were adjudged guilty of miſpriſion of treaſon, and to forfeit their goods and chattels to the king, and to be impriſoned during pleaſure. The wicked deſigns of this impoſture did much alienate people from the intereſt of Rome, and made the other acts both paſs more eaſily, and be better received by the people. It was alſo generally believed, that what was now diſcovered was no new practice, but that many of the viſions and miracles by which religious orders had raiſed their credit, were of the ſame nature; and it made way for the deſtroying of all the monaſteries in England. Biſhop Fiſher pleaded in his excuſe, that all he did was only to try whether her revelations were true. And for his concealing what ſhe had told him about the king, he thought it needleſs to ſay any thing, becauſe ſhe (as ſhe ſaid) had told it to the king herſelf. So he refuſed to make any ſubmiſſion; and yet it does not appear that the king proceeded againſt him upon this act. See Hall, fol. 219, &c. Stow, p. 570. Burnet, tom. I. p. 150, &c.

[x] All diſpenſations formerly taxed at or above four pounds, ſhould be alſo confirmed under the great ſeal.

[y] All monaſteries, &c. heretofore exempt from the archbiſhop's viſitation, were ſtill to be ſo, and ſuch abbies whoſe elections were formerly confirmed by the pope, were now to be confirmed by the king. See the act, being 21 in the Statute book, 27 in the Record, and 8 in the Journal.

[z] There were preſent only the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, Bath and Wells, Landaffe, and Carliſle, with twelve abbots. Burnet, tom. I. p. 144.

[a] Beſides the acts mentioned above, there were others of ſome importance made; namely, 1. That perſons indicted of petit treaſon, wilful murder, robbery, or other felony, and upon their arraignment ſtanding mute, or peremptorily challenging above twenty of the jury, or elſe refuſing to anſwer directly to their indictments, ſhall not have the benefit of the clergy. 2. By another, the deteſtable vice of buggery was adjudged felony. 3. There was alſo an act made to prevent the deſtroying of wild fowl, whereby it was enjoined that none ſhould be taken from the laſt day of May to the laſt of Auguſt, upon pain of one year's impriſonment. 4. Whereas ſome people had gathered into few hands ſeveral farms, and great plenty of cattle, particularly ſheep, ſome to the number of twenty thouſand, whereby the rents of lands were not only increaſed, but alſo tillage very much decayed, ſome churches and towns had been pulled down, and the price of corn, cattle, &c. exceſſively enhanced; it was therefore enacted, that no man ſhould keep above two thouſand ſheep at one time, and not hold above two farms at once, and thoſe to be in the pariſh where he lives. 5. That no man ſhould buy bound books brought from beyond ſea, nor buy any ſuch by retail. See Statut. 25. Hen. VIII.

[b] Gardiner wrote to Cromwell from Wincheſter, the 6th of May, that the lord Audley and others, with all the abbots, priors, wardens, and curates, within the ſhire, had taken the oath. The forms in which they did it are not known. for though they were enrolled, yet, in queen Mary's days, Bonner and others were commiſſioned to examine the records, and raze out all things done either in contempt of the ſee of Rome, or the defamation of religious houſes. However, two of the ſubſcriptions of religious orders, dated May 4, 1534, eſcaped their diligence. One is by the abbies, the other by the prioreſs and convent of the Dominican nuns at Deptford. See Burnet's collection, N. 50. vol. I.

that in the convocation of his province it was declared the pope had no more power in England than any other biſhop. Only John Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſir Thomas Mere, late chancellor, refuſed to ſign the act of parliament, which contained three principal articles: the ſucceſſion of the crown; the nullity of the king's firſt marriage, with the validity of the ſecond; and the aboliſhment of the papal authority. They offered to ſign the firſt article; but for the other two, they ſaid, their conſcience would not ſuffer them to conſent to them; whereupon they were committed to the Tower [c].

Whilſt theſe oaths were adminiſtering throughout the kingdom, the king ſent the archbiſhop of York and the biſhop of Durham [d] to tell Catherine, ſhe muſt forbear aſſuming the title of queen, and lay before her the reaſons that moved the parliament to deprive her of it. But ſhe replied, ſhe believed her marriage with the king good and lawful, and ſhould hold it as ſuch to her dying day: that ſhe had never conſummated her marriage with prince Arthur; and they who affirmed it, ſpoke not the truth; that ſhe was not bound to ſubmit to the archbiſhop of Canterbury's ſentence, ſince the pope had nulled it and decreed the contrary [e]: that the king's marriage with Anne was not valid, as being made during the appeal: that ſhe was not obliged to ſubmit to the acts of the parliament, not being the king's ſubject, but his wife: that beſides, theſe acts were made by the king's ſubjects, upon an affair wherein he was party.

Though Henry would have been very glad of Catherine's ſubmiſſion to what the parliament had enacted, it was not her obſtinacy that gave him the moſt uneaſineſs. The emperor having undertaken to execute the pope's ſentence, Henry was naturally to expect to be attacked by that powerful enemy. In order therefore to prevent him, or to put himſelf in a ſtate of defence, he deſired to make a league with the king of France by a new treaty, which would render their union more effectual for their common defence. Francis ſeemed very ready to comply, but meant that all the terms ſhould be to his advantage, and to make Henry ſubſervient to his deſigns elſewhere. He had ſtill an eye upon the duchy of Milan, as upon what belonged to him of right, and had been unjuſtly taken from him, and deſigned to recover it, though he had expreſly renounced it by the treaty of Cambray. To that end he had ſacrificed the honour of his houſe, in marrying his ſecond ſon to a baſtard branch of the family of the Medici, becauſe he did not think he could proceed without the pope. But on the other hand, he was afraid of loſing the fruit of that alliance, by uniting too cloſely with the king of England, whom the pope could now conſider but as an open enemy. In this perplexity, he endeavoured to perſuade Henry to act only privately, by ſending large ſums to the German proteſtants to foment the diſſention between them and the emperor, and embroil him ſo, as to hinder him from thinking of Italy. Henry did not abſolutely reject the propoſal. He was very willing to aſſiſt the proteſtants with a good ſum of money; but pretended withal that Francis ſhould attack Navarre with a powerful army, whilſt on his part he carried war into Flanders. But Francis could not reſolve to join ſo openly with England, for fear of offending the pope. Beſides he turned all his thoughts to the Milaneſe, where an accident about the end of the laſt year gave him an opportunity to carry his arms. As this accident was the occaſion or pretence of a new war between the emperor and the king of France, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention it.

Franceſco Sforza was no ſooner reſtored to Milan upon very hard terms, but he wiſhed to be freed from the emperor's yoke, and the obligation to pay him the ſum he had promiſed. Francis having ſome knowledge of Sforza's diſpoſition, believed he ſhould cheriſh it, in hopes of reaping by it one day ſome advantage. But as Sforza greatly feared to give the emperor ſuſpicion, and conſequently the affair was to be managed very privately, Francis found means to keep at Milan an envoy, who could not be ſuſpected. He choſe for that purpoſe a Milaneſe gentleman, called Marveilles, who having been formerly baniſhed from Milan by Ludovico the Black, had lived in France ever ſince. The troubles of the Milaneſe being entirely ended by the peace of Cambray, Merveilles returned home with a letter of credence for the duke, to which the duke ſent an anſwer, receiving the gentleman as envoy of France, though in public he treated him not as ſuch. However ſecret Merveilles's negotiation might be, the emperor had ſome notice of it, and made great complaints to the duke, who, to remove all ſuſpicion, reſolved to ſacrifice to him this envoy. Accordingly, he ſuborned a perſon to quarrel with Merveilles, which ended in the murder of the party employed, who was killed by Merveilles's ſervants, without, however, their maſter's being preſent. Whereupon Merveilles was committed to priſon, and two days after beheaded, without any one being ſuffered to ſpeak with him. Francis hearing of it, wrote a menacing letter to the duke, and acquainted all his allies with what had happened. The duke would have excuſed himſelf, by denying that Merveilles was at Milan as envoy. What he ſaid was true in reſpect to the public. But he could not diſown his own letter to the king in anſwer to the letter of credence. When the French embaſſador informed the emperor of the outrage committed at Milan upon Merveilles, he coldly anſwered, he could not conceive how the king of France could be affected with the death of a ſubject of the duke of Milan, whom his ſovereign had puniſhed according to his deſerts. This anſwer made the king believe the emperor was concerned in Merveilles's death, which was a freſh cauſe of diſguſt, and inflamed his deſire of revenge. But, on the other hand, he was not ſorry the ſatisfaction he demanded was refuſed, becauſe he intended to take occaſion from thence to enter the Milaneſe ſword in hand. To that purpoſe, he ordered a levy of lanſquenets in Germany, and demanded paſſage of the duke of Savoy to go and chaſtiſe the duke of Milan. But that prince, fearing to diſpleaſe the emperor, would not grant it. For which reaſon Francis, who could not enter the Milaneſe but by paſſing through the duke of Savoy's dominions, reſolved to make war upon him, uſing for pretence certain claims he had in right of Louiſa, his mother, to the inheritance of the late duke of Savoy. Till every thing was ready to begin the war, he ſpent the whole year in divers negotiations, tending to create the emperor troubles, and diſable him to aſſiſt the duke of Savoy.

Whilſt Francis was thus employed, the ſituation of the affairs of Italy was changed by the death of Clement VII. who was carried off by a fit of ſickneſs the 26th of September. The 12th of October following, cardinal Farneſe was choſen pope, and aſſumed the name of Paul III.

There were likewiſe this year in Germany ſome alterations, which put the affairs of the proteſtants in a tolerable ſituation. The landgrave of Heſſe defeated king Ferdinand's army, commanded by the count Palatine, and reſtored the duke of Wirtemberg to his dominions. Ferdinand, not being able any longer to reſiſt the landgrave, was forced to agree to the duke's reſtoration; but withal obtained, that both the duke and the landgrave ſhould acknowledge him for king of the Romans. Shortly after, the elector of Saxony acknowledged him alſo, having firſt got a promiſe from him, that he would not ſuffer any perſon to be moleſted in the empire on the account of religion.

Clement VIIth's death cauſed no alteration in the meaſures taken by the court of England to ſhake off entirely the papal yoke. Matters had been carried too far ever to recede. Beſides, the king having not much to fear from abroad, by reaſon of the troubles the emperor was like to be involved in, and his ſubjects being inclined to ſupport him, it would have been imprudent to neglect ſo favourable a juncture, and [c] At a meeting of the privy council at Lambeth, many were cited to take the oath. More was firſt called, and the oath being tendered him, he replied, after having conſidered the act, he would neither blame thoſe that made it, nor thoſe that ſwore the oath: but for his part, though he was willing to ſwear to the ſucceſſion, if he might be ſuffered to draw up the oath himſelf, yet for the oath that was offered him, his conſcience ſo moved him, that he could not, without hazarding his ſoul, take it. Upon which, being deſired to withdraw, others were called upon, and did all take the oath, except Fiſher, who anſwered in almoſt the ſame manner as More had done. Then More was again brought in, and they ſhewed him how many had taken it; he ſaid, he judged no man for doing it, only he could not do it himſelf. Being aſked the reaſon, he replied, he feared it might provoke the king the more againſt him, if he ſhould offer reaſons, which would be called diſputing againſt law: but however, if the king would command him to do it, he would put them in writing. Cranmer urged him with this argument, that ſince he blamed not others for taking it, it ſeemed he was not perſuaded it was a ſin, but was doubtful in the matter: but he did know certainly he ought to obey the king and the law; therefore he was obliged to do that about which he was certain, notwithſtanding his doubtings. He anſwered, though he had examined the matter very carefully, yet his conſcience leaned poſitively to the other ſide, and offered to purge himſelf by oath that it was purely out of conſcience that he refuſed it. The abbot of Weſtminſter preſſed him, (with an argument too often uſed in the like caſes) that he might ſee his conſcience was erroneous, ſince the great council of the realm was of another mind. Cranmer, in a letter to Cromwell, earneſtly preſſed to accept the oath as More and Fiſher offered; for if they once ſwore to the ſucceſſion, it would quiet the kingdom, ſince all others would aſquieſce and ſubmit to the judgments of ſo great men. But this ſage advice was not followed Burnet, vol. I. p. 156. Strype's Mem. tom. I. p. 174.

leave his work unfiniſhed. So the parliament meeting the 3d of November, paſſed ſeveral material acts, of which it will ſuffice to relate the ſubſtance, in order to ſhew they all tended to the ſame point, that is, to break all the bonds which had ſerved to hold the Engliſh in ſubjection to the popes.

The firſt act confirmed the king's title of ſupreme head of the church of England, already given him by the clergy [f]. Though Henry had very willingly accepted this title from the clergy, nay, had not left them the liberty to refuſe it, he ſeemed, however, to doubt whether he ſhould receive it when offered by the parliament. He was pleaſed firſt to adviſe with his council, and conſult ſome of the biſhops, whether out of ſcruple, or to ſhew it was not extorted. They whom he conſulted having ſatisfied him that the authority aſſumed by the biſhop of Rome over the whole church had no foundation in ſcripture, he baniſhed all his ſcruples, if it be true that he had any, and from thenceforward took all occaſions to improve the prerogatives which flowed from this new title.

By the ſecond act, it was declared treaſon to ſpeak, write, or imagine any thing againſt the king or queen [g].

The third, debarred perſons accuſed of treaſon of the benefit of ſanctuary.

By a fourth, the parliament preſcribed a form of oath concerning the ſucceſſion, to be taken by all the king's ſubjects, and annulled all former oaths upon that head.

The fifth, was very grievous to the clergy, as it gave the king the annates and firſt fruits of the benefices; whereas by the act already paſſed, the eccleſiaſtics were in hopes of being ever freed from that burthen. Moreover, by the ſame act the yearly revenue of the tenth part of all livings was granted to the king [h].

By a ſixth ſtatute, proviſion was made for twenty-five ſuffragan biſhops, each of whom was to depend on his dioceſan, who was to preſent two to the king, for him to chooſe one. Thus was revived in the church of England the uſe of Chorepiſcopi, introduced into the primitive church, but afterwards diſcontinued for ſeveral centuries [i].

Laſtly, The parliament condemned Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſir Thomas More, to perpetual impriſonment, and confiſcated all their eſtates, for refuſing to take the oath enjoined by the act of the former ſeſſion. This ſentence was conſidered by ſome as very unjuſt, whilſt others admired in the ſame the effects of God's juſtice upon perſons that had been violent perſecutors of the Lutherans.

Before the parliament broke up, the king granted a general pardon; from which, however, Fiſher and More were excluded [k].

Shortly after, the king iſſued out a proclamation, forbiding to give the biſhop of Rome the name of pope, and commanded that name to be razed out of all books, to deſtroy the remembrance of it if poſſible. Then the biſhops voluntarily ſwore to renounce expreſly all obedience to the biſhop of Rome. Gardiner, now biſhop of Wincheſter, was not the laſt to take this oath, though in his ſoul he abhorred it as very unjuſt; but a blind condeſcenſion for the king in this reſpect was then the only means to preſerve his favour. Beſides, Gardiner was thereby enabled to croſs upon other points the reformers, who daily gained ground [l].

It was not only in Germany that the reformation had made ſome progreſs, but alſo in many other places. In England it had been countenanced in ſome meaſure by cardinal Wolſey, as during his miniſtry, no perſon was proſecuted for hereſy; though the clergy wanted not occaſions to exerciſe their uſual ſeverities, had they been left to take their own courſe. After Wolſey's diſgrace, ſir Thomas More, being made chancellor, perſuaded the king, that what did him the moſt injury at the court of Rome, was the report of his being a favourer of the innovators, and to remove this falſe imputation, the moſt infallible way was to ſhew a zeal for religion. Henry following this advice, ordered the laws againſt heretics to be rigorouſly executed, and very ſtrictly prohibited the importing any of their books into the kingdom. But this prohibition was not capable of hindering ſome of Luther's treatiſes from being brought into England with Tindal's tranſlation of the New Teſtament, who was retired into Flanders. The biſhop of London having notice of it, cauſed ſome copies to be ſeized, and publicly burnt by the hangman [m]. But this was ſo far from injuring the reformation, that it rather turned to its advantage. Many perſons, full of indignation at this impious act, inferred that the ſcriptures were contrary to the religion generally profeſſed, ſince the clergy took ſuch care to hinder the bible from being read, and that alone raiſed their curioſity to read. On the other hand, the diſlike the Engliſh had taken to the pope, greatly increaſed by the reading of the Lutheran writings.

As the reformation gained ground, the zeal of its enemies was inflamed againſt ſuch as embraced it. Whilſt More was chancellor, he ſpared no pains to deſtroy them utterly. Many ſuffered martyrdom [n] with a wonderful conſtancy, which very much contributed to ſtrengthen their brethren. At length, the king having to manage the German proteſtants, becauſe he might afterwards want them, ſuſpended More's perſecution. On the other hand, Anne Bullen very much mollified the king in that reſpect. Archbiſhop Cranmer contributed to it likewiſe to the utmoſt of his power; and Thomas Cromwell, now in great eſteem with the king, ſeconded their endeavours ſo far as in him lay [o]. But they had a ſtrong party againſt them, conſiſting of the duke of Norfolk, Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, Longland biſhop of Lincoln, almoſt all the churchmen who had any acceſs to the court, and thoſe who when they preached before the king filled their ſermons with invectives againſt the reformation. All theſe had gained Henry's confidence by their compliance in the affair of the divorce and the ſupremacy, though in the laſt they acted contrary to their ſentiments. By this condeſcenſion, they were enabled effectually to oppoſe the reformers in all the articles which concerned not the pope, and eſpecially in that of the real preſence, which the king deemed unqueſtionable, and thought ſo all his life. In ſpite of all this, the heads of the reformed deſpaired not of inclining him by degrees to a farther reformation, becauſe of the connection the articles of religion have one with another. Beſides, their party grew ſtronger every day, by the junction of ſuch as read the holy ſcriptures and the religious books which were handed about, notwithſtanding the king's prohibition. Nothing ſhews more the num-

[h] To be paid between Chriſtmas and the 1ſt of April. It was ordered in this act, that the chancellor of England ſhould direct, into every dioceſe in the realm, commiſſions, in the king's name, under his great ſeal, as well to the archbiſhop and biſhop of every dioceſe, as to ſuch other perſons as the king ſhould appoint; to examine, ſearch, and require, by all ways and means, the true, juſt, and whole yearly value of all the manors, lands, tenements, hereditaments, rents, tithes, offerings, emoluments, and all other profits, as well ſpiritual as temporal, belonging to any archbiſhopric, biſhopric, archdeaconry, deanry, hoſpital, college, prebend, cathedral, or collegiate church, parſonage, vicarage, free chapel, or any other benefices or promotion ſpiritual. Accordingly, ſeveral commiſſioners were appointed for each county, with whom were joined the biſhops of the reſpective dioceſes, and a certain number of auditors. The valuations that were thus taken by theſe commiſſioners, were all returned to Cromwell, maſter of the rolls; and according to them have the firſt fruits been paid ever ſince. Strype's Mem. tom. I. p. 211.

[i] The towns appointed for ſuffragan ſees were Thetford, Ipſwich, Colcheſter, Dover, Guilford, Southampton, Taunton, Shaftſbury, Molton, Marlborough, Bedford, Leiceſter, Glouceſter, Shrewſbury, Briſtol, Penreth, Bridgwater, Nottingham, Grantham, Hull, Huntingdon, Cambridge, Pereth, and Berwick, St. Germans, and the Iſle of Wight. They were to exerciſe ſuch juriſdiction as the biſhop of the dioceſe ſhould give to them; but their authority was to laſt no longer than the biſhop continued his commiſſion to them. In Burnet's collection, N. 51, vol. I. the reader may ſee a writ for making a ſuffragan biſhop.

[k] This parliament granted the king a tenth and a fifteenth, to be paid in three years. There had been no ſubſidy granted for twelve years before. Burnet, tom. I. p. 158.

[l] This year, on the 11th of Auguſt, the monaſteries of Obſervant Friers at Canterbury, Greenwich, and Richmond, Newark and Newcaſtle, were ſuppreſſed, and Auguſtan Friers (according to ſome) put in their room; though others mention not this exchange. See Stow, p. 571. Herbert, p. 178.

[m] Tunſtal, biſhop of London, being at Antwerp (where Tindal was) in 1529, as he returned from his embaſſy at the treaty of Cambray, ſent for one Packington, an Engliſh merchant, and deſired to ſee how many of Tindal's New Teſtaments he might have for money. Packington acquainted Tindal with what the biſhop propoſed. Tindal was very glad of it, for he was then deſigning a new and more correct edition; but being poor, and the former impreſſion not being ſold off, he could not go about it. So, giving Packington all the copies that lay in his hands, the biſhop paid for them, and brought them over and burnt them in Cheapſide. Next year, when the ſecond edition was finiſhed, many more were brought over, and chancellor More enquiring of one Conſtantine, who it was that encouraged and ſupported them at Antwerp, was told, that the greateſt encouragement they had was from the biſhop of London, who bought up half the old impreſſion. This made all that heard it, laugh heartily. William Tindal, born on the borders of Wales, and brought up at Oxford, was afterwards burnt in 1536, at Filford, eighteen miles from Antwerp, crying out at the ſtake, Lord, open the king of England's eyes. ber and ſtrength of that party, than the readineſs wherewith the parliament paſſed the acts which tended to leſſen the clergy's power, and ſhake off the papal yoke.

The reformation made likewiſe ſome progreſs in France: the king himſelf expreſſed an inclination for the doctrine of the proteſtants, which was privately countenanced by his ſiſter Margaret queen of Navarre. But the cardinals of Tournon and Lorrain, who were in great credit with Francis, diſſuaded him from it ſo earneſtly, that they gained him at laſt, nay, made him a violent perſecutor.

Before I cloſe what relates to the events of the year 1534, I muſt not forget to mention, that a twelve months truce, concluded the laſt year [p] between England and Scotland, was turned into a peace the 11th of May this year. By the treaty, the peace was to laſt till the death of one of the two kings, and Henry might without breaking it keep the Douglaſſes in England.

[1535] In the beginning of the year 1535, Francis I. ſent an embaſſy to Henry, under colour of diſcharging the duty of a good friend and ally, but in reality to try to deceive him, by feigning to acquaint him with his ſecrets, and aſk his advice. The occaſion of the embaſſy was this: the emperor having reſolved to carry his arms into Africa, had a mind to amuſe Francis, leſt in his abſence he ſhould attack the duke of Savoy, and ſo open the way to the duchy of Milan, as he ſeemed to intend. To that purpoſe, he had diſpatched an embaſſador to him, with orders to propoſe a marriage between his third daughter and Philip prince of Spain, and another between the dauphin and Mary, daughter of Henry and Catherine of Arragon. Moreover, he had offered him a penſion of a hundred thouſand crowns for the duke of Orleans upon the duchy of Milan, and the duchy itſelf, after the death of Franceſco Sforza, who had no heirs. It was evident theſe overtures were deſigned only to amuſe Francis, who conſidered them himſelf upon no other foot. Nevertheleſs, he imagined they would ſerve to procure him ſome advantage from Henry, if he let him know he was courted by the emperor. To that end, he ſent into England admiral Chabot Seigneur de Brion, on pretence to adviſe with the king upon theſe offers. But his chief aim was to make him uneaſy, and induce him to offer ſome advantageous propoſals. It appeared in the ſequel, he would have perſuaded him to things which were very far from his thoughts. The admiral having diſcharged his commiſſion, Henry anſwered, he much wondered the emperor ſhould pretend to marry his daughter, over whom he neither had nor ever ſhould have any right or power; that it was manifeſt he only ſought to break the union between France and England, and therefore he hoped the king of France would not be ſo much his own enemy as to hearken to ſuch overtures. Shortly after, he ſent orders to his embaſſador at Paris [q] to tell Francis he would give Elizabeth, his daughter and heir, to the duke of Angoulême, his third ſon, upon the following conditions: that Francis himſelf, his three ſons, the princes of the blood, the principal nobility of France, the parliaments and univerſities, ſhould ſolemnly promiſe to cauſe to be revoked the ſentence given againſt him by the biſhop of Rome: that the duke of Angoulême ſhould be ſent into England to be educated: that in caſe by his marriage he ſhould come to the crown of England, the duchy of Angoulême ſhould be independent of the crown of France. Theſe conditions were afterwards mitigated, and Francis I. ſeemed to agree to them. But he required, in his turn, that Henry ſhould aſſiſt him in the war of Savoy, and forgive him the perpetual annuity of a hundred thouſand crowns, which he was bound to pay by a treaty. Henry, perceiving Francis's inſincerity, told the admiral, that, inſtead of forgiving the penſion, he expected the king his maſter ſhould pay the arrears, and clear by the time appointed all his other debts. This anſwer put an end to the negotiation, which probably was undertaken only to ſound Henry concerning the penſion.

Francis's grand deſign was to recover the duchy of Milan, under pretence of revenging the affront done him by Sforza. But, to execute this project, it was neceſſary to raiſe the emperor troubles, which would hinder him from aſſiſting that duchy. There were four ſeveral quarters from whence he hoped to embroil the emperor: Firſt, from the pope and the princes of Italy; ſecondly, in Germany, by means of the league of Smalcald; thirdly, by fomenting diſcord between the king of England and the emperor; laſtly, by drawing the Turks into Germany. In order to all this, he had married his ſon, the duke of Orleans, to Catherine de Medici; lodged a hundred thouſand crowns in the hands of the duke of Bavaria, to be ready upon occaſion; perſuaded Henry to end the affair of the divorce in the manner we have ſeen; and had ſecret agents at Conſtantinople to treat of an alliance with Soliman, emperor of the Turks. But moſt of theſe expedients, which he thought infallible, had proved unſucceſsful. The firſt had miſcarried by the death of Clement VII. and by the election of a new pope, whom it was not eaſy to gain to his intereſt. The king of the Romans had fruſtrated the ſecond, by agreeing with the elector of Saxony, the landgrave of Heſſe, and the duke of Wirtemberg. As for the third, he could not hope much from thence, becauſe the king of England's intention was not to make war upon the emperor, but only to ſtand upon the defenſive. Conſequently it was in the emperor's power to keep him quiet by not attacking him firſt. The Turks therefore alone could properly be ſubſervient to his deſigns. But, to rely upon them, it was neceſſary to commence the war in Italy, otherwiſe it was not likely Soliman would be perſuaded to begin it in Hungary. Upon that account, he continued at Conſtantinople a negotiation, which was diſcovered by a letter, intercepted by the duke of Urbino, who ſent it immediately to the emperor. Mean while, Francis ſtill perſiſted in his reſolution to attack the duke of Savoy, and open a paſſage to the Milaneſe. He reckoned the peace of Germany could not hold long; that the emperor and Henry would never live in a good underſtanding; and that, when once the war was begun, the pope, the potentates of Italy, and the king of England, would readily aſſiſt to reduce the power of the houſe of Auſtria within due bounds. Above all, he depended upon the princes of the league of Smalcald, fancying they would embrace this opportunity to free themſelves from their uneaſineſs, cauſed by the advancement of that houſe. To that end he continued his intrigues with them, and pretended to be ſo far inclined to their religion, that he was going to invite Melancthon into France to confer with him: but withal, he plainly ſhewed he acted only upon political views, ſince he cauſed to be burnt in France thoſe that ſeparated from the church of Rome. Mean while, as there was ſome difference between Luther and Calvin about religion, and as thoſe that were burnt in France were Calviniſts, the rigid Lutherans, not conſidering them as their brethren, imagined Francis might treat them with the utmoſt ſeverity, without loſing his regard for the Lutheran religion. Francis, reſolving to uſe his endeavours to re-conquer the duchy of Milan, attacked the duke of Savoy, and in the firſt campaign took from him Savoy and la Breſſe.

Whilſt Francis was labouring to accompliſh his deſigns, Charles V. was forming vaſt projects, which tended to no leſs than eſtabliſhing his dominion over all Europe. Indeed, France and England, being cloſely united together, could have oppoſed a ſtrong fence againſt his ambition: but he did not deſpair to diſunite them in the end. That was his chief care, whilſt on the one hand he excited the Iriſh to rebellion, and the king of Scotland to a rupture with England. But, whilſt he was endeavouring to embroil his enemies, in hopes of finding his account in it, he was himſelf uneaſy with regard to Soliman, who threatened Germany, under colour of ſupporting the intereſts of John de Zapol, whom he had cauſed to be crowned king of Hungary. On the other hand, he ſaw with extreme concern the great progreſs of Haradin Barbaroſſa, the famous corſair, who, after expelling Muley Haſſem, had made himſelf king of Tunis. Such a neighbour could not but diſquiet him, becauſe, to hinder him from ravaging the coaſts of Spain, Naples, and Sicily, it would have been neceſſary conſtantly to maintain a fleet in the Mediterranean, which could not be done without a great expence, and this would have diſconcerted his other projects. So, conſidering the war he had reſolved to wage with Haradin as the moſt urgent affair, he made this ſummer an expedition into Africa, where he took the fort of la Goulette; after which, he became maſter of Tunis, and reſtored Muley Haſſem.

Henry gladly ſaw the emperor engaging in wars, which probably would keep him long employed. Whereupon he reſolved to improve this interval, to complete the regulation of his domeſtic affairs, which were yet in a very doubtful ſtate. He had aboliſhed the papal authority, and been declared ſupreme head of the church of England by acts of parliament; but though, by the conſtitution of the government, theſe acts ſeemed to be above all contradiction, it was, however, but too true, that this was not ſufficient. As religion was concerned, and conſcience cannot be compelled, the ſtatutes themſelves wanted to be ſupported by force, that an outward obedience at leaſt might be paid them. It is certain the uniformity which appeared in the determinations of the parliament and clergy, was in many the effect of fear rather than of inward perſuaſion. Nay ſome, as Fiſher and More, were ſo hardy as openly to diſapprove theſe ordinances, and notwithſtanding the ſeverity exerciſed upon them, ſtill perſiſted in the ſame opinion. It is true, theſe inſtances of rigour to perſons of ſuch diſtinction, made people ſilent, but were not capable of convincing them of the reaſonableneſs of the ſtatutes. Thus, though the king found no public oppoſition, it was eaſy for him to ſee, that an obedience proceeding from fear could laſt no longer than compulſion ſubſiſted. On the other hand, he beheld with concern the triumph of the proteſtants, who imagined, that after aboliſhing the papal authority, he was going to renounce all the errors they combated, though nothing was farther from his thoughts. Mean while, it was every where publiſhed, that he was upon the point of forſaking the antient religion: ſome aſſerting it, out of malice, to render him odious; and others, becauſe they wiſhed it. To clear himſelf, therefore, from theſe imputations, at the very time he refuſed to recognize the pope's authority, he ordered thoſe who were called ſacramentarians to be burnt. By this conduct he made himſelf hateful to the catholics and proteſtants. As for the proteſtants, he bore their ill-will without much concern: beſides, that he feared them not, he approved, in their doctrine, the articles only that oppoſe the papal authority, and their ſentiments of the friers, with whom he was extremely incenſed, becauſe they laboured with all their power to alienate from him the affections of his people. It is true, he valued and loved Cranmer and Cromwell, with ſome others, who countenanced the reformation; but he did not look upon them as proteſtants. He believed them men of ſolid virtue and piety, who, preſerving the eſſential doctrines of religion, were deſirous of reforming the abuſes crept into the church; but, as among theſe abuſes, he himſelf acknowledged only what concerned the pope and the friers, he imagined the reformers kept within the ſame bounds. They who perfectly knew him, took care not to diſcover all their thoughts; but, by conforming themſelves to his ſentiments on theſe two articles, they hoped to induce him by degrees to advance the reformation, when, by their pains, he ſhould become more enlightened. For which reaſon the reformation began in England with theſe two points. As to the others, which had no relation to theſe, they were not meddled with during this reign, or at leaſt, but ſlightly. The reaſon is, becauſe Henry would never ſuffer his ſubjects to go greater lengths than himſelf. But to ſpeak the truth, his underſtanding was always directed by his intereſt. If all the changes made in religion in his reign be examined, they will all be found to concur directly to eſtabliſh an abſolute power over his ſubjects. That was ever the principal, and perhaps the ſole motive of his proceedings, when he perceived the rupture with Rome to be an admirable means to that end. Hence the enemies of the reformation take occaſion to ſay, it was true, if the perſon of Henry VIII. be only conſidered. But it does not follow, that they who promoted and embraced it acted upon the like motive. Beſides, what was the reformation in Henry VIIIth's days? Only a bare renouncing of the papal power, whilſt thoſe were burnt that would have carried it farther. So, let what will be ſaid of Henry's perſon, and his motives to throw off the papal yoke, I do not ſee that the proteſtants are much concerned to undertake his defence.

Henry, finding that many of his ſubjects approved not his conduct, would have been very glad to take from them the pretence they uſed, of the ſentence publiſhed againſt him by the pope. To that purpoſe he would have engaged all France to join with him in procuring a revocation. But that method was impracticable, and a reconciliation with the court of Rome no leſs ſo. He could never have reſolved to part with the title of head of the church of England, and the pope would never have conſented an agreement, unleſs things were reſtored to their antient ſtate. So Henry ſeeing himſelf obliged to purſue his point, reſolved to overcome by force, the obſtinacy of ſuch of his ſubjects as refuſed to ſubmit to the laws lately enacted. But on the other hand, deſiring to purge himſelf of the imputation of hereſy, wherewith he was charged, he affected to puniſh ſeverely thoſe that embraced the new opinions. In this ſort of medium, which pleaſed neither party, he paſſed the reſidue of his days. But this is ſaying too little. It muſt be further added, that conſidering himſelf as a pattern for his ſubjects; he compelled them to keep within the ſame bounds, and would not ſuffer them to believe more or leſs than himſelf.

It was impoſſible that after ſuch reſolution Henry ſhould not live in a continual miſtruſt of his ſubjects, which obliged him to have always an eye upon what paſſed in the kingdom. Moreover, he had likewiſe to guard againſt the emperor's attacks, who had openly threatened him. He was ſenſible, if he were once engaged in a war, thoſe that durſt not look him in the face during his proſperity, would not ſcruple to declare againſt him, if his arms were unſucceſsful. The king of Scotland, his nephew, was the perſon moſt to be feared. As for the king of France, who profeſſed himſelf his friend, and indeed was much obliged to him, he had ſhewn too plainly how ſelf-intereſted his friendſhip was to be relied on. They both intended to embroil the emperor, but with different views. Each meant to make his ally ſubſervient to his deſigns, and to improve the advantages which flowed from their union. Thus Henry ſaw no reſource but in his own ſubjects, among whom however there were many malcontents. But as he had acted for ſome time with great haughtineſs, he found, if he relaxed on this occaſion, it would certainly be aſcribed either to his ſcruples, or to a ſenſe of his weakneſs, than which nothing could be more prejudicial to him. This conſideration, joined to his ſtern and haughty temper, rendered him altogether untractable. From thenceforward he became fierce, cruel, inſenſible of his people's calamities, and executing without mercy, the laws dictated by himſelf to his parliament. In ſhort, he may, in ſome manner be ſaid, to be no longer the ſame king that had before reigned. All that can be alleged in his vindication, is, that he was often provoked by perſons, who, endeavouring to alienate the hearts of his ſubjects, attacked him in the moſt ſenſible part, becauſe his whole reliance was upon the aſſiſtance of his people.

It will doubtleſs be ſurpriſing to ſee in this reign the Engliſh ſo patient and ſubmiſſive to their ſovereign's pleaſure, that hardly do we find, from the beginning of the affair of the divorce, that the parliament refuſed him any thing, though his demands were very extraordinary. But it is eaſy to diſcover the reaſon. Religion was the ſole cauſe. The king, as it was obſerved, kept a ſort of medium with reſpect to religion. But as no man could believe it poſſible for him to remain long in that ſituation, thoſe who deſired the reformation, imagined they could not do better than comply with him in all things, to induce him to advance it by degrees. In like manner, the friends of the old religion, ſeeing ſuch beginnings, were afraid he would proceed, and their oppoſition would make him finiſh his work the ſooner. So, each party ſtriving to gain him to their intereſt, there reſulted for him an authority which none of his predeceſſors had ever enjoyed, and which he could not have uſurped in any other circumſtances, without hazarding his crown. But both parties were alike deceived. Henry kept in the ſame medium all the reſt of his life, and made them both feel the fatal effects of that abſolute power they had ſo eaſily ſuffered him to aſſume. It is true, he was always ſo prudent, as not to act contrary to law. But he made uſe of his power to procure ſuch laws as he pleaſed, and then executed them without mercy. This will frequently be ſeen in the ſequel. But after ſhewing Henry's character and motives, his actions muſt be related, which will confirm what has been obſerved.

Though the acts concerning the king's marriage and the papal power, bore the ſeal of the public authority, they were very far from being univerſally approved. As they were not aſcribed ſo much to the two houſes as to the king, on him it was that the whole blame was caſt. Among all the malcontents, the monks were the moſt open, by their attempts to blacken him in the minds of the people. They could not bear his ſetting himſelf up in the pope's place, whom they had always conſidered, and ſtill did conſider, as their true head, notwitſtanding the ſtatutes made againſt him. Theſe were the men that cauſed the pretended Kentiſh propheteſs to ſay, if the king put away queen Catherine, and married another, he ſhould die in a month, and come to a tragical end. A Franciſcan, named Peto, preaching before the king[r], was ſo hardy as to tell him to his face, "That God's judgments were ready to fall upon his head: that he was always ſurrounded with a croud of lying prophets, who foretold him good ſucceſs. But for himſelf, like another [r] At Greenwich, where Henry reſided moſt in ſummer. The king bore Peto's inſolence patiently; but, to undeceive the people, procured Dr. Curwin to preach the next Sunday, who juſtified the king's proceedings, and condemned Peto as a rebel, a ſlanderer, a dog, and a traitor. Peto was gone to Canterbury, but Elſton, another frier, of the ſame houſe, interrupted him, and ſaid, he was one of the lying prophets, that ſought by adultery to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion to the crown. And yet nothing more was done to theſe two friers, than that they were convened before the council, and rebuked for their inſolence. Stow, p. 562. Burnet, tom. I. p. 151.

They

Micaiah, he warned him that the dogs ſhould lick his blood, as they had done Ahab's." The frier's inſolence, and the daily reports of the invectives which were every where ſpread againſt him, provoked him extremely againſt them, as well as againſt thoſe that had the boldneſs to ſpeak opprobriouſly of the acts of parliament. He was however very patient for ſome time, imagining that the people would at length be calmed. But when he ſaw they did not ceaſe to aſpire him with all ſorts of calumnies, he called a council to conſider how he ſhould behave towards thoſe who affected to contradict the laws and ſpeak evil of him. Some of the council were for taking notice of theſe offences, for fear too great a ſeverity ſhould have a quite contrary effect to what he deſired [s]. But others repreſented to him the ill conſequence of ſuch a conduct. They ſhewed him that theſe people's aim was to ſtir up the people againſt him, to give the biſhop of Rome opportunity to aſſert his pretended authority, and therefore they were for putting the laws in execution with the utmoſt rigour. The king himſelf was of this opinion, as moſt agreeable to his fierce and ſtern temper, which could not bear contradiction. Beſides, he ſaw to what he ſhould be reduced in the end, if his enemies ſucceeded in their deſign to render him odious to the people. It is not therefore very ſtrange, that, ſeeing himſelf thus provoked, he reſolved to treat with rigour thoſe who laboured with all their power to ruin him.

The reſolution being taken of executing the laws without mercy, certain priors, monks, and others, who had been too free with the new ſtatutes, were apprehended, tried, and executed, according to the utmoſt rigour of the ſame laws [t]. But at the ſame time, the king, fearing leſt this ſeverity ſhould be aſcribed to the inclination he was charged with for the new religion, affected to uſe the ſame rigour to thoſe who had openly embraced the reformation, and put them to death with the others. At laſt, to keep every one in awe by an example, which ſhould make the boldeſt tremble, he reſolved to deliver up to the rigour of the law Fiſher and More, then priſoners in the Tower [u]. To that end, Fiſher was required to take the oath of ſupremacy, it being ſuppoſed he would refuſe it, as he did indeed. About the ſame time Paul III. created him cardinal, though he had declared that if the cardinal's hat was laid at his feet, he would not ſtoop to take it up. But the pope, whoſe aim was to encourage ſuch as oppoſed the king, conferred, however, that dignity upon him, with the pompous elogy, that he conſidered him as the cardinal of cardinals. This unſeaſonable honour haſtened, in all likelihood, Fiſher's death, who, being condemned, was executed the 22d of June, a month after his being made cardinal, and ſome days before the hat, ſent him by the pope, came to London [w]. After that, Sir Thomas More, being required to take the ſame oath, refuſed to anſwer, ſaying, "The act of parliament is like a ſword with two edges; for, if a man anſwer one way, it will deſtroy the ſoul, and if he anſwer another, it will deſtroy the body." Upon his refuſal, he was condemned and executed. He was a man of great learning, and excellent parts, but ſo addicted to jeſting, that even the preſence of death could not make him lay aſide his uſual facetiouſneſs [x]. When, upon the point of being executed, he had laid his head on the block to receive the mortal blow, he perceived his beard was got under his chin; whereupon, haſtily riſing up, he bid the executioner ſtay a little, till he had put his beard aſide, ſince, having committed no treaſon, it was not juſt it ſhould be cut off [y].

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, pope Paul III. ſtill kept ſome correſpondence with ſir Gregory Caſſali, who was at Rome, though without character. The pope earneſtly wiſhed that ſome expedient might be found to heal the breach made by Clement VII.'s too great precipitation, and conferred from time to time with Caſſali. But when news came of the execution of the monks, and of Fiſher and More, for denying the king's ſupremacy, he deſpaired of ſucceeding. He perceived there was no more ceremony to be uſed, ſince all regard for him was thrown aſide in England, and a ſettled deſign ſhewn of ſupporting what had been done. So, to maintain the honour of his ſee, he drew up a thundering bull, excommunicating Henry, and abſolving his ſubjects from their oath. Moreover, he ordered all the eccleſiaſtics to depart his dominions, and the nobility to take up arms againſt him. He put the kingdom under an interdict, and forbid all chriſtians to have any commerce with the Engliſh. He annulled all the treaties made by foreign princes with Henry before his marriage with Anne Bullen, declaring their iſſue already born, or to be born, illegitimate. Mean while, as he was ſenſible theſe ſpiritual thunders would produce no great effect, unleſs ſupported with temporal arms, which were not yet ready, he deferred the publiſhing of this bull to a more convenient ſeaſon.

But though the bull was not publiſhed, as no great care was taken to conceal it, it quickly came to Henry's knowledge; whereupon he reſolved to join with the proteſtants of Germany [z], and keep the emperor employed in that country. He diſpatched therefore Edward Fox to the league of Smalcald [a], whilſt Francis I. made uſe for the ſame purpoſe of William du Bellai, lord of Langeais. But it was very difficult for a good and hearty union to be formed between theſe two monarchs and the proteſtants of Germany. The proteſtants meant only to preſerve the liberty of profeſſing their religion unmoleſted, whereas the ſole aim of Francis and Henry was to excite them againſt the emperor, without any regard to the proteſtant religion, which they were perſecuting in their kingdoms. It is true, to gain the proteſtants, they feigned an inclination for their religion, and a deſire to eſtabliſh it in their dominions. Nay, Henry very much improved the conformity of his ſentiments with theirs concerning the papal authority. But the rigour wherewith theſe two monarchs treated ſuch of their ſubjects as had embraced the new religion, deſtroyed whatever their embaſſadors could ſay. For this reaſon the proteſtants always inſiſted upon ſettling the points which concerned religion, and continued to require that Henry ſhould openly declare for the Augſburg confeſſion, that their union might be built on a ſolid foundation. Henry feigned to approve of what they propoſed, and to make them believe it the more, wiſhed them to ſend ſome of their divines to confer with thoſe of England. But he never really intended to conform himſelf to their notions. He rather wanted the Germans, as well as the Engliſh, to learn of him what they were to believe; and for this cauſe the project of the propoſed union was never executed. However, this negotiation made the pope and the emperor very [w] Burnet ſays, the hat came no nearer him than Picardy. He was brought to his trial on the 17th of June. The lord chancellor, the duke of Suffolk, and ſome other lords, together with the judges, ſat upon him by a commiſſion of oyer and terminer. He was beheaded in the 80th year of his age, on Tower-hill, and his head was ſet up on London-bridge. His body was firſt buried in Barking church-yard, and afterwards taken up and interred with More's in the Tower. He was many years confeſſor to the king's grandmother, the counteſs of Richmond. It was believed, that he perſuaded her to found her two colleges in Cambridge, and upon that account was choſen chancellor of that univerſity. Henry VII. gave him the biſhopric of Rocheſter, which he, following the rule of the primitive church, would never change for a better: he uſed to ſay his church was his wife, and he would never part with her becauſe ſhe was poor. Burnet, tom. I. p. 354.

[x] When he was going up the ſtairs of the ſcaffold, obſerving they were weak, he deſired one of the ſheriff's officers to give him his hand to help him up, and ſaid, When I come down again, let me ſhift for myſelf as well as I can. Alſo, when he was firſt committed to the Tower, one of the officers, demanding his upper garment (that is, his gown) for his fee, ſir Thomas, taking off his cap, gave it him, ſaying, that was the uppermoſt garment he had. Hall, fol. 226.

[y] On the 1ſt of July ſir Thomas More was brought to his trial, and beheaded on the 6th, in the 53d year of his age. Though he was afterwards ſuperſtitiouſly devoted to the intereſt and paſſions of the popiſh clergy, and even aſſiſted them in all their cruelties; yet in his youth he had freer thoughts of things, as appears by his Utopia, where he ſeems to borrow the diſguiſe of a romance, only to declare his mind with greater freedom: he tells us, the Utopians allow liberty of conſcience, and force their religion upon no body: that they hinder none from a ſober enquiry into truth, nor uſe any violence upon the account of a different belief. He was, ſays Burnet, no divine at all, neither did he know any thing of antiquity, beyond the quotations in the canon law, and in the maſter of ſentences. Nor was he converſant at all in the critical learning upon the ſcripture; but his peculiar excellency in writing was, that he had a natural eaſy expreſſion, and preſented all the opinions of popery with their fair ſide to the reader, diſguiſing the black ſide of them with neat art; and had upon all occaſions great ſtore of pleaſant tales, which he applied wittily enough. But for juſtice, contempt of money, humility, and a true generoſity of mind, he was an example to the age in which he lived. uneaſy, who plainly ſaw that in attacking Henry there was danger of really engaging him to unite with the league of Smalcald.

But Henry did not depend ſo much upon foreign aſſiſtance as upon his own ſtrength. Mean while, as his ſubjects were daily corrupted by the monks, who inſinuated to them that he was going to overturn all religion, he reſolved to take all poſſible precautions to prevent the pernicious deſigns of theſe dangerous adverſaries. To this end it was moved in the council, whether it would not be proper to ſuppreſs at once all the monaſteries? This queſtion was debated with great warmth, by reaſon of the two contrary parties in the council. Cranmer and Cromwell looked upon the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries as a great ſtep to the reformation. But, on the other hand, the duke of Norfolk, the biſhops of Winchester, Lincoln, and others, who had with reluctance ſubſcribed to what had been done againſt the pope, could not reſolve to conſent to the ſuppreſſion. They ſaw, after that, the kingdom would be irrecoverably loſt to the pope, without reckoning that the diſſolution of the monaſteries might produce yet greater effects with regard to religion. The king, having heard the arguments on both ſides, found he ſhould not be able to ſuppreſs the monaſteries all at once, without giving offence to the greateſt part of his ſubjects. He reſolved therefore with himſelf to accompliſh it by degrees, and to begin with a thing abſolutely neceſſary, namely, to remove the people's prejudice in favour of the monks. To that end, he ordered a general viſitation of the monaſteries, to know perfectly the titles of their eſtates, the behaviour of the friers and nuns, how the rules of each order were obſerved, and other things of the like nature. He did not queſtion this viſitation would diſcover ſeveral conſiderable abuſes, which, being made public, would ſenſibly diminiſh the people's veneration for the religious, and pave the way to his deſign. He was extremely incenſed with the monks, whom he looked upon as diſturbers of his repoſe. On the other hand, the hopes of profiting by their eſtates did not a little contribute, without doubt, towards his puſhing his affair with great earneſtneſs [b]. Thomas Cromwell was choſen to manage the inquiry by the name of viſitor-general. This choice was a plain indication of the king's intent, ſince he employed a perſon who was utterly averſe to the monks. Cromwell, having appointed ſubſtitutes or commiſſioners [c], gave them very particular inſtructions, under eighty-ſix articles, and the viſitation began in October. It may eaſily be judged that, among ſo great a number of monaſteries as were in the kingdom, moſt of which had never been viſited but very negligently, many were found abounding with irregularities, as well in reſpect of the lives of the friers and nuns, as in regard to the obſervance of the rule, and the management of the temporalities. The viſitors, who were not their friends, and doubtleſs had orders to terrify them, told them, they were going to be expoſed to the king's utmoſt ſeverity, and the rigour of the law. Then they ſuggeſted to them, that to ſave themſelves harmleſs, and withal to hide their diſorders, the beſt way was to reſign their houſes to the king [d], who upon that conſideration would take care to provide for each in particular. A good number of priors being terrified by the viſitors, choſe to follow their advice, their monks agreeing to it; ſome to avoid puniſhment, others to enjoy their liberty, and ſome for want of reſolution to reſiſt [e]. The reports of the commiſſioners were publiſhed, that all might be ſatisfied the king had not without reaſon and neceſſity ordered this general viſitation. The truth is, in ſome monaſteries were diſcovered monſtrous diſorders and horrible crimes, not only with reſpect to the debaucheries of the friers and nuns, but chiefly on the account of the images and relics, for which a ſhameful trade was driven to enrich the monaſteries by cheriſhing the people's ſuperſtition [f]. This occaſioned an ordinance of the king, who, as ſupreme head of the church of England, diſcharged from their vows ſuch as were profeſſedly under four and twenty years of age, and allowed all the reſt to quit their houſes, and live like ſeculars if they pleaſed [g]. But as moſt were accuſtomed to an idle life, and perceived when they forſook their monaſteries they ſhould be forced to work for their livelihood, the liberty given them by the king produced no great effect. Beſides, there were doubtleſs many, who, out of conſcience, thought not proper to uſe it. So Henry was obliged to take other meaſures.

It was but this year that cardinal Campegio loſt the biſhipric of Saliſbury, which was given to Nicolas Shaxton, a friend to the reformers. Shortly after, the ſee of Worceſter was taken from Ghinucci an Italian, and conferred on Hugh Latimer, great friend of Cranmer. John Hilſey was promoted to the ſee of Rocheſter, vacant by the death of Fiſher, and Edward Fox to that of Hereford.

Among all the king's enemies, or enviers, none gave him more uneaſineſs than his nephew the king of Scotland, and not without reaſon. During the whole time of that prince's minority, Henry had fomented the troubles of Scotland, and even ſhewn that his deſigns tended to become maſter of that kingdom. James was fully informed, and though he ſhewed great regard for the king his uncle, he let him ſee however he did not conſider him as a friend. Henry therefore was in danger, that if the innovations in religion cauſed diſturbances in the kingdom, the king of Scotland would take occaſion to be revenged, by aſſiſting the malcontents. This fear was the more juſt, as the emperor, knowing the king of Scotland's diſpoſition, had already laboured to inſpire him with ſuſpicions and jealouſies of France and England. Nay, he would have concluded a league with him, as I obſerved, had not Francis broken his meaſures by procuring a peace between England and Scotland. But notwithſtanding the peace, Henry was always in diſtruſt of that quarter. So, to make himſelf eaſy, he formed the project to inſtil into the king of Scotland the reſolution to follow his example, and renounce the pope's obedience. He conſidered this as a ſure means to preſerve between the two kingdoms a ſtrict union, which would be very advantageous in his preſent circumſtances. He ſent him therefore in the firſt place a long letter [h], declaring the reaſons of his conduct with regard to the pope. Then he diſpatched an embaſſador [i] to propoſe an interview, fancying that a conference with him would produce a greater effect than whatever he ſhould ſay to him by letter or embaſſy. But though the reformation had already crept into Scotland, James had no inclination to embrace it. So the eccleſiaſtics about his perſon eaſily diſſwaded him from accepting the interview, where they were afraid ſome things might paſs very prejudicial to their religion. Mean while, James, not being willing openly to refuſe the conference deſired by the king his uncle, gave him hopes of his conſent, after certain difficulties, purpoſely raiſed, were removed. But at the ſame time he demanded of the pope a brief, to forbid his having any interview with the king of England. When the brief came, he gave the king his uncle notice of it, who having prepared for his journey, was extremely offended at this refuſal. Hence ſprung a quarrel between them, which I ſhall have occaſion to mention hereafter.

Before I conclude the year 1535, I muſt not forget to relate an event which very much changed the face of the affairs of Europe. I mean the death of Franceſco Sforza, duke of Milan, which happened in the month of October. As that prince left no iſſue by Catherine of Denmark, the emperor's niece, whom he had lately married, the duchy of Milan, as a [e] The firſt ſurrender was by the abbot of Langden in Kent, on November 13. (Rymer, tom. XIV. p. 555) who, upon doctor Leighton's breaking open his door on a ſudden, was found in bed with a whore, who went in the habit of a lay brother. This ſurrender was followed by that of the priory of Folkſton, November 15; on the 16th, of that of Dover; and on February 21, 1536, of that of Bilſingtoun; all three in Kent. [f] They found great factions in the houſes, and barbarous cruelties exerciſed by one faction againſt another, as either of them prevailed. They were all extremely addicted to idolatry and ſuperſtition. In ſome they found inſtruments and other tools for multiplying and coining. But for the lewdneſs of the confeſſors of nunneries, and the great corruption of that ſtate, whole houſes being found almoſt all with child; for the diſſoluteneſs of abbots and the other monks and friers, not only with harlots, but married women; and for their unnatural luſts, and other brutiſh practices: theſe, ſays Burnet, are not fit to be ſpoken of, much leſs enlarged on in a work of this nature. The full report of this viſitation is loſt; yet Burnet ſaw an extract of a part of it concerning one hundred and forty-four houſes, that contains abominations in it equal to any that were in Sodom. Burnet, tom. I. p. 191.

This

fief of the empire, was fallen to the emperor to be diſpoſed of as he pleaſed. So the fears and jealouſies of the pope, the king of France, and the Venetians, were revived on this occaſion; each of theſe powers having cauſe to fear the emperor would keep Milan for himſelf, or give it to his brother the king of the Romans. In that caſe Italy would of courſe fall again into ſlavery, and the king of France loſe his hopes of recovering that duchy. To make them eaſy, the emperor declared he had no deſign to keep Milan, but intended to preſent ſome prince with it, who ſhould cauſe no ſuſpicion to thoſe that were concerned to preſerve the peace of Italy. Afterwards, he wiſely made uſe of it for a lure to amuſe the king of France. But in reality he never deſired to diſpoſſeſs himſelf of it [k].

[1536] Queen Catherine ended her days the beginning of the year 1536 [l]. Though her virtue had gained her an univerſal eſteem, ſhe died however little lamented by the public, becauſe ſhe equally embarraſed her friends and enemies. Before ſhe expired, ſhe dictated a very tender letter to the king, who ſeemed to be extremely moved with it [m]. But in appearance his grief was of no long continuance. He was very fond of her when firſt married; her mildneſs and modeſty having a greater influence upon him than ſhe could expect from her beauty, which was not extraordinary. In time his affection abating, he treated her with indifference, though always with much civility. At laſt, after he had reſolved to put her away, her obſtinate refuſal to comply with his will made him conſider her as an enemy. Accordingly he uſed her rigorouſly when the ſentence of divorce was pronounced, even to the not ſuffering her to keep ſervants who treated her as a queen. At laſt he publicly forbid to give her that title, though he was forced to connive at her diſobedience.

The parliament meeting the 4th of February, finiſhed the work begun, by aboliſhing every thing relating to the pope's power, not to leave the leaſt pretence to acknowledge his authority. But the king had a farther view, namely, to ſuppreſs the monaſteries, as well to be revenged of the monks and prevent their ill deſigns, as to procure their eſtates. In all appearance, the late viſitation of the monaſteries had convinced him that the monks were as unſerviceable to religion, as prejudicial to his affairs in his preſent circumſtances.

As among the conſtitutions obſerved in the church of England, there were not a few that had a manifeſt relation to the papal authority, it was abſolutely neceſſary to annul them, and make others, which ſhould have for foundation the king's ſupremacy. The parliament had already paſſed an act, empowering the king to nominate thirty-two commiſſioners to examine ſuch as were to be aboliſhed. But the king had not haſtened the nomination, becauſe, by this confuſion, his authority was much more extenſive. Indeed, the papal power was aboliſhed by act of parliament, and yet it ſtill ſubſiſted in the conſtitutions, which, not being abrogated, threw the clergy into great perplexities, becauſe they knew not what to do. But this was what the king deſired, that the clergy might be more at his devotion, ſince he could equally proſecute them as guilty, whether they did or did not obſerve them. The parliament, taking this contrariety into conſideration, would have cured it, by confirming the power formerly given the king to appoint commiſſioners to alter theſe conſtitutions. This was a ſort of reproach for his negligence in that reſpect. But he feigned not to mind it, and left the affair in the ſame ſtate it was [n].

He had another thing in his thoughts which affected him much more, namely, to execute his deſign upon the monks. In this ſeſſion, he repreſented to the parliament, that the great number of monaſteries in the kingdom were a burden to the ſtate, and earneſtly deſired them to remedy the evil by ſuch means as they ſhould judge proper. Whereupon it was enacted, that all houſes of two hundred pounds a year and under ſhould be ſuppreſſed, and their effects given to the king [o]. Of this ſort there were three hundred ſeventy-ſix, and a revenue of thirty-two thouſand pounds a year fell to the crown, with above a hundred thouſand pounds worth of plate, goods, ornaments of the churches, and the like. A new court was erected, called the court of the augmentation of the king's revenue, which was to take cognizance of all matters concerning this new acquiſition [p]. The erecting of a court for ſo ſmall an income was a clear evidence the king had no deſign to ſtop there, but intended to ſeize the revenue of all the monaſteries in the kingdom [q].

The convocation ſitting, as uſual, at the ſame time with the parliament, a motion was made there, that there ſhould be a tranſlation of the bible in Engliſh, to be ſet up in all churches, and the ſame was approved of. It muſt be obſerved, the king's intent was only to ſhew the people there was nothing contrary to the holy ſcriptures in what was done againſt the pope. But Cranmer, Cromwell, and the reſt of the reformers, had much farther views. They hoped, when the bible was in the hands of the people, they would ſee their error in many other things which hitherto had been deemed eſſential to religion. But they took care to hide their deſigns from the king, knowing how contrary they were to his. Henry was abſolutely againſt all reformation of doctrine, and conſequently they were to bring him inſenſibly and by degrees to what they deſired. They partly ſucceeded, but they fell extremely ſhort of what they had expected at firſt. However, they thought it very conſiderable to obtain his conſent that it ſhould be moved in the convocation, to give the people the bible in Engliſh, and to have cauſed the motion to be approved. As there was then no other Engliſh verſion of the bible but Tindal's, made at Antwerp without the public authority, the convocation petitioned the king for a good tranſlation, which he was pleaſed to take upon himſelf [r].

Henry having obtained of the parliament all he deſired, thought it time to diſſolve it, which he did the 14th of April, after having continued it ſix years. Never had parliament laſted ſo long ſince the beginning of the monarchy.

The care Henry took to ſecure himſelf from the cabals of the monks and his other domeſtic enemies, did not prevent him from thinking of his foreign affairs, and of means to avoid the emperor's attacks. Francis was invading Savoy, and it was but too manifeſt that his intent was to open a paſſage into the Milaneſe. But as this was a great undertaking, conſidering the ſituation of France, the emperor could not believe he had engaged in it without being firſt ſure of Henry's aſſiſtance. Wherefore he reſolved to uſe his utmoſt

In her will, ſhe appointed her body to be buried in a convent of Obſervants, who had done and ſuffered moſt for her; but the king ordered it to be laid in the abbey-church of Peterborough, which he afterwards converted to a cathedral. She adviſed him to look to the health of his ſoul. She forgave him all the troubles he had caſt her into. Sherecommended their daughter Mary to him, deſiring he would be a loving father to her. She alſo deſired he would provide matches for her maids, who were but three; and that he would give her ſervants one year's wages more than was due to them." She was a devout and pious princeſs, and led a ſevere life. In her greatneſs ſhe wrought much with her own hand, and kept her women well employed about her, as appeared when the two legates came once to ſpeak with her, ſhe came out to them with a ſkein of of ſilk about her neck, and told them ſhe had been within at work with her maids. Few ſuch queens now-days! Burnet, tom. I. p. 192.

[n] About this time, king Henry appointed an office for all eccleſiaſtical matters, and ordered a ſeal to be cut. The archbiſhop of Canterbury's title was alſo in convocation ordered to be altered: inſtead of legate of the apoſtolic ſee, he was to be called, metropolitan and primate. Burnet, tom. III. p. 104.

[o] A commiſſion was alſo directed, on June 16, 1535, to the biſhops of Meath and Kildare; to John Allen, maſter of the rolls; Gerard Ailmer, chief baron of the exchequer, and ſome others; impowering them to ſuppreſs the monaſteries in Ireland. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XIV. p. 551.

[q] What remarkable ſtatutes were enacted during this ſeſſion, are as follow: 1. Whereas pirates uſed to be tried after the courſe of the civil laws, it was ordered that they ſhould be tried in ſuch places as ſhould be directed by the king's commiſſion, and by juries, as offenders at land. 2. That every perſon who hath a park ſhall keep two mares, thirteen hands high, for breeding foals. 3. That clerks, preſented to benefices, ſhall not pay tenths the firſt year in which they pay their firſt fruits. 4. That tithes, offerings, and other duties, ſhall be paid according to the eccleſiaſtical laws and ordinances of the church of England, and after the laudable uſes and cuſtoms of each pariſh. 5. That all bargains and ſales of lands ſhall be made by writing, indented, ſealed, and inrolled, in one of the king's courts of record at Weſtminſter, or before the cuſtos rotulorum, two juſtices, and a clerk of the peace, of the county where the lands lie. See Statut. 27 Hen.

[r] It is not known to whom that work was committed, or how they proceeded in it; for the account of theſe things has not been preſerved, nor conveyed to us with that care that the importance of the thing required. Yet it appears that the work was carried on at a good rate; for, three years after this, it was printed at Paris, which ſhews they made all convenient haſte in a thing that required ſo much deliberation. endeavours to break their union. From the death of Sforza, he had continued a private negotiation with Francis to reſign the duchy of Milan to one of his ſons, and acted ſo artfully that the treaty ſeemed to be very near a concluſion. This could not but inſpire Henry with jealouſy. He plainly ſaw if the negotiation ended to the king of France's ſatisfaction, he would be regardleſs of his intereſts. On the other hand, the emperor no ſooner heard of the death of his aunt queen Catherine, but he ſent and offered Henry to renew their alliance, with a mutual oblivion of all that was paſſed. But leſt he ſhould be taken at his word, he required three conditions, which left him the liberty to prolong the affair as much as he pleaſed, his aim being only to ſow diviſion between Francis and Henry by making them ſuſpicious of each other. The firſt of theſe conditions was, that Henry ſhould be reconciled to the pope, to which end he offered his mediation. By the ſecond, he demanded a powerful aſſiſtance againſt the Turks. By the third, that purſuant to their treaty in 1518, he ſhould join with him in the defence of Milan againſt the attacks of the French king. Henry replied, that what had been done againſt the pope could not be revoked; that as ſoon as Chriſtendom ſhould be in peace, he would act againſt the infidels, as became a chriſtian prince: that he was ready to renew his alliance with the emperor, provided it was done without prejudice to the king of France his ally, that being friend to both, he might be the better enabled to labour the reconciliation, or if he could not ſucceed, to aſſiſt him that ſhould be unjuſtly attacked: that as to the reſt, he refuſed not to agree with the emperor, provided he would own the rupture came from him. The emperor perceiving Henry was upon his guard, thought not fit to puſh the affair any farther. Indeed Henry could eaſily ſee his aim was to ſet him at variance with France, ſince at the very time theſe things paſſed, Francis imparted to him the private negotiation concerning the duchy of Milan. Moreover he warned him, that the emperor intended to force him to return to the pope's obedience, and it was only upon that condition he offered to reſign the Milaneſe.

All theſe proceedings of the emperor convincing Henry that he ſought occaſion to attack him, he reſolved to purſue his negotiation with the proteſtants of Germany, to make him a diverſion in that country which ſhould break his meaſures with regard to England. To the ſame end, he had ſent Edward Fox to them laſt year. But they would not be his dupes; not imagining, as he would fain have made them believe, that he was inclined to their faith, whilſt he ordered their brethren to be burnt in England. So, not to be engaged by faint hopes to be ſubſervient to his deſigns at their expence, they delivered to his embaſſador the terms on which they were willing to be ſtrictly united with him. The terms were, that he ſhould embrace the Augſburg confeſſion; and defend it with all his power in a free council: that he ſhould approve of no place for holding the council without their conſent: that if the pope called a council at his own pleaſure, Henry ſhould join with them in proteſting againſt it: that he ſhould accept the title of protector of the league: that he ſhould never return to the pope's obedience: that he ſhould not aſſiſt their enemies: that he ſhould find a hundred thouſand crowns for the occaſions of the league, and two hundred thouſand if the war laſted any time. Adding, that when he ſhould have declared himſelf upon theſe articles, they would ſend embaſſadors and agree with him upon the reſt.

Theſe propoſals threw Henry into ſome perplexity. He ſaw the ſole aim of the proteſtants was to ſupport their religion, and that, however, was the thing which diſturbed him the leaſt. He was by no means ſatisfied with the Augſburg confeſſion, and yet he perceived, in caſe he openly rejected it, there was no likelihood of his being able to join with the league of Smalcald. On the other hand, it was his intereſt to continue the negotiation, as well becauſe the proteſtants might be ſerviceable to him, as to keep the emperor in awe by that conſideration. So his intereſt required that he ſhould favourably hear theſe propoſitions. But withal he reſolved to inſert in his anſwer ſomething which ſhould afford him occaſion to break, if he thought proper. He replied, therefore, that he was willing to furniſh the ſums required, in caſe a league, of which he would treat with their embaſſadors, ſhould be concluded between him and the proteſtants; that though he was ſenſible to what the title of protector of the league would expoſe him, he was content to accept it, provided there were between him and them a conformity of doctrine, otherwiſe he could not engage to defend a faith, of whoſe truth he was not convinced; that therefore he deſired them to ſend commiſſioners, with powers to mitigate ſome articles of the Augſburg confeſſion, which he could not approve. Moreover, as to the ſupplies, he required that the engagement ſhould be mutual, whether he or they were attacked. In fine, he demanded an authentic approbation of his divorce, and their promiſe to juſtify it in a council. Theſe propoſals on both ſides were of a nature to keep a treaty long on foot. But though the members of the league of Smalcald ſaw no great likelihood of a ſtrict union, they appointed, however, Sturmius, Draco, Bucer, and Melancthon, to go and confer with Henry and his divines. It was eſpecially provided in their inſtructions, that nothing ſhould be concluded to the prejudice of the emperor or empire. This negotiation was interrupted by the death of Anne Bullen, which happened ſhortly after, and which very much altered the face of affairs, as well as the king's mind, in reſpect to the reformation, which ſhe openly countenanced.

The king was poſſeſſed at once with two paſſions: a violent love for Jane Seymour, maid of honour to the queen[s], and an extreme jealouſy of his wife[t]. Very likely his jealouſy was a conſequence of his love. When Anne Bullen's enemies found ſhe no longer held in the king's heart the place ſhe had formerly enjoyed, inſtead of fearing to accuſe her of unfaithfulneſs to the king, they believed it would be grateful to him, who began to be himſelf unfaithful. It is certain the king had loſt that affection for the queen which made him ſurmount ſo many obſtacles to poſſeſs her. Whether enjoyment had quenced this firſt flame, or the queen's indiſcretions given the king cauſe to ſuſpect her, he ſo gave himſelf over to jealouſy, that it was not in his power to overcome it, or perhaps did not much endeavour it. However, the occaſion was this: The queen had a great friendſhip for her brother, the lord Rochford, but could not endure his wife, who lived very ill with her huſband, and had an infamous character, as will evidently appear hereafter. It was this lady that whiſpered in the king's ear the firſt report that the queen was unfaithful, and had a criminal commerce with her brother, the lord Rochford. Theſe ſeeds fell upon a ſoil already prepared to receive them. The king, now prejudiced by his paſſions for Jane Seymour, was overjoyed to find, in the pretended unfaithfulneſs of the queen, a means to procure the poſſeſſion of the perſon he loved. As ſoon as queen Anne's enemies ſaw how the king ſtood affected towards her, they took care to ruin her quite in his favour, by accuſing her of ſundry intrigues with their own domeſtics. Theſe enemies were the ſame with thoſe of the reformation. They imagined ſhe had put the king upon all his proceedings againſt the pope, on purpoſe to favour the new religion; but, though ſhe had not done this, it was ſufficient to hate her that ſhe had been the cauſe of inſpiring the king with love, ſince that had occaſioned Catherine's divorce, and conſequently all the innovations in religion. Policy might likewiſe enter into their project. They were ſenſible, ſo long as Anne lived, ſhe would be an invincible obſtacle to a reconciliation with Rome; whereas, if ſhe were dead, they hoped all difficulties would be eaſily removed. The duke of Norfolk inwardly burned with a deſire to ſee religion again eſtabliſhed upon the ſame foot it was before theſe alterations; though, like a good courtier, he took care not to diſcover it to his maſter. His quality, zeal, and credit, made him head of the party of the old religion, and, as he had the king's ear, he could eaſily do ill offices to the contrary party. The king's jealouſy of the queen was too favourable an occaſion to be neglected, ſince he could at once ſerve his party, and make his court to his maſter. So it is commonly believed this lord contributed the moſt to the queen's ruin; becauſe, among all her enemies, he had moſt acceſs to the king. But, however, whether it was he or another, the king was inſpired with a jealouſy which threw him into a ſort of fury. This is not very ſtrange, conſidering his temper, the moſt impetuous and moſt impatient that ever was. The queen was accuſed of a criminal commerce, not only with the lord Rochford, her brother, but alſo with Henry Norris, groom of the ſtole, Francis Weſtern, and William Brereton, of the king's privy chamber, and Mark Smeton, a muſician. It muſt be confeſſed, the queen had ſome indiſcreet ways, which the king never minded, whilſt he was not prejudiced againſt her, but which afterwards were too capable of confirming his ſuſpicions [u]. Beſides, as ſoon as he hearkened to what was ſaid againſt her, probably, her enemies were very diligent to give an ill turn to her moſt innocent words or actions. Without doubt Henry was ſome time tormented with jealouſy before he diſcovered it, but at laſt it broke out at a ſolemn juſts held at Greenwich [w], from whence he ſuddenly withdrew with ſigns of great anger, the cauſe whereof could not be gueſſed. It is likely he had obſerved ſomething that confirmed his ſuſpicions, of which none but himſelf took notice. Sanders ſays, the queen dropping her handkerchief, one of her gallants took it up and wiped his face with it. But this author is the only perſon that relates that circumſtance [x]. However, the king was no ſooner gone from the juſts, but he ordered the lord Rochford, Norris, Weſton, Brereton and Smeton to be arreſted. At the ſame time the queen was confined to her chamber, and the next day conveyed to the Tower [y]. But what plainly ſhewed the deſign of her enemies to deſtroy her, was their procuring an order for the archbiſhop of Canterbury to retire to his palace at Lambeth, for fear, if he could ſpeak with the king, he would find occaſion to vindicate the queen.

It is not ſurpriſing this princeſs in her ſad condition ſhould be diſordered, and having none to adviſe with ſhould be inſnared by her enemies. Her uncle's lady, the lady Bullen, was appointed to lie in her chamber, with whom ſhe was at great variance; and from this lady, who was placed there to watch her, it came to be known, that during her confinement, ſhe ſaid ſome things which helped to confirm the king's ſuſpicions. However, upon her examination, ſhe poſitively denied, ſhe had ever been falſe to the king. Only when ſhe was told that Norris, Weſton, Brereton, and Smeton had accuſed her, though ſhe might have eaſily ſeen it was purely to draw from her ſome confeſſion, ſhe believed ſhe ought not to conceal certain things which had paſſed between her and them. She ſaid concerning Norris, that aſking him one day why he did not go on with his marriage, he replied, there was no haſte. Whereupon ſhe ſaid, ſhe plainly ſaw he was in hopes of having her, in caſe the king died. This ſeems to argue there was ſome familiarity between her and Norris. Otherwiſe, ſuppoſing the truth of the fact, it is hard to conceive that a queen ſhould think of talking thus to one of her domeſtics.

As for Smeton the muſician, ſhe ſaid, he was never in her chamber but twice. That the laſt time ſhe ſaw him there, ſhe aſked him why he was ſo ſad; and that, in her converſation with him, he had the boldneſs to tell her, No, no, madam, a look ſuffices me [z].

As for Weſton, ſhe owned he had taken the liberty to tell her, he loved her, and that ſhe thereupon defied him [a].

But after all, the queſtion is to know, whether the regiſters from whence this examination is taken are true, or whether the examination was impartially written. Indeed, this doubt alone is not ſufficient to clear the queen. But then, when it is conſidered, ſhe had for adverſary a huſband, who was king, and jealous even to madneſs, very likely they who were employed to examine her, gave her words ſuch a turn and ſenſe as favoured the king's deſigns, by pretending to ſet down the ſubſtance of her anſwer inſtead of her very words.

As for the lord Rochford, all the evidence for his pretended familiarity with the queen his ſiſter, amounted to no more than that he was once ſeen leaning on her bed.

When theſe men were examined, Norris ſwore he believed the queen innocent, and perſiſted in his aſſeveration to his laſt breath. Smeton confeſſed he had known the queen carnally three times; but he was never confronted with her; nay, he was condemned before ſhe was brought to her trial, that he might not be a witneſs. This makes very much for the queen, ſince it is not likely ſuch an evidence would have been voluntarily neglected, had it been deemed as good as it appears to be. But probably it was feared that Smeton would retract, or the queen confound him, if brought face to face with her. The reſt pleaded not guilty; but however were condemed and executed [b].

Three days after, the queen, and the lord Rochford her brother, were tried by their peers [c], the duke of Norfolk being lord high ſteward for that occaſion [d]. The queen was accuſed of proſtituting herſelf to her brother, and four other men, and conſpiring the king's death. But this laſt charge being without any foundation, it was not thought proper to inſiſt upon it. The queen and the lord Rochford pleaded not guilty, and yet were condemned, without its being ever known upon what evidence the ſentence was grounded. Judgment was given, that the lord Rochford ſhould be beheaded and quartered. As for the queen, ſhe was condemned to be burnt or beheaded at the king's pleaſure.

Very probably the king believed the queen guilty, and, under his preſent prejudice, ſigns and tokens were to him as good proofs. But can the ſame thing be ſaid of the peers who condemned her? Did their conſcience ſuffer them to condemn a queen to death upon bare ſurmiſes? I ſay ſurmiſes; ſince, had there been ſolid proofs, they would very likely have been publiſhed, in order to juſtify a ſentence of this nature, which was unprecedented in England. Such reſerve was not afterwards uſed with reſpect to another of Henry's queens, who was really guilty of the like crime. All that can be ſaid in favour of thoſe who paſſed ſentence on Anne Bullen is, that their dread of turning againſt themſelves the king's fury, if they complied not with his humour, made them conſider ſigns as real proofs. It is obſervable, there were but twenty-ſix peers preſent at the trial, though there were then fifty-three in England, as appears by the ſummons to parliament, directed to them ſhortly after. This gives occaſion to conjecture, that, according to the method introduced by cardinal Wolſey, in the condemnation of the duke of Buckingham, care was taken to remove thoſe who were ſuſpected not to have ſo much complaiſance as to gratify the king's paſſion at the expence of their conſcience, [u] She was, ſays Burnet, of a very cheerful temper, which was not always limited with the bounds of exact decency and diſcretion. She had rallied ſome of the king's ſervants more than became her. Tom. I. p. 197.

[x] Burnet, who was at more than ordinary pains to learn all he could concerning this affair, obſerves, that this circumſtance is not in Spelman, a judge at that time, who wrote an account of the matter with his own hand, in his common place book, of which Burnet had a ſight. Spelman ſays, the buſineſs was diſcovered in a very different manner. As for the evidence (ſays he) of this matter, it was diſcovered by the lady Wingfield, who had been a ſervant to the queen, and becoming on a ſudden infirm ſome time before her death, did ſwear this matter to one of her ———. And here unluckliy the reſt of the page is torn off. By this it ſeems there was no legal evidence againſt the queen, and that it was a witneſs at ſecond hand who depoſed what they heard the lady Wingfield ſwear. Who this perſon was we know not, nor in what temper of mind the lady Wingfield might be when ſhe ſwore. And this it ſeems was that which was brought to the king at Greenwich during the juſts, who did thereupon immediately return to Whitehall. Burnet, tom. I. 191.

[y] Sir Thomas Audley lord chancellor, the duke of Norfolk, Thomas Cromwell the ſecretary, and ſir William Kingſton conſtable of the Tower, who were ſent to apprehend her, letting her know what crime ſhe was charged with, ſhe cried out, that ſhe was wronged, and deſired to ſee the king before ſhe was conveyed to the Tower, but in vain. When ſhe was brought to the Tower, ſhe fell on her knees before the ſame lords, beſeeching God to help her, as ſhe was not guilty of that whereof ſhe was accuſed, and deſired thoſe lords to beſeech the king's grace to be good unto her. Stow, p. 572. Herbert, p. 194.

[z] She ſaid, "Smeton was never in her chamber but when the king was laſt at Wincheſter; and then he came to play the virginals: ſhe ſaid, ſhe never ſpoke to him after that, but on Saturday before May-day, when ſhe ſaw him ſtanding in the window; and then ſhe aſked him, why he was ſo ſad? he ſaid, It was no matter. She anſwered, You muſt not expect I ſhould ſpeak to you as if you were a nobleman, ſince you are an inferior perſon. No, no, madam, ſaid he, a look ſuffices me." Burnet, tom. I. p. 199.

[a] She ſeemed more apprehenſive of Weſton than of any body. For on Whitſun-monday laſt he ſaid to her, "That Norris came more to her chamber upon her account, than for any body elſe that was there. She had obſerved that he loved a kinſwoman of hers, and challenged him for it, and for not loving his wife. But he anſwered her, that there were women in the houſe whom he loved better than them both: ſhe aſked, who is that? Your ſelf, ſaid he; upon which ſhe ſaid, ſhe defied him." Ibid.

[b] Their trial came on the 12th of May, on which day they were tried by a commiſſion of oyer and terminer in Weſtminſter-hall. They were twice indicted, and the indictments were found by two grand juries in the counties of Kent and Middleſex; the crimes they were charged with being ſaid to be done in both counties. All proteſted their innocence, only Smeton confeſſed, he had well deſerved to die, which gave occaſion to many reflections. They were all beheaded but Smeton, who was hanged. It was generally ſaid, he was bribed into that confeſſion, and had his life promiſed; but it was not fit to let him live to tell tales. Norris had been much in the king's favour, who ſent for him, and offered him his life if he would confeſs his guilt. He generouſly rejected the offer, affirming, that in his conſcience he thought the queen innocent, and that he would die a thouſand times rather than ruin an innocent perſon. Burnet, vol. I. p. 201. vol. III. p. 100.

[d] With him ſat the duke of Suffolk, the marquis of Exeter, and the earls of Arundel, Oxford, Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, Derby, Worceſter, Rutland, Suſſex, and Huntingdon; the lords Audley, Delaware, Montague, Morley, Dacres, Cobham, Maltravers, Powis, Monteagle, Clenton, Sands, Windſor, Wentworth, Burgh, and Mordant. The charge ran, That ſhe had procured her brother and the other four to lye with her, which they had often done; that ſhe had ſaid to them, that the king never had her heart; and had ſaid to every one of them by themſelves, that ſhe loved them better than any perſon whatever, which was to the ſlander of the iſſue that was between the king and her. And this was treaſon according to the ſtatute made in the 26th year of this reign (ſo that the law made for her and her iſſue is now made uſe of to deſtroy her.) It was added in the indictment, that ſhe and her accomplices had conſpired the king's death; but this it ſeems was only put in to ſwell the charge. Burnet, vol. I. p. 202, 363.

Henry 8th

As for Dr. Burnet's saying, in his history, that Anne Bullen's father was among her judges, it is known he retracted it afterwards.

Death of Anna Bullen

The sentence was executed the 19th of May. Anne suffered death with great constancy, after a short speech to those that were present, wherein she neither confessed nor denied the crime for which she was condemned. She contented herself with acknowledging her obligations to the king, with praying for him, and desiring the prayers of the people for herself [e]. It is generally believed, her fear of drawing the king's anger on her daughter Elizabeth, prevented her from insisting upon her own innocence [f]. As she knew the king's temper perfectly, and could not vindicate herself without charging him with injustice, she was afraid Elizabeth would become the sacrifice of the king her father's resentment. However, this was the tragical end of Anne Bullen, whom some have vehemently defamed, and whose conduct others have studiously justified, without any possibility yet of knowing for certain whether she was guilty or innocent. The enemies to her daughter Elizabeth and the reformation have blackened her reputation as much as possible, imagining thereby to give a mortal wound to the protestant religion. For a contrary reason, the protestants have forgot nothing that could help to give of her a quite different idea. But both have reasoned upon a false principle, since the goodness of a religion depends not upon the life and conversation of the professors. For my part, if I may speak my opinion, I can never believe the peers, her judges, had sufficient evidence to condemn her as guilty of defiling the king's bed. However, it cannot be denied that, by some familiarities unbecoming a queen, she gave too great an advantage over her. As she was young and handsome, without doubt she was not displeased to see the effect of her beauty upon all sorts of people, imagining that the love she inspired greatly heightened her merit. We see too many ladies liable to this infirmity. Be this as it will, it is certain, the spirit of party has not a little contributed to the diversity of opinions concerning the queen. Had she not countenanced the reformation, she would have undoubtedly fewer accusers among the catholics, and had she led the king to prosecute the reformed, not many of these would undertake her vindication. This is the way of the world. People are innocent or guilty according to the party they are of. Besides this general cause, a particular reason may also be found in the carriage of Anne Bullen. She was of a very gay temper, which had charmed the king, but which, after some years of enjoyment, served only to raise his jealousy. On the other hand, it cannot be denied she had very good qualities, and particularly great charity to the poor, to whom a few days before her disgrace she had given two thousand pounds [g]. A circumstance in the story of her death shews likewise she had a very tender conscience. After she was condemned, she fell upon her knees to the lady Bullen her sister-in-law [h], and conjured her, for God's sake, to tell the princess Mary, she begged her pardon for her ill usage of her. This charity, and this tenderness of conscience, would little become a woman who had held a shameful and criminal commerce with four men and her own brother. But they would be very consistent with great indiscretion and a little coquetry.

Though the king had procured the queen's condemnation, he was not satisfied. He was pleased to give her before she died a fresh cause of mortification, by annulling their marriage. To this end, he caused her to be so wrought on, that at last she confessed a contract between her and the lord Percy, now earl of Northmberland, though that lord protested, upon his salvation, there never was any formal promise of marriage between them. It was believed this confession was drawn from her, by an intimation, that the king would on no other condition be prevailed with to mitigate that cruel part of her sentence of being burnt, into the milder part of being beheaded. However, upon this confession, the archbishop of Canterbury was forced to pass a sentence of divorce between the king and her [i], and declare their daughter Elizabeth illigitimate. What is most strange in the king's proceedings is, the artifice he used in causing the queen to be condemned before her marriage was nulled. Had the sentence of divorce been passed before the trial, she could not have been condemned for adultery, since her marriage with the king must have been considered only as a concubinage. But Henry had acquired such an absolute sway over his subjects, that his will was the sole measure of justice and law. Nay, he so little regarded the public and his own reputation, that he married Jane Seymour the next day after Anne Bullen's death, wherein he expressed a passion which served greatly to justify the deceased queen.

The death of Anne Bullen revived the hopes of Mary, the king's daughter, by his first wife Catherine. Her attachment to the queen, her mother, and her obstinate refusal to submit to the late acts of parliament, had quite thrown her out of the king's favour, who could not bear contradiction. But the late event causing the friends of Rome to imagine the king might be reconciled to the pope, they advised Mary to accommodate herself to the times, for fear of losing the fruit this change might produce. As there was nothing now that obstructed the union of the king with the emperor, it was hoped the act, which declared her illegitimate, might be repealed, provided she made her submission to the king her father. To this end, she resolved to write a very humble and respectful letter to the king, protesting for the future she would have no other sentiments but his. But Henry, not satisfied with a submission expressed in such general terms, insisted, before he restored her to favour, upon her signing certain articles which she had hitherto rejected: namely, the supremacy, the renunciation of the bishop of Rome, and the unlawfulness of her mother's marriage. Mary tried all possible means to be excused. But at length, finding the king remained inflexible, she signed them, though contrary to her opinion, in hopes that the ill she committed, in acting against her conscience, might be productive of much good [k]. As for the princess Elizabeth, then about three years old, she was divested of the title of princess of Wales, which she had enjoyed from her birth. However, the king still continued to educate her at court, with all the care and tenderness of a father.

A new parliament meeting the 8th of June [l], an act was passed to settle the succession; that made after their marriage being void by the sentence of divorce between the king and Anne Bullen. By the new act the other was repealed, and the issue of the king's two first marriages declared illegitimate, and disabled from ever inheriting the crown. Moreover the act confirmed Anne Bullen's sentence, as being grounded upon very just causes [m], and settled the crown after the king's [e] Her carriage the day she died, will best appear from the following original letter of sir William Kingston, constable of the Tower, to Cromwell.

SIR,

"This shall be to advertise you, that I have received your letter, wherein you would have strangers conveyed out of the Tower; and so they be, by the means of Richard Gresham, and William Loke, and Whitepole. But the number of strangers past not thirty, and not many othe [other] and the embassador of the emperor had a servant there, and honestly put out: sir, if we have not an hour certain, as it may be known in London, I think there will be but few, and I think a reasonable number were best, for I suppose she will declare herself to be a good woman for all men but for the king, at the hour of her death. For this morning she sent for me, that I might be with her at such a time as she received the good lord, to the intent I should hear her speak as touching her innocency always to be clear. And in the writing of this she sent for me, and at my coming she said: Mr. Kingston, I hear I shall not die afore noon, and I am very sorry therefore, for I thought to be dead by this time, and past my pain. I told her it should be no pain, it was so little. And then she said, I heard say the executioner was very good, and I have a little neck, and put her hands about it, laughing heartily. I have seen many men and also women executed, and that they have been in great sorrow, and to my knowledge this lady has much joy and pleasure in death. Sir, her almoner is continually with her, and had been since two a clock after midnight. This is the effect of any thing that is here at this time, and thus fare you well."

She was beheaded a little before noon, on the green within the Tower. There were present the dukes of Suffolk and Richmond, the lord chancellor Audley, and secretary Cromwell, with the lord mayor, the sheriffs and aldermen of London. Her head was cut off by the hangman of Calais, as being more expert at his business than any in England: her eyes and lips were observed to move, after her head was cut off, as Spelman writes; her body was thrown into a common chest of elm that was made to put arrows in, and was buried in the chapel within the Tower before twelve o'clock. Burnet, vol. I. p. 203. Hall, fol. 227. Stow.

[f] On the 6th of May she wrote a very moving letter to the king, wherein she insisted upon her innocence in the strongest terms: and at another time affirmed, she could confess no more than she had already done. See Herbert, p. 194. Strype's Mem. tom. I. p. 283. Burnet, tom. I. p. 206.

[g] She had distributed, in the last nine months of her life, between fourteen and fifteen thousand pounds to the poor. And in all appearance, if she had lived, the money that was raised by the suppression of religious houses, had been better employed than it was. Burnet, tom, I. p. 196.

[h] Burnet says, it was to the lady Kingston, the constable of the Tower's lady. Tom. I. p. 204.

[i] At Lambeth, May 17. Burnet, tom. I. p. 203.

[k] There is one circumstance that shews the frugality of that time, or rather how far money went then, on account of its scarcity. In the establishment that was made for her family, there was only forty pounds a quarter assigned for her privy purse. Burnet, tom. I. p. 208.

[l] Burnet observes, that if full forty days be necessary for a summons, then the writs must have been issued out the day before the late queen's disgrace; so that it was designed before the just at Greenwich, and consequently did not flow from any thing that then appeared. Tom. I. p. 209. and III. p. 118. The writs of summons bear date April 7. Rymer's Fœd. tom XIV. p. 563.

[m] Queen Anne is said in the act, to have been inflamed with pride and carnal desires of her body; and, having confederated herself with her accomplices, to have committed divers treasons to the danger of the king's royal person (with other aggravating words) for which she had justly suffered death, and is now attained by act of parliament. Burnet, tom. I. p. 210.

Burnet

death upon the iſſue of queen Jane, or of any other queen whom he might afterwards marry. Finally, they gave the king full power to declare the ſucceſſion to the crown, either by his letters patents under the great ſeal, or by his laſt will, ſigned with his hand; and if any ſo deſigned to ſucceed, in default of others, ſhould endeavour to uſurp upon thoſe before them, or to exclude them, they were declared traitors, as were alſo thoſe who ſhould maintain the lawfulneſs of the former marriages. Hence it may be eaſily gueſſed, with what an abſolute ſway Henry then ruled, ſince, without any examination, the parliament approved of all his actions, and granted him even more than he deſired, by giving him power to ſettle the order of his ſucceſſors. By that it was in the king's power to replace Mary and Elizabeth in ſuch order as he pleaſed, or exclude them entirely. This is a clear evidence that the parliament had not juſtice and equity ſo much in view as pleaſing the king.

When pope Paul III. heard of Anne Bullen's death, he entertained hopes of a revocation of what had been done in England. And therefore declared his thoughts to ſir Gregory Caſſali, formerly the king's embaſſador; and after ſome excuſes concerning the ſentence of excommunication which he had given, but was not yet publiſhed, told him he would willingly cloſe with any expedients that ſhould be deemed proper to procure a good agreement between the king and him. But Henry, who ſome few years before would have done much to obtain the pope's favour, was now of another mind. Nothing was capable of inducing him to diſpoſſeſs himſelf of the authority acquired over the clergy, as well as over the reſt of his ſubjects, and which rendered his power more extenſive than he expected at firſt. On the contrary, entirely to deſtroy the pope's expectations, he cauſed the parliament to confirm, by two new acts, whatever had been done againſt him. By the firſt, all perſons were to incur the pains of a præmunire, who endeavoured to reſtore in England the authority of the biſhop of Rome; and all officers, both civil and eccleſiaſtical, were commanded, under ſevere penalties, to puniſh thoſe who ſhould dare to violate this ſtatute. The ſecond, nulled and aboliſhed all diſpenſations, immunities, and privileges, flowing from the court of Rome, ſaving to the archbiſhop of Canterbury the power of confirming what ſhould not be contrary to the law of God, or common decency, which confirmation was to paſs under the great ſeal.

In this ceſſion two conſiderable acts were alſo paſſed, but which related not to religion. By the firſt, it was forbid, under ſevere penalties, to marry in the next degrees of the blood royal, without the king's licence firſt had. This ſtatute was made on account of Thomas Howard, the duke of Norfolk's brother, to whom Margaret Douglas, the king's niece, and daughter to the queen of Scotland, then living in the Engliſh court, had plighted her faith, without acquainting the king her uncle. Henry, offended at their boldneſs, ſent them both to the Tower, and, to prevent the like for the future, procured the forementioned act. By the ſecond, it was provided, that all uſurpations of the parliament upon the royal authority, before the king was twenty-four years of age, might be repealed by letters patents under the great ſeal. Thus both houſes of parliament employed their whole authority to give the ſovereign a power which his predeceſſors had never enjoyed, as if they had been aſſembled for that purpoſe.

But it was not only with reſpect to the civil government that the bounds of the royal authority were enlarged. The clergy, unwilling to yield to the parliament in that point, uſed the ſame endeavours to become agreeable to the king, by approving all his proceedings.

The convocation, being met at the ſame time, confirmed the ſentence of the invalidity of the king's marriage with Anne Bullen, upon the ſame ground which had ſerved to procure it, namely, a precontract with the lord Percy, though that lord denied it upon oath.

A few days after, the lower houſe of convocation ſent to the upper houſe ſixty-ſeven opinions, which they thought worthy to be condemned. At the ſame time the deputies made great complaints againſt thoſe who were for making innovations in religion. Theſe complaints were levelled at Cranmer, Cromwell, Shaxton, Latimer, and ſome others, who were noted as heads or promoters of the reformation, though they were not named [n]. Care was taken to mix with theſe ſixty-ſeven opinions, moſtly drawn from the doctrine of the Lutherans, ſeveral tenets of the old lollards and the anabaptiſts, to inſinuate that thoſe who were complained of embraced them all alike. The enemies of the reformers hoped to make them forfeit the king's favour, who affected a great rigour againſt ſuch as were termed heretics. After the death of Anne Bullen, they ſcarce doubted that all whom ſhe had loved or protected would ſhare in her ruin. But they were diſappointed in their expectations. Cranmer and Cromwell were never more in the king's favour, who even gave preſently after to Cromwell a freſh mark of his eſteem, by conſtituting him his vicegerent in all eccleſiaſtical matters [o]. So the convocation's complaints, inſtead of being prejudicial to the reformation or reformers, ſeem rather to have increaſed the credit of the two heads. This was quickly perceived, when it was ſeen that they had perſuaded the king to advance the reformation, by retrenching in the public worſhip ſuch ceremonies as were not founded upon the word of God. This reſolution being taken, the king acquainted the convocation that he wiſhed them to examine the ceremonies, to the end ſuch as were uſeleſs and inſignificant might be retrenched.

But thoſe who were againſt the reformation had a much greater cauſe to be alarmed, when ſome days after, Cromwell brought into the upper houſe of convocation, articles by the king himſelf, containing ſundry alterations in the doctrines, with orders to examine them, and report to the king the reſult of their debates. Then it was that the two parties openly divided, the one to promote and the other to oppoſe the reformation. Cranmer was at the head of the firſt, being ſupported by Godrick biſhop of Ely, Shaxton of Sarum, Latimer of Worceſter, Fox of Hereford, Hilſey of Rocheſter, Barlow of St. David's. Lee archbiſhop of York, was chief of the ſecond, and with him were Stokeſly biſhop of London, Tunſtal of Durham, Gardiner of Wincheſter, Longland of Lincoln, Sherburn [p] of Chicheſter, Nix of Norwich [q], Kite of Carliſle. Theſe, who were private favourers of the pope, ſtill hoping a reconciliation with Rome, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed all innovations, for fear the breach ſhould become wider. But this party lay under a great diſadvantage, as Cromwell and Cranmer, who had the king's ear, ſuggeſted to him that moſt of the abuſes which they deſired to be aboliſhed, directly tended to ſupport the pope's uſurpations. In ſhort, after many debates, the convocation agreed upon certain articles which were digeſted in form of conſtitutions, the ſubſtance whereof was as follows:

I. The holy ſcriptures are laid down as the foundation of faith, jointly with the three Creeds, the apoſtles, the Nicene, and the Athanaſian, and the four firſt general councils.

II. The neceſſity of baptiſm is eſtabliſhed in the ſecond, which forbids alſo to repeat it.

III. In the third, penance is reckoned neceſſary to ſalvation; conſiſting of contrition, auricular confeſſion, and amendment of life.

IV. The fourth eſtabliſhes, as a fundamental doctrine, the real preſence of Chriſt's body in the euchariſt [r].

V. In the fifth it is ſaid, that juſtification is attained by regeneration; which conſiſts of contrition, faith, and charity.

VI. It is appointed in the ſixth, that images ſhould ſtand in the churches; but that in incenſing, kneeling, and offering to them, people ſhould not do it to the image, but to God and his honour.

VII. In the ſeventh, ſaints are to be honoured; but without believing ſuch things are to be obtained at their hands, as belongs only to God to beſtow.

VIII. In the eighth, ſaints are to be prayed to, provided

[n] Burnet obſerves, that Cranmer promoted the reformation prudently and ſolidly; Latimer, zealouſly and ſimply; Shaxton, with much indiſcreet pride and vanity. Tom. I. 214.

[o] In a public inſtrument, dated October 22, 1535, he is ſtiled vicegerent; and in the writ of ſummons, 1539 (in Dugdale) he is ſtiled vicarius generalis. So that theſe two titles ſeem to have been promiſcuouſly uſed. In right of his office of vicar general, he ſat in convocation above the archbiſhop of Canterbury. See Burnet, tom. III. p. 402, 123. About this time he was made lord privy ſeal, upon the reſignation of Thomas Boleyn, earl of Wiltſhire; and on the 9th of July was created a baron. Stow, p. 573. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XIV. p. 571.

[p] Sherburn, upon what inducement is not known, reſigned his biſhopric, which was given to Richard Sampſon dean of the chapel; a penſion of four hundred pounds being reſerved to Sherburn, and confirmed by parliament. Rymer's Fœd. tom. XIV. p. 570.

[q] Nix had alſo offended the king ſignally, by ſome correſpondence with Rome, and was long kept in the Marſhalſea, and was convicted and found in a præmunire; but the king conſidering his old age, upon his ſubmiſſion, pardoned him. He died the laſt year, though Fuller in his ſlight way makes him ſit in this convocation. Burnet, tom. I. p. 214. See Rymer, ibid. p. 573.

[r] It is obſervable, that there are only three ſacraments mentioned in theſe articles. Hall, fol. 228.

The

it be done without ſuperſtition. The days ſet apart for their memories are to be obſerved, unleſs the king ſhould leſſen the number of them, which if he did, it was to be obeyed.

IX. The ceremonies uſed in the church are to be retained: as the veſtments of the prieſt's holy water, holy-bread, bearing candles on Candlemas-day, giving aſhes on Aſh-wedneſday, bearing palms on Palm-ſunday, creeping to the croſs on Good-friday, and kiſſing it, hallowing the font, and other exorciſms and benedictions.

X. The tenth declares it good to pray for the dead; but that it is neceſſary to correct the abuſes advanced under the pretence of purgatory, the pope's pardons, maſſes ſaid in certain places, or before certain images. In fine, that ſince the ſtate and place of ſouls after death are unknown, they ought to be recommended to God's mercy in general terms only.

Theſe conſtitutions being preſented to the king, who corrected them in ſeveral places [s], were ſigned by Cromwell, Cranmer, ſeventeen biſhops, forty abbots and priors, and fifty archdeacons and proctors of the lower houſe of convocation, among whom was Polydore Virgil, archdeacon of Wells, author of a hiſtory of England, publiſhed afterwards by the king's order [t]. Their publication occaſioned great variety of cenſures. Thoſe that deſired a reformation had gained ſome ground, with reſpect to images and purgatory, but chiefly in that the ſcriptures were made the ſtandard of faith, becauſe they hoped from that principal to draw one day very great conſequences. But the determinations concerning auricular confeſſion, and the real preſence of Chriſt's body in the euchariſt, troubled them extremely. Not only were theſe articles directly contrary to their ſentiments, but they ſaw how difficult it would be to meddle with them again, by reaſon of the king's prejudice, who believed them unqueſtionable. The other party were under an unſpeakable conſternation, to ſee articles ſo long ſince determined brought under examination, the papal authority aboliſhed, and the exiſtence of purgatory called in queſtion. Thus theſe conſtitutions pleaſed neither party. The one thought the reformers had acted too faintly, in not advancing the reformation, and could not forbear blaming their compliance, in ſuffering doctrines ſo repugnant to truth, to be eſtabliſhed. But it was replied, that every thing could not be done at once, and that it would have been imprudent obſtinately to require that the errors, the people were not yet ſenſible of, ſhould be ſuddenly retrenched. The other party were very angry alſo with the biſhops, for ſo baſely abandoning truths, embraced for ſo many ages by the catholic church. But indeed, it was not in the power of either to act otherwiſe. The king himſelf managed the whole, having ſettled in his cabinet council what he thought fit to alter or keep. But there was not a counſeller that dared to oppoſe his opinion, or believed it prudent to combat his ſentiments, for fear a too great oppoſition ſhould produce a quite contrary effect. All that could be done, was to try to enlighten the king gently and by degrees, without ſtriving to bring him, by a ſort of compulſion, to what was thought reaſonable.

Before the convocation broke up, the king communicated to both houſes a ſummons he had received to a council, which was to meet at Mantua. The pope, without conſulting him, had called this council in concert with the emperor, and was to preſide by his legates. So Henry might well expect to loſe his cauſe before ſuch a council, had he been ſo unwiſe as to ſubmit to its deciſions. Indeed he had appealed from the pope to a general council, but there were many queries to be reſolved, in order to know whether this called at Mantua was lawful, and furniſhed with a ſufficient authority. Mean while, before he anſwered the ſummons, he was pleaſed to adviſe with the clergy, who, after mature deliberation, preſented to him a writing to this effect: that a true and lawful general council was a very good means to preſerve the peace and union of the church: but before a council was called, it was neceſſary to conſider, firſt, who had authority to call it. Secondly, whether the reaſons for calling it were weighty. Thirdly, who ſhould aſſiſt as judges. Fourthly, what ſhould be the order of proceeding. Fifthly, what doctrines were to be diſcuſſed. Then it was declared, that neither the pope nor any prince in the world had power to call a general council, without the conſent of all the ſovereigns in Chriſtendom. Purſuant to this declaration, Henry publiſhed a proteſtation againſt the council which was to meet at Mantua, ſpeaking very plainly and freely of the deſigns and conduct of the pope. He concluded with ſaying, that he could not conſider as free and general, a council where the biſhop of Rome ſhould preſide, which ſhould meet in a ſuſpected place, and which muſt be compoſed only of a ſmall number of prelates, till the war between the emperor and France was ended.

The 18th of July the parliament was prorogued, after a ceſſion but of forty days, wherein however ſeveral acts of moment were paſſed [u].

At this time cardinal Pole was in high repute for his learning and eloquence. His name was de la Pole, but every where, except in England, he is ſo well known by that of Polus, that he cannot be called by any other, without danger of confounding the reader. He was deſcended of Michael de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, and favourite of Richard II. From that time this family had been continually advanced, ſo that in the reign of Henry VI. the earl of Suffolk was honoured with the title of duke. After that, a lord of this family married a daughter of the duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV.; of this marriage was born, among other children, Reginald de la Pole, or Polus, the cardinal I am ſpeaking of, who conſequently was couſin to the king [w]. Being a younger brother, he was deſigned for the church, for which alſo his natural qualities rendered him very proper. In his younger years he made ſo great progreſs in all the ſciences, that the king, intending to raiſe him to the higheſt dignities of the church, conferred on him the deanery of Exeter, with ſeveral other benefices, that he might go and finiſh his ſtudies abroad. He went firſt to Paris, where he ſtayed ſome years, and forfeited in ſome meaſure the king's favour, for refuſing to concur with his agents in procuring the determinations of the French univerſities in the affair of the divorce. Notwithſtanding this, he returned into England, where he aſſiſted as dean of Exeter, at the convocation, which acknowledged the king ſupreme head of the church of England [x]. There is even reaſon to preſume he was not of the number of thoſe who oppoſed the new title, becauſe he kept his deanery ſeveral years after. At length he travelled into Italy, and lived ſome time at Padua, where he contracted a friendſhip with Bembo, Sadoletti, and other celebrated wits. The reputation he acquired in that country, made the king deſirous to recal him, intending to reward his merit, which was univerſally known. But Pole ſtill declined, on ſome pretence or other, to comply with the king's deſire. At laſt, finding delays could prevail no longer, he was forced to write to the king the true reaſon of his refuſal, which was, he could not approve either of his divorce, or his ſeparation from the apoſtolic ſee. Henry, who was extremely deſirous to gain him, ſent him a writing, containing his apology, and the reaſons of his proceedings againſt the pope [y]. Upon which Pole wrote his book de Unitate Eccleſiaſtica, wherein he takes the liberty to ſpeak of the king in very offenſive terms, comparing him to Nebuchadnezzar, and exhorting the emperor and the reſt of the princes to turn their arms againſt him. He was not ſatisfied with ſending him his book in manuſcript, but cauſed it to be printed and publiſhed [z]. Henry, provoked, as may be eaſily judged, at ſuch a violent and diſreſpectful behaviour, tried to allure him into England, by writing to him how much he eſteemed his book, deſiring him withal to come and explain ſome difficult paſſages by word of mouth. Pole took care not to be thus enſnared. So the king, perceiving this artifice took not effect, diveſted him of all his dignities, the loſs whereof was amply repaired by the pope and the emperor. Some time after, he was rewarded with a cardinal's hat. He thereby became ſtill more attached to the pope's intereſt, and a greater enemy to the king, who, not being able to reach his perſon, made his family and kindred feel the effects of his indignation.

For his meaning was, (as he explains it himſelf in vol. III. p. 123.) That there are ſeveral draughts of theſe articles that are in many places corrected by the king's own hand, ſome of which corrections are very long and very material. Of theſe he ſpoke, and not of the engroſſed articles ſigned by the convocation.

The ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries, enacted in the laſt ſeſſion of the late parliament, was not executed till Auguſt, though the commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe had received their inſtructions in April. Probably, the king had a mind to ſee the event of the new parliament before they proceeded. As their report was ſuppreſſed in the reign of queen Mary, it cannot poſitively be ſaid what it contained. Thus much is certain, the adherents of the pope and the old religion accuſed them of committing numberleſs extortions and robberies, and of making falſe reports of what they diſcovered in this viſitation, to leſſen the horror of their oppreſſions. This may be partly true. Nay, it is not unlikely that theſe men, either from a deſire to make their court to the king, or from a greedineſs to enrich themſelves, exceeded their inſtructions. On the other hand, it is alſo probable their accuſers highly aggravated the crimes laid to their charge. However this be, immenſe numbers were extremely diſpleaſed at the ſuppreſſion of ſo many religious houſes, which were had in great veneration. All the friers of theſe ſuppreſſed houſes who wiſhed to become ſeculars, had a diſpenſation from the king, and the reſt were removed to the larger monaſteries, which were untouched. The churches and cloiſters were pulled down, and the materials ſold to the king's uſe.

It may be eaſily judged the monks ſpared no pains to excite the people to rebel. They found it the more eaſy, as great diſcontents reigned every where. The nobility and gentry took it very ill that the king ſhould have the lands of the ſuppreſſed monaſteries, moſt part whereof were founded by their anceſtors. Beſides, they were deprived of the conveniency of providing for their younger children, when they had too many, and of lodging, as they travelled, in theſe houſes, where they were always well entertained. The poor murmured ſtill louder, becauſe multitudes lived by the alms which were daily diſtributed in theſe houſes. In ſhort, the devout bigots thought the ſouls of their anceſtors muſt now lie in purgatory, ſince ſo many maſſes which were ſaid for their deliverance, were aboliſhed by the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries.

The court hearing of theſe murmurs, endeavoured to compoſe them, by publiſhing the diſorders diſcovered in theſe houſes. But this ſignified nothing. Beſides that theſe reports were deemed very much aggravated, it was ſaid, why were not theſe abuſes ſeverely puniſhed and reformed, without deſtroying whole houſes for ever? At laſt Cromwell found an expedient to allay the diſcontents in a great meaſure, by adviſing the king to ſell the lands of the ſuppreſſed monaſteries at very eaſy rates, and oblige the purchaſers, under ſevere penalties, to keep up the wonted hoſpitality [a]. But this expedient was not capable of entirely appeaſing the murmurs of the people, though the king ſtrove to give them ſome ſatisfaction, by re-endowing one and thirty of theſe houſes [b].

Whilſt people were in this fermentation, the king publiſhed, in the name of the vice-gerent, ſome injunctions to regulate the behaviour of perſons in holy orders, many of whom led very irregular lives. Theſe injunctions contained nothing but what had been ordained by ſeveral ſynods [c], and yet the clergy were extremely offended, becauſe they could not endure to ſee themſelves ſubject to the orders of the vice-gerent, by whom, they ſaid, they were going to be enſlaved much more than by the pope. Thus the inferior clergy, the monks, and the bigots, being equally affected by what had been done, and by what very probably was intended to be done, inſpired thoſe on whom they had any influence, with a ſpirit of rebellion, which quickly broke out into a flame.

The firſt riſing was in Lincolnſhire [d], where Dr. Mackerel, prior of Barlings, drew after him a great body of men, whom he headed, under the name of Captain Cobler. The rebels ſent their grievances to the king in a very humble manner, telling him, they acknowledged his ſupremacy, and were content he ſhould enjoy the tenths and firſt fruits of the livings, but withal prayed him to adviſe with his nobility concerning the redreſs of their grievances. This was taxing the king indirectly with following the counſels of Thomas Cromwell, who was of a mean extraction. Theſe grievances were, that he had ſuppreſſed a great number of monaſteries; that large ſubſidies had been granted by parliament without any occaſion; that he admitted into his council perſons of mean birth, whoſe ſole view was to enrich themſelves, inſtead of conſulting the good of the ſtate; that ſeveral biſhops had ſubverted the antient faith [e], and embraced new doctrines, at all times contemned by the church; that having ſeen ſo many religious houſes plundered, they were afraid the churches would undergo the ſame fate.

The king returned an anſwer to theſe grievances in a large manifeſto [f]. But as his reaſons were grounded upon principles not admitted by the malcontents, the manifeſto had no great effect. Mean while the king was greatly embarraſſed; his troops were few, and he had certain advice that a like inſurrection was preparing in Yorkſhire and other neighbouring counties. He ordered however the duke of Suffolk to march, though with very few troops, and try to ſtop the progreſs of the rebels. But the duke, finding himſelf too weak, thought it more proper to endeavour to appeaſe the commotion by way of negotiation than by arms. So when he ſent to the malcontents the king's anſwer to their grievances, he took occaſion to let them know they ſhould not deſpair of pardon. Upon which ſome of their heads privately ſent him word, they had joined with the rebels only to reclaim them, wherein they hoped to ſucceed, provided the king would be pleaſed to grant them a general pardon. The duke diſliked not the overture, which afforded him an opportunity to write to the king, and ſollicit him in their behalf, offering him however to march againſt the rebels if he was ordered. At the ſame time, the king received news that the Yorkſhiremen had taken up arms, and, as he feared the others would join them, iſſued out a proclamation, granting an abſolute pardon to all that ſhould return to their homes. The proclamation ſucceeded according to expectation. The rebels immediately diſperſed, and ſo freed the king from great perplexity. Some however choſe rather to join the Yorkſhire rebels than accept of the pardon [g].

The inſurrection of Yorkſhire was much more dangerous than that of Lincolnſhire. This ſeemed to have been accidental and ſudden. The other was in purſuance of a ſettled deſign, wherein were concerned ſeveral perſons of note,

[a] The purchaſers being obliged to keep up the old hoſpitality (which they were to do upon the penalty of paying every month ſix pounds thirteen ſhillings and four-pence, to be levied by the juſtices of the peace, who were empowered to enquire of the matter) the common ſort, who, like thoſe of old, that followed Chriſt for the loaves, were moſt concerned for the loſs of a dinner on Sundays and holidays, were in a great meaſure ſatisfied; and the gentry, by having good bargains, were drawn in to like what was done, and to affix the crown for ever in the defence of theſe laws, their own intereſts being interwoven with the rights of the crown. The commiſſioners, as was but juſt, paid all the debts of the ſuppreſſed monaſteries: but when relics happened to be pawned, it ſeems they refuſed to redeem them. Thus one man loſt forty pounds which he had lent upon St. Andrew's finger, except one ounce of ſilver with which it was covered. The writers that lived near the time ſay, about ten thouſand friers and nuns were ſent to ſeek for their livings. The abbots and priors had ſmall penſions. Burnet. Herbert.

[b] Fifteen abbies, and ſixteen nunneries. The king's letters patent for that purpoſe are dated Auguſt 17. Burnet, tom. I. p. 224, and Collect. p. 142.

[c] The preamble of theſe injunctions ran thus: "In the name of God, amen. By the authority and commiſſion of the excellent prince Henry, by the grace of God, king of England and France, defender of the faith, lord of Ireland, and in earth ſupreme head, under Chriſt, of the church of England. I Thomas lord Cromwell, privy ſeal, and vice-gerent to the king's ſaid highneſs, for all his juriſdiction eccleſiaſtical within this realm, do, for the advancement of the glory of Almighty God, encreaſe of virtue, and honour of the king's majeſty, give and exhibit unto you ——— theſe injunctions following, &c." This was the firſt act of pure ſupremacy done by the king. For in all that went before, he had the concurrence of the two convocations. They were penned, it is like, by Cranmer. They were not reliſhed by the majority of the clergy. The great profits they made by their images and relics, and the pilgrimages to them, were now taken away; and yet ſevere impoſitions were laid upon them: a fifth for repairs; a tenth at leaſt for an exhibitioner, in either of the univerſities, or ſome grammar ſchool; and a fortieth for charity; which were cried out upon as intolerable burdens. Their labour was alſo encreaſed, and they were bound up to a ſtrict life. In ſhort, the very ſame opinions about pilgrimages, ſaints, &c. and about inſtructing the people in the chriſtian religion, in the vulgar tongue, for which the Lollards were not long ago burnt, were now ſet up by the king's authority. See Burnet's Collect. tom. I. p. 160, &c.

who only waited, before they declared, to ſee how the people in general were diſpoſed. Robert Aſke, a man of good judgment, headed the malcontents of thoſe parts, where the diſtance of the court, and the neighbourhood of Scotland, rendered the people more bold than elſewhere; beſides that, the monks had always been in more credit in the northern counties than in all the reſt of the kingdom. Since July, Aſke had tried to gain the lord Dacres, who had amuſed him ſome time with hopes that this negotiation would ſucceed. Probably, this lord ſent the king the firſt notice of the plot. At laſt the malcontents took up arms, and aſſembled in very great numbers about the end of Auguſt, juſt after the Lincolnſhire rebellion broke out. When they ſaw themſelves ſtrong enough, they would not ſuffer the lords and gentlemen to remain neuter at home, but forced them either to fly or join with them, and ſwear they would be true to the cauſe for which they intended to fight. This cauſe was properly religion, as they plainly intimated by putting a crucifix in their banners [h]. Beſides, they reeſtabliſhed the monks in ſome of the ſuppreſſed monaſteries. As they met with no oppoſition, becauſe the king's forces were employed againſt the rebels in Lincolnſhire, they made great progreſs at firſt; and ſtill much greater, after Richmondſhire, Lancaſhire, the biſhopric of Durham, and the county of Weſtmoreland, engaged on their ſide. George Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, was the only perſon that ventured to take up arms for the king without receiving his commiſſion, though he was not ignorant that at ſuch a juncture his proceedings might be miſinterpreted. But, as he meant well, he hoped the king would forgive a fault committed purely for his ſervice. And indeed the king ſent him a commiſſion, conſtituting him his lieutenant againſt the rebels. At the ſame time he ordered the duke of Suffolk not to ſtir from Lincolnſhire, leſt the malcontents there ſhould think of joining thoſe of the north. Moreover, he gave commiſſions to ſeveral lords [i] to levy troops, whilſt on his part he aſſembled as many as poſſible, in order to form an army, the command whereof he deſigned for the duke of Norfolk. But, either from the backwardneſs of the people, or for ſome other reaſon, the army was not ſufficiently numerous to reſiſt the rebels.

Whilſt the king was making his preparations, Aſke was not idle. He approached Pontfract caſtle, where the archbiſhop of York and Thomas lord d'Arcy were, and forced them to ſurrender the place. As theſe two lords were reckoned well affected to the pope, many believed they were not ſorry that the want of proviſions furniſhed them with a pretence to deliver Pontfract to the rebels, and march with them in their other expeditions [k]. Shortly after, Aſke took alſo York and Hull, and, by fair or foul means, obliged all the nobility of the country to join his army [l]. Thus the affair grew daily more important, and the court became apprehenſive that the reſt of the kingdom would follow the example of the northern counties. This apprehenſion was the more juſt, as at the ſame time there were in all parts men who made it their buſineſs to ſpread reports capable of inciting the whole nation to rebel, by putting them in fear of the utter ſubverſion of the religion they had hitherto profeſſed.

Mean while, the king choſe to amuſe the rebels till his army was ready. The 20th of October he ſent a herald with a proclamation to be read to the troops. Aſke gave the herald audience, ſitting in ſtate, with the archbiſhop on the one hand, and the lord d'Arcy on the other. But when he heard the contents of the proclamation, he ſent him away without ſuffering him to publiſh it. Henry, finding matters were in an ill way, diſpatched the duke of Norfolk with what troops he had ready, which were to be joined by thoſe under the command of the earl of Shrewſbury, and ſome others levied in haſte by the marquis of Exeter [m]. But theſe three ſmall bodies bore no proportion to the forces of the rebels. So the king found himſelf obliged to publiſh a proclamation, commanding all the nobility to meet him at Northampton the 7th of November. Mean time, Aſke, at the head of thirty thouſand men, advanced towards Doncaſter, where the duke of Norfolk, the marquis of Exeter, and the earl of Shrewſbury, were encamped with five thouſand men only, and having no other refuge but to defend the paſs of the river between the two armies. But as it was fordable in ſeveral places, they would doubtleſs have been extremely embarraſſed, if a great rain, which fell very ſeaſonably, had not made the river impaſſable. This was certainly a very fortunate accident for the king. If his troops had been defeated on this occaſion, as it was very likely, conſidering their ſmall number, it would have done him an unſpeakable damage.

I have before obſerved, that the duke of Norfolk approved not of the alterations made in religion. And therefore it could not but be very diſagreeable to him to command the king's army, againſt people who had taken up arms in a cauſe which he could not diſlike. Mean while, he ſaw himſelf in a very dangerous ſituation, ſince he was as much afraid of conquering as of being conquered. In the firſt caſe, a victory over the rebels would infallibly ruin the party he ſecretly favoured. In the ſecond caſe, he ran the riſque of being ſuſpected by the king, and forfeiting his favour. Happily for him, his inability to hurt the rebels freed him from this embarraſſment, by affording him a pretence to proceed by way of negotiation. As he held intelligence with ſome of their leaders, he ſo ordered it by their means, that they came to a reſolution to preſent a very humble petition to the king. That done, they acquainted the duke with it, intreating him to ſecond it with his intereſt. The duke readily granted their requeſt, but told them, that to obtain a favourable anſwer to the king there muſt be a ceſſation of arms, during which he took upon him to go himſelf and preſent their petition. The propoſal being accepted, the ceſſation was concluded, and the duke departed for London [n]. At ſuch a juncture, the ceſſation was very advantageous to the king, becauſe his army being very weak, he wanted time to raiſe more forces. For this very cauſe many of the rebels, ſeeing that contrary to all reaſon the king had leiſure given him to aſſemble his troops, and imagining they were betrayed by their leaders, withdrew to their homes [o].

The diſcord which began to ſpread among the rebels, gave the king ſome hopes of coming off upon eaſy terms. And therefore he delayed ſending an anſwer to their petition, expecting their army would diſperſe by degrees [p]. But the leaders perceiving at length that the court purpoſely prolonged the negotiation, and that thoſe delays muſt utterly ruin their affairs, renewed their hoſtilities, and reſolved once more to attack the royal army. Had this reſolution been executed, it would probably have changed the face of affairs very much; but another great rain ſo ſwelled the river which parted the two armies, that it was not poſſible for them to paſs it [q]. The king hearing of this, thought it neceſſary to give them ſome ſort of ſatisfaction, for fear they ſhould execute their reſolution before he was ready. To that end, he ſent them an anſwer to their petition [r]; but it was expreſſed in ſuch general terms, that they could not depend upon what was promiſed therein. At the ſame time he propoſed, that if they would ſend three hundred deputies to Doncaſter, commiſſioners ſhould meet them there, and treat of a peace. His aim was to gain time, in hopes the three hundred deputies would diſagree, and their diſſention by prolonging the negotiation gave him time to prepare his army. A few days after, the duke of Norfolk returning to Doncaſter, ſent word to the rebels that he had brought them a general pardon, ten only excepted, ſix of whom were named, and four not. But the pardon was unanimouſly rejected, becauſe the ſix perſons named were ſome of the heads, and each [h] Their march was called the pilgrimage of grace; and, to inveigle the people, ſome prieſts marched before them with croſſes in their hands. In their banners they had a crucifix with the five wounds, and a chalice, and every one wore on his ſleeve, as a badge, an emblem of the five wounds of Chriſt, with the name of Jeſus wrought in the midſt. All that joined them took an oath, "That they entered into this pilgrimage of grace, for the love of God, the preſervation of the king's perſon and iſſue, the putrifying the nobility, and driving away all baſe-born and evil counſellors; and for no particular profit of their own, nor to do diſpleaſure to any, nor to kill any for envy, but to take before them the croſs of Chriſt, his faith, the reſtitution of the church, and the ſuppreſſion of heretics and their opinions." Theſe were ſpecious pretences. So people flocked about their croſſes and ſtandards, in ſuch numbers, that they grew forty thouſand ſtrong. Burnet, tom. I. p. 229. Hall, fol. 230. Stow, p. 574.

Among

was in fear of being one of the four whom the king had reſerved. And indeed the king had no other view but to ſow diſcord among them, and make way for the treaty at Doncaſter, which they accepted at laſt, and ſent their three hundred deputies thither [s]. The court had expected, theſe deputies would never agree about their demands, and ſo would afford the time that was wanted. But as it was eaſy for the leaders to diſcover the court's intention, they gave the deputies their inſtructions in writing, from which they were not to depart. Theſe inſtructions contained ten demands, which the deputies made at the congreſs held at Doncaſter the 6th of December.

I. They demanded a general pardon, without any exception.

II. That a parliament ſhould be held at York.

III. That a court of juſtice ſhould be erected there, that the inhabitants of the northern counties might not be brought to London upon any law ſuit.

IV. That ſome acts of the late parliaments, which were too grievous to the people, ſhould be repealed [t].

V. That the princeſs Mary ſhould be declared legitimate.

VI. That the papal authority ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed upon the old foot.

VII. That the ſuppreſſed monaſteries ſhould be reſtored to their former ſtate.

VIII. That the Lutherans, and all innovators in religion, ſhould be puniſhed ſeverely.

IX. That Thomas Cromwell, and Audley lord chancellor, ſhould be removed from the council, and excluded from the next parliament.

X. That Lee and Leighton, viſitors of the monaſteries, ſhould be impriſoned, and brought to account for their briberies and extortions.

As the deputies had not power to qualify theſe demands, ſo the king's commiſſioners were not authoriſed to grant them. The king took care not to deſtroy in a moment the work of many years. Thus the congreſs ended without any fruit. The duke of Norfolk was very ſorry to ſee that the affair was like to be decided by arms. He heartily wiſhed the king would grant the rebels all their demands; but knew too well his humour and character to venture to make him ſuch a propoſal. Mean while, he was extremely embarraſſed. He muſt either betray the king's intereſts, or reſolve to fight the rebels, contrary to his own inclination, and with great danger of a defeat. At leaſt, he would not avoid, purſuant to the intent of the court, to prolong the affair till the king was ready to march, and then he ſaw the ruin of the rebels was inevitable. In this perplexity he choſe to write to the king, that, the number of the rebels daily increaſing, there was danger of their making ſome attempt which it would be difficult to reſiſt; and therefore, to prevent the threatened miſchief, it was his opinion, if his highneſs pleaſed, that ſome of their demands ſhould be granted. Upon this letter, the king empowered him to offer them a general pardon without exception [u], and promiſe them in his name, that the next parliament ſhould be held in the north. But withal, he ordered him not to uſe theſe remedies except in extremity, and when there was no other reſource. The duke, receiving theſe powers, thought proper to uſe them without delay, ſince it was the only way to free him from his embarraſſment. He was unwilling openly to betray the king's intereſts, and, on the other hand, did not care to be inſtrumental in the rebels deſtruction, whoſe ſentiments he approved, though he durſt not ſhew it. So, after having by his correſpondents prevailed with the leaders to comply with the king's offers, the agreement was concluded, and every man returned to his home, to the great ſorrow of the monks and bigots, who had expected quite another thing from their efforts to excite the people to rebel [w]. But the agreement hindered not the friers and eccleſiaſtics of thoſe parts, from continuing to foment among the people a ſpirit of rebellion, which broke out again, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. Something muſt now be ſaid of the emperor's affairs with the king of France, wherein all Europe was concerned.

When Francis I. began the war in Savoy, about the end of the laſt year, the emperor was in Sicily upon his return from his Tunis expedition, but unable to aſſiſt the duke of Savoy. This made him chooſe to try to cool the king of France's ardour by a negotiation, till he could aid his ally.

The death of Franceſco Sforza, which happened in the mean time, furniſhed him with an opportunity. He intimated to the French embaſſador reſiding at his court, that he would not diſpoſe of the duchy of Milan till he knew the king of France's ſentiments. Francis being informed of it, demanded the duchy for his ſecond ſon, the duke of Orleans, and the emperor put him in hopes he would give it to his third ſon, the duke of Angoulême, upon certain terms, which left it in his power to prolong the negotiation as much as he pleaſed. And, indeed, he amuſed him in this manner till April 1536; one while inſiſting upon the perſon of the duke of Angolême, another while ſeeming inclined to confer the duchy on the duke of Orleans. Francis, willing to end this affair, and knowing the emperor intended to go to Rome, ſent the cardinal of Lorrain for a poſitive anſwer; but, leſt the events of the war ſhould bring ſome obſtacle to the negotiation, he ordered admiral Biron, who commanded in Piedmont, to ceaſe hoſtilities.

Whilſt the cardinal of Lorrain was on his journey, the emperor, arriving at Rome, went a few days after to a public conſiſtory, which was aſſembled at his requeſt. There, before the pope and the cardinals, he inveighed againſt the king of France, intimating, he was the ſole author of the wars that had afflicted Europe ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne. He thence took occaſion to ſay, that, inſtead of ſhedding ſo much innocent blood, it would be better to decide their quarrel by ſingle combat, with ſword and poignard; in their ſhirts, in ſome iſland, or in a boat. But the next day, the French embaſſador demanding whether he deſigned to challenge the king his maſter, he replied, he had no ſuch intention, but meant only that the expedient he propoſed ſeemed to him more reaſonable than a war.

Some time after, the emperor, being at Sienna, the cardinal of Lorrain waited on him, and in his audiences diſcovered he had never intended to give the duchy of Milan to a prince of the royal family of France. He wrote therefore to the king, that he was to expect war. And, indeed, the emperor was now aſſembling all his forces, purpoſing to bring three armies into the field, one in Piedmont, which he intended to command in perſon, another in Picardy, and a third in Champagne. This deſign was already ſo public, that Francis could not be ignorant of it. So, believing the emperor meant to make his moſt powerful effort in Picardy, he recalled the greateſt part of his army in Piedmont, having ordered Turin, and his other conqueſts in that country, to be well ſtored with ammunition.

The French troops quitting Piedmont, the emperor cauſed Turin to be inveſted, and during the ſiege headed his army and marched towards Provence. Francis, who was then at Lyons, ſpeedily provided Marſeilles with neceſſaries, and ordered two camps to be fortified, one at Cavaillon, under the command of the marſhal de Montmorency, the other at Valence, where he came himſelf. There he received the ſad news of the death of his ſon the dauphin, poiſoned by Montecuculli.

The emperor having entered Provence took Aix, and then laid ſiege to Marſeilles, which was begun the 25th of Auguſt and raiſed the 9th of September. He had ſo ill taken his meaſures, that not knowing how to ſubſiſt his army in Provence, he was forced to retire in the utmoſt diſorder, not without danger of being defeated in his retreat, if Francis had thought proper to attack him. He came to Genoa the 2d of October, and embarked for Spain. This was the ſucceſs of the Provence expedition, which he had been long meditating, and by means of which he hoped to give a mortal wound to France.

Whilſt the emperor was waging war in Provence, the count of Naſſau entered Picardy with an army of thirty thouſand men and took Guiſe by ſtorm. After that, he beſieged Peronne, which was relieved by the duke of Guiſe.

Francis returning to Paris with unſpeakable ſatisfaction, at having diſappointed the emperor's deſigns, met upon the way James V. king of Scotland, who was come to demand his daughter Magdalen in marriage. He was not without great difficulty prevailed with to grant his requeſt, becauſe the princeſs being ſickly, it was thought marriage would but ſhorten her days. However, the king of Scotland expreſſing a very earneſt deſire for marriage, it was concluded in December, and the nuptials were celebrated the 1ſt of January 1537. Let us return now to the affairs of England.

[1537] The northern rebellion was appeaſed, but in ſuch a manner that the cauſe ſtill ſubſiſted, the malcontents having received no redreſs of their grievances, except only that the king had promiſed to call a parliament in the north, which he never intended to do. The pretence he uſed was, that they left in the monaſteries the monks they had reſtored. But this was a precarious excuſe, if ever there was one, ſince it was not their buſineſs to turn them out, but the king's, who had the power in his own hands, whereas they had nothing more to ſay after quitting their arms. The king, knowing how the people of the north ſtood affected, ordered the duke of Norfolk [x] to remain there with his army, to keep them in awe. So the duke was employed for ſome time with cauſing perſons of all conditions to ſwear to be true to the king [y]; a very improper remedy for ſuch ſort of evils, ſince the ſame compulſion which extorts oaths from a diſcontented people, ſerves alſo for pretences to break them upon occaſion. In the mean time, Aſke, who had commanded the rebels, was ordered to court, where he was well received; but the lord d'Arcy, who had not ſo readily obeyed the like order, was ſent to the Tower upon his arrival at London.

Shortly after, two gentlemen of the north, Nicholas Muſgrave and Thomas Tilby, put themſelves at the head of eight thouſand malcontents, and appeared before Carliſle in order to take the city. But being repulſed, and thereupon ſuddenly attacked by the duke of Norfolk, they were entirely routed. Muſgrave had the good fortune to eſcape, but Tilby, and ſeventy-four others taken with him, were hanged on the walls of Carliſle. Sir Francis Bigod and one Halam, with another body of rebels, attempted at the ſame time to ſurpriſe Hull, but were made priſoners themſelves, and executed.

Theſe attempts rendered the king ſo fierce, that he put to death Aſke and the lord d'Arcy, notwithſtanding the general pardon to appeaſe the firſt inſurrection. The lord d'Arcy accuſed the duke of Norfolk of favouring the rebels, which perhaps was too true. But the duke cleared himſelf, or rather the king thought not fit ſtrictly to examine the accuſation [z]. Mean while, as he knew, the emperor was contriving ſome plot in Ireland, he gave order that Thomas Fitzgerald, ſon of the late earl of Kildare, and five of his uncles, after a long impriſonment at London, ſhould ſuffer death, for a terror to the Iriſh. But the earl of Kildare's youngeſt ſon had the good fortune to eſcape, and fled for refuge to cardinal Pole [a].

The king could not be perſuaded but that it was the monks who moſt contributed to preſerve and foment the people's diſcontents. He conſidered them as the chief authors of the late inſurrections, and conſequently as his perſonal enemies. He believed to ſee in their behaviour, that if they had power, they would not ſpare him, and therefore he projected their ruin to prevent their deſigns. Herein he found two conſiderable advantages: the one to free himſelf from his enemies, and the other to enjoy their ſpoils. It is not to be doubted, this laſt conſideration had alſo a ſhare in his project of vengeance upon them. The ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries having only whetted his appetite, he reſolved to ſuppreſs all the reſt, and ſeize their immenſe poſſeſſions [b]. The more eaſily to accompliſh his deſign, he uſed the ſame means he had practiſed to ſuppreſs the leſſer monaſteries; that is, he appointed a very ſtrict viſitation of thoſe that remained, not queſtioning but the diſcoveries which ſhould be made would promote his deſign.

The 12th of October the queen was delivered of a prince, who was called Edward. But his birth coſt his mother her life, who died two days after her delivery [c]. As the king had cauſed his two daughters by his former marriages to be declared illegitimate, nothing could be more acceptable than the birth of a ſon, who put the ſucceſſion of the crown out of all diſpute. And therefore, in a few days, he conferred on him, as his heir apparent, the title of prince of Wales, duke of Cornwal, and earl of Cheſter. At the ſame time, he created Edward Seymour, the queen's brother and the newborn prince's uncle, earl of Hertford [d].

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, the war ſtill continued between the emperor and the king of France, but was interrupted in Picardy by a ſix months truce, concluded in July, which was followed by another in November for Italy. As by the laſt truce, it was agreed that each ſhould keep what he poſſeſſed, the duke of Savoy remained equally deſpoiled by his enemies, and by thoſe he had called to his aſſiſtance: the common fate of petty princes!

The queen of Scotland died in July, to the great joy of thoſe who dreaded the progreſs of the reformation; becauſe that princeſs had been educated by her aunt, the queen of Navarre. Buchanan ſays, the cuſtom of wearing mourning was firſt introduced into Scotland on occaſion of her death, which cuſtom, though of forty years ſtanding, was however not yet eſtabliſhed in his time. James V. removed the uneaſineſs of thoſe who were afraid of his being biaſſed by the deceaſed queen in favour of the new religion, by demanding in marriage Mary of Guiſe, ſiſter of the duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorrain.

The affairs of religion daily grew more important in a great part of Europe, by reaſon of the progreſs of the reformation. Thoſe who had embraced it, wiſhed only to live in quiet with liberty of conſcience. But this was what the old religion would never allow them. The glory of God, and zeal for the intereſts of the church, ſerved for pretence to this refuſal. But the real cauſes were, firſt, the pride of moſt men, who cannot bear to be told that their opinions are wrong. Secondly, the temporal intereſt of the clergy, who, wherever the reformation was eſtabliſhed, ſaw themſelves deprived of their rich benefices, the revenues of the church being applied by the reformed to uſes very different from thoſe in which they had hitherto been employed. Thirdly, the pope's intereſts, who daily loſt his ſubjects, his revenues, his credit, his authority. There was another particular cauſe in Germany, which inflamed the troubles occaſioned by religion, and that was, the emperor and his brother the king of the Romans had formed a deſign to uſe the pretence of obliging the proteſtants to re-enter the pale of the church. For that reaſon, inſtead of healing, they fomented the diviſions to the utmoſt of their power. The proteſtants com-

[y] The contents of the oath they took, were: 1. To revoke all oaths and promiſes made in the former inſurrection, aſking the king's forgiveneſs on their knees. 2. To be true to the king, his heirs, and ſucceſſors. 3. To obſerve and maintain all acts of parliament, ſince the firſt year of the king's reign. 4. Not to take arms again, but by the king's authority. 5. To apprehend all ſeditious perſons. 6. To remove all the monks and nuns they had replaced in the late diſſolved monaſteries. Herbert, p. 211.

[z] Aſke had left the court without leave, and, being taken again, was hanged in chains on a tower in York. The lord d'Arcy and the lord Huſſy were arraigned at Weſtminſter, before the marquis of Exeter, then high ſteward, and found guilty of treaſon. The lord Huſſy was beheaded at Lincoln, the lord d'Arcy on Tower-hill, the 20th of June, and buried in St. Botolph's church. He endeavoured to purge himſelf, that he was forced to a compliance with them; and pleaded, that the long ſervices he had done the crown for fifty years, he being fourſcore, together with his great age and infirmity, might mitigate the king's diſpleaſure. He died much lamented, every body thinking he had hard meaſure. Sir Robert Conſtable was hanged at Hull; ſir John Bulmer, ſir Thomas Piercy, ſir Stephen Hamilton, Nicholas Tempeſt, and William Lumley, ſuffered at Tyburn; and Margaret Cheney, alias lady Bulmer, was burned in Smithfield. Hall, fol. 232. Stow, p. 574. Burnet, tom. I. p. 234.

[a] Gerald Fitzgerald, the eighth earl of Kildare, was made deputy of Ireland in 1515, and again in 1524; but a quarrel ariſing between him and James Butler, earl of Oſſory, the earl of Kildare was charged with maladminiſtration, and ordered by king Henry to repair to London. At his departure, he left his ſon Thomas, deputy in his room, who, upon a falſe report that his father (then a priſoner in the Tower) was beheaded, defied king Henry and his authority, proclaimed open war, and applied to the emperor for aſſiſtance; whereupon, he and five of his uncles were attainted, and, upon the king's ſending an army into Ireland, were taken, and brought over to London, and beheaded on February 3. Gerald Fitzgerald, the earl of Kildare's youngeſt ſon, was packed up in a bundle of clothes, and conveyed to Ireland, and ſo to France, and from thence to the Low Countries; in both which places being required of our king, he at length fled to cardinal Pole, who, finding him a fit inſtrument for his purpoſe, kept him till he might be reſtored to his country and place. Herbert, p. 212, 181.

[b] In the records of this year there are extant the ſurrenders of three monaſteries only: namely, of the abbey of Furneſe, in Lincolnſhire, on April 9, valued at nine hundred and ſixty pounds a year; of Bermondſey, in Surrey, June 1, valued at five hundred and forty-eight pounds; and of Buſhliſham or Biſhtam, in Berkſhire, July 5, valued at two hundred and thirty-ſeven pounds. Burnet, tom. I. p. 235. Collect. p. 143.

[c] The queen was delivered at Hampton Court, and died the 24th of October, as appears in a journal, written by Cecil, that it was in twelve days after Edward's birth: ſo it is in the Herald's office. Strype Correct. to Burnet, tom. III. p. 406, 419. She died not by the cruelty of the ſurgeons ripping up her belly to make way for the prince's birth, as ſome writers gave out, but, as the original letters yet extant ſhew, ſhe died, after being well delivered, of a diſtemper incident to women in that condition. Burnet, tom. III. ibid. Queen Jane was buried in the choir at Windſor; whoſe loſs ſo much afflicted the king, he having always found her diſcreet, humble, and loyal, that notwithſtanding ſome good offers, he continued a widower above two years. Herbert, p. 212.

[d] Sir William Fitzwilliams was made earl of Southampton, and in March following, ſir William Paulet, treaſurer of the king's houſe, was created lord St. John, and ſir John Ruſſel, comptroller, lord Ruſſel. Herbert, p. 214.

This

plained, among other things, that a council was called at Mantua, contrary to an expreſs promiſe that it ſhould be in Germany. Beſides, they meant not to ſubmit to the deciſions of a council where the pope preſided, and which, as they perceived, would be far from being free. The emperor amuſed them with evaſive anſwers, till all ſhould be ready to attack them. Mean while the pope, having deferred the opening of the council from May to November, charged in that interval the cardinals Contarini, Sadoletti, Pole, Bembo, all perſons of great reputation, to examine wherein the church wanted reformation. Theſe able divines found nothing amiſs in the doctrines. They only drew up, as to diſcipline, a liſt of ſundry triſles, which in their opinion deſerved to be rectified. To theſe alone they thought the reformation ought to be confined.

Mean while the emperor was very ſeriouſly thinking of the affairs of Germany, though he took great care to conceal his deſigns from the proteſtants. In order to free himſelf from all other incumbrances, and attack them with advantage, he had concluded the truce with Francis, in hopes it would ſoon be followed by a peace. He perceived the Smalcaldick league would be an everlaſting obſtacle to the execution of his projects, by Francis's and Henry's endeavours to gain it to their intereſts. So his chief aim was to diſſolve that league, that he might afterwards proceed againſt England with all the forces of Spain, Italy, Germany, and the Low Countries [e].

[1538] Henry eaſily judged Charles V. and Francis I. had agreed to a truce, only in order to conclude a peace very ſoon, which would rob him of the aſſiſtance of France. So, finding he had no refuge but in his own forces in caſe of attack, he conſidered early of means to prevent inſurrections at home, which muſt have greatly embarraſſed him, if he ſhould be engaged in a foreign war. He knew the monks hated him mortally. They were the perſons that inſpired the Engliſh with a ſpirit of rebellion, the more dangerous, as religion was the principal cauſe. So, to deprive the pope and the emperor of ſuch a ſupport in his own realm, he reſolved to ſuppreſs all the religious houſes ſtill remaining in England. He had a farther motive, which was not inconſiderable, namely, to have a fund ſufficient to maintain the war, without being forced to over-burden his ſubjects. But as the ſuppreſſion of part of the monaſteries had already occaſioned troubles in the kingdom, it was likely, the ſuppreſſion of all would riſe ſtill greater. Wherefore he believed he ſhould prevent all commotions by removing the people's veneration for the monks. To that end, the report of the laſt viſitation being brought to him, he ordered it to be immediately publiſhed. Very probably the facts inſerted, concerning the diſorderly lives of the friers and nuns, were ſet forth ſo as to be ſubſervient to the king's deſigns [f]. But what conduced moſt to recover people out of their ſuperſtitious fondneſs for the religious houſes, was the diſcovery of the frauds committed there with reſpect to relics and images. Had the buſineſs been only the debaucheries of the monks and nuns, it might have been objected, that it ſufficed to make ſtrict enquiry of thoſe who were guilty, and to puniſh them ſeverely. But for the pious frauds (as they are called) it could hardly be thought but that the whole ſociety was concerned. For this reaſon, therefore, the king, to make them as viſible as the ſun, took care publicly to expoſe the counterfeit relics found in the monaſteries, and the ſprings by which the images of our Saviour, the Virgin Mary, or any of the ſaints were made to move, which was looked upon by the ignorant multitude as the effect of a divine power. If the reader deſires to ſee a particular account of theſe pious impoſtures, he will find it, though withal very ſhort, in the hiſtory of the reformation of England. Theſe frauds being thus detected, whatever had ſerved to engage the people in ſuperſtition, was by the king's order burnt in public [g]. But what grieved the votaries moſt was, to ſee the bones of Thomas Becket, commonly called St. Thomas of Canterbury, publicly burnt. They accuſed the king of acting from a motive of a ſacrilegious avarice, in order to have a pretence to ſeize the rich ſhrine of that ſaint, whereon, beſides other precious ſtones, was a very fine diamond offered in 1179 by Henry I. king of France, when he came in pilgrimage to Canterbury [h]. This proceeding ſo exaſperated the adherents of the old religion, that they wrote in a moſt virulent manner to Rome againſt the king, comparing him to the greateſt tyrants that ever lived. Whereupon, at Rome and other places, numberleſs ſatyrs were penned, which painted Henry as the moſt execrable of men to thoſe who were not uſed to the hyperbolical expreſſions of the Italians. The king had his ſpies at Rome, who, acquainting him with what was publiſhed againſt him, told him withal, that to cardinal Pole the informations ſent from England were generally addreſſed, and that his ſtile was viſible in ſome of the ſatyrs. This ſo highly incenſed the king againſt the cardinal, that he made all his family and friends feel the effects, inſomuch that he would ſooner have pardoned any crime than a correſpondence with him. It is ſtrange that the cardinal, who ſeemed otherwiſe very prudent and moderate, ſhould ſo give way to his zeal or his paſſion againſt the king, that he feared not, by ſo unadviſed a behaviour, to expoſe his friends to Henry's utmoſt reſentment. His obſtinacy in this reſpect was ſo great, that at length he was the occaſion of his mother's loſing her head on the ſcaffold, as will be ſeen hereafter.

All the king's proceedings convincing the pope that he was to expect no change in him, he publiſhed at length the bull of excommunication [i], drawn and ſigned in 1535. Moreover, he tried to excite all the princes of Chriſtendom againſt Henry, and offered the kingdom of England to the king of Scotland. Nay, Pole maintained, in a book publiſhed ſhortly after, that it was more meritorious to fight againſt Henry than againſt the Turk. But the pope's thunders had ſo loſt their force in England, that the bull cauſed no commotion, or if it produced any effect, it was quite contrary to what the pope expected. Henry being more provoked with him, took ſo good precautions to hinder him from executing his deſigns, that he thereby advanced the reformation much more than he intended. As ſoon as he had heard of the bulls being publiſhed, he required the biſhops and abbots to ſwear again to renounce the papal authority. At the ſame time, the new tranſlation of the bible being preſented to him, he ordered fifteen hundred copies to be printed, and ſet up in the principal churches, being ſatisfied that nothing would be found there to ſupport the exorbitant power aſſumed by the pope over all Chriſtendom [k].

[e] This year, the manner of caſting pipes of lead, for conveyance of water under ground, was firſt invented by Robert Brock, one of the king's chaplains; Robert Cooper, goldſmith, making the inſtruments, and putting the invention firſt in practice. Hollingſhead, p. 944.

[f] Of the confeſſions then made to the viſitors, there is only now one extant, which probably eſcaped the deſtruction of all papers of that kind in queen Mary's time. It is from the Benedictines of St. Andrews, in Northampton, wherein they acknowledge their paſt ill life, for which the pit of hell was ready to ſwallow them up. They confeſs they had neglectedthe worſhip of God, lived in idleneſs, gluttony, ſenſuality, &c. Burnet, tom. I. p. 237.

[g] And here, ſays lord Herbert, out of our records I ſhall mention ſome of the images and relics to which the pilgrimages of theſe times brought devotion and offerings, as our lady's girdle ſhewed in eleven places, and her milk in eight. The felt of St. Thomas, of Lancaſter, a remedy for the headach; the penknite and boots of St. Thomas, of Canterbury, and a piece of his ſhirt, much reverenced by great bellied women; the coals that roaſted St. Laurence; two or three heads of St. Urſula; Malchus's ear, and the paring of St. Edmund's nails; the image of an angel with one wing, which brought hither the ſpear's head that pierced Chriſt's ſide; an image of our lady, with a taper in her hand, which burnt nine years together without waſting, till one forſwearing himſelf thereon, it went out, and was now found to be but a piece of wood. The crucifix of Boxley, in Kent, commonly called the rood of grace, was a famous impoſture, to which many pilgrimages were made, being contrived ſo as to be able, by the help of ſprings, to roll the eyes, and move the lips, to bow, to ſhake the head, hands, and feet. It was ſhewed publicly at Paul's croſs, by John, biſhop of Rocheſter, and, after a ſermon upon it, there broken in pieces, Feb. 24. Another great impoſture was at Hales, in Glocesterſhire, where the blood of Chriſt, brought from Jeruſalem, was ſhewed in a chriſtal vial, and was ſaid to have this property, that if a man was in a mortal ſin, and not abſolved, he could not ſee it. Therefore every man that came to behold this miracle was forced to continue to make preſents, till he bribed heaven to give him the ſight of ſo bleſſed a relic. This was now diſcovered to be the blood of a duck, renewed every week, and the one ſide of the vial was ſo thick, that there was no ſeeing through it, but the other was tranſparent. It was ſo placed near the altar, that one in a ſecret place behind could turn which ſide he pleaſed outward. There was brought out of Wales a huge image of wood, called Darvel Gatheren, which ſerved for fuel to burn one frier Forreſt, who adviſed people, in confeſſion, not to believe the king's ſupremacy. Beſides which, the images of our lady of Walſingham, of Ipſwich, of Penriſe, of Iſlington, and St. John, of Oſulſton, called otherwiſe Mr. John Shorne, who was ſaid to ſhut up the devil in a boot, and many others, were publicly burnt. Herbert, p. 213. Compl. Hiſt. Stow, p. 575.

[h] For three hundred years he was accounted one of the greateſt ſaints in heaven, as appears from the accounts of the leger books of the offerings to three of the greateſt altars in Chriſt's Church in Canterbury. In one year there was offered at Chriſt's altar, 3l. 1s. 6d. At the virgin's altar, 63l. 5s. 6d. But at St. Thomas's, 832l. 12s. 3d. The next year the odds grew greater; at Chriſt's altar not a penny; at the Virgin's only 4l. 1s. 8d.; but at St. Thomas's, 954l. 6s. 3d. The rich ſtone was offered by Lewis VII. of France, which our king ſet in a ring, and wore on his thumb. The ſpoil of the ſhrine in gold and precious ſtones filled two cheſts, which were ſo heavy that they were a load to eight ſtrong men to carry them out of the church. His name was ſtruck out of the kalendar; the day of raiſing his body, or, as they called it, his tranſlation, being the 7th of July, which was not only a holiday, but every 50th year there was a jubilee for 15 days together, and indulgence granted to all that viſited his ſhrine. Burnet, tom. I. p. 244. Stow, p. 576.

[i] On Dec. 17. Herb. p. 216. Burnet, tom. I. p. 245, 248.

[k] Grafton, the printer, printed fifteen hundred at his own charge, which amounted to five hundred pounds. This bible was preſented to the king by Cromwell, who procured the king's warrant, allowing all to read it without controul.

Shortly after, an injunction was publiſhed by the vicegerent, to teach the people the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments, in Engliſh. Moreover, all incumbents were ordered to inſtruct the people, by declaring, they muſt not truſt in other men's works, but in their own; and that relics, beads, and the like, were unneceſſary to ſalvation. They were alſo to take down all images to which offerings were wont to be made, and to ſuffer no candles to be ſet up before any image, except our Saviour's. In fine, they were to ſuppreſs all the Ora pro Nobis's which were added to the prayers addreſſed to the ſaints [l].

This injunction was deemed a mortal wound to the old religion, whoſe adherents were in the utmoſt conſternation. But no man dared to ſtir, ſo abſolute a ſway had the king acquired over his ſubjects. Nay, the moſt diſcontented affected a blind ſubmiſſion to his will, knowing the leaſt ſuſpicion would ruin them.

Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, was now rerurned from his embaſſy to France. He was one of the zealous adherents of the old religion. Nay, he was ſuſpected of being privately reconciled to the pope, and of holding correſpondence with the emperor. But he ſo artfully diſſembled his ſentiments, that he perſuaded the king, it was only the device of his enemies, on purpoſe to ruin him. It is however certain, though the king ſeemed ſatisfied, he had no great eſteem for him, and yet ſuffered him to be near him on account of the extreme ſubmiſſion. His blind condeſcention to the king's will afforded him many opportunities to ſerve the party he privately favoured. The king conſidering him not as a ſuſpected perſon, ſince he ſo readily complied with his orders, freely liſtened to him when he ſpoke againſt the Sacramentarians, being ſtill extremely prepoſſeſſed in favour of the doctrine of the real preſence of Chriſt's body in the ſacrament. Then Gardiner could explain his ſentiments without fear, becauſe they agreed with the king's. He inſinuated to him, that ſo long as he left that doctrine untouched, he would never be accuſed of changing his religion, but would rather be extolled for having purged it in preſerving the eſſentials. Thus Gardiner engaged him to perſecute the Sacramentarians, not ſo much from a religious as from a political motive. He knew the king's temper to be impatient of contradiction. And therefore, by engaging him to maintain a doctrine which thoſe of the new religion could not admit, he hoped their reſiſtance would provoke him againſt them, and thereby he would be more eaſily led to be reconciled to the pope. That is to ſay properly, he employed, to alienate the king from the proteſtants, the ſame means they uſed to prejudice him againſt their adverſaries. But neither could ſucceed. Henry reformed himſelf but by halves, and was never reconciled to the court of Rome. As he was grown abſolute, he would never ſuffer his ſubjects to go farther than himſelf, but compelled them to ſtop where he was pleaſed to ſtop; equally ſevere, or rather unmerciful, to thoſe who refuſed to follow him, and to thoſe who would go beyond him. He ſhewed this year an inſtance of rigour capable of making the reformers deſpair of any farther progreſs.

One John Nicolſon, alias Lambert, being informed againſt as a Sacramentarian [m], the king convened a great aſſembly in Weſtminſter-hall, where he was pleaſed himſelf to diſpute publicly with the party accuſed. The match was by no means equal. Lambert ſtood alone without a ſecond; but the king was ſurrounded with a croud of perſons, who applauded his arguments, and deemed them invincible; whereas none dared to approve of what Lambert aſſerted. The diſpute ended with the king's putting it to the choice of the unfortunate Lambert, either to abjure his opinion, or be burnt. But, whatever advantage the king ſeemed to have, he may be ſaid to be vanquiſhed, ſince he was forced to fly to ſo rigorous a method to convince his adverſary, after flattering himſelf to perſuade him by dint of reaſon; otherwiſe, probably, he would not have engaged in the diſpute. However, he ſucceeded not by this extraordinary way, ſince Lambert choſe rather to die than abjure the opinion he ſtill believed [n]. Henry had no occaſion to be flattered; he had but too good a conceit of himſelf. Nevertheleſs, Gardiner, and the reſt of his party, took occaſion from the diſpute to extol him above the moſt learned divines of the age. They inſpired him with ſuch an opinion of his learning, that he thought his notions ought to be a ſtandard to all. But, contrary to the expectation of his flatterers, this conceit of himſelf was no leſs fatal to them than to the other party, ſince he reſolved to puniſh ſeverely and indifferently all who dared to ſwerve from what he himſelf deemed reaſonable.

About this time the emperor concluded with France a ten years truce, of which I ſhall ſpeak preſently. Henry, not doubting it was in order to invade him, conſidered of means to raiſe the emperor troubles, which ſhould divert him from his purpoſe. The Smalcaldick league furniſhed him with a good opportunity; but, the preſervation of the Augſburg confeſſion being the ſole foundation of that league, he did not ſee that he could poſſibly join in it, to ſupport a religion, all whoſe articles were not approved by him. So his deſign was either to bring the proteſtants to conclude with him a general league, which ſhould not be limited to the defence of their religon, or prevail with them to be ſatisfied with the reformation he had himſelf introduced into England. To that end he ſent embaſſadors [o] with inſtructions to ſee who were the confederates, and, in caſe the league was confined to religion only, to deſire them to ſend ſome of their ableſt divines to try whether a common religion might not be agreed upon. The proteſtants replied, their league conſiſted of twenty-ſix Imperial cities, and twenty-four princes; among whom the king of Denmark was lately admitted; that at preſent they could not be without their divines, but deſired him to declare himſelf poſitively upon the propoſition made him, of embracing the Augſburg confeſſion. Some time after, they ſent embaſſadors capable of diſputing upon the points of religion. But this embaſſy was fruitleſs. Henry found in the Germans men of a very different ſtamp from his own ſubjects, and little inclined to compliance. They would not allow him communion in one kind, private maſſes, auricular confeſſion, celibacy of prieſts, and gave him their reaſons in writing; to which he replied, though to very little purpoſe. As he could not put the ſame choice to them as he had done to Lambert, he was forced to diſmiſs them without any concluſion, being as little ſatisfied with them as they were with him.

Mean while, the intereſt of the reformers began viſibly to decline at court ſince the queen's death. There were only Cromwell and Cranmer that ſupported it by their credit and merit. Cromwell, however, was accuſed of being too ſelf-intereſted, and of thinking much more of his own than of the concerns of religion. As to the reſt of the lower rank, there were few of eminent note. Shaxton, biſhop of Sarum, was proud and litigious; Latimer, biſhop of Worceſter, was deſpiſed for his weakneſs and ſimplicity; Barlow, who had been prior of Biſham, and afterwards biſhop of St. Aſaph, had no great judgment. In general, the preachers of the new religion ſuffered themſelves to be carried away with an indiſcreet zeal, and, without conſidering the king's temper, followed the motions of their conſcience, let what would be the conſequence. So, never troubling themſelves about the effects of their zeal, they publicly preached doctrines, not yet approved by the king, which very much conduced to controul. For which Cranmer wrote Cromwell a letter of thanks, dated the 13th of Auguſt. The tranſlation had been ſent over to be printed at Paris, the workmen in England not being judged able to do it as it ought to be. It was recommended to Bonner's care, then embaſſador at Paris, and much in Cromwell's favour. It was printed in a large volume; but upon complaint of the French clergy, the preſs was ſtopped, and moſt of the copies ſeized and burnt: but ſome were conveyed out of the way, and the workmen and forms brought over to England, where it was now finiſhed. And one of theſe bibles were to be ſet up in every church, at the joint charge of the incumbent and the pariſhioners. Burnet, tom. I. p. 249. Strype's Mem. tom. I. p. 308.

[l] Every incumbent was likewiſe enjoined to keep a regiſter or weddings, chriſtenings and burials; and to preach one ſermon every quarter of a year at leaſt. See Burnet, tom. Collect. I. p. 180. Stow, p. 576.

[m] Lambert had been miniſter to the Engliſh merchants at Antwerp, where, being acquainted with Tindal and Frith, he became of their opinion. He afterwards kept ſchool at London, and hearing doctor Taylor preach of the real preſence, he came to him upon it, and gave him his reaſons, in writing, why he could not believe the doctrine he preached. Taylor carried theſe arguments to Cranmer, who was at that time of Luther's opinion, which he had imbibed from his friend Oſiander. Latimer was of the ſame belief. Lambert being brought before them, they ſtudied to make him retract his arguments, but all was in vain, for Lambert fatally appealed to the king; whereupon Gardiner perſuaded the king to proceed ſolemnly and ſeverely in it. The king was ſoon prevailed with. So letters were written to many of the nobility and biſhops to come and hear this trial. In November, on the day prefixed, there was a great appearance in the hall. The king's guards were all in white, and ſo was the cloth of ſtate. Burnet, tom. I. p. 252.

[n] Lambert diſputed with ten, one after another, particularly the king, Cranmer, Tunſtal, and Stokeſly. Cromwell read his ſentence, declaring him an incorrigible heretic, and condemned him to be burnt; which was ſoon after executed in Smithfield, in a barbarous manner; for, when his legs and thighs were burnt to the ſtumps, there not being fire enough to conſume the reſt, two of the officers, raiſing his body up with their halberts, let him fall into the fire, where he was quickly conſumed to aſhes. Burnet, tom. I. p. 254.

prejudice him againſt them, and all others who deſired to advance the reformation.

In the mean time Edward Fox, biſhop of Hereford, departing this life, the reformers thought to do a good act in procuring Edmund Bonner that ſee, who had been embaſſador in Spain, and afterwards in France, from whence he was lately recalled at the inſtance of Francis I. who was not pleaſed with him. Shortly after, they cauſed him to be promoted to the ſee of London, vacant by the death Stokeſly [p]. But they were greatly miſtaken in their choice, ſince the prelate, who was ſo much obliged to them, became afterwards one of their moſt mortal enemies.

At length, Cromwell and Cranmer, ſeeing their party decay, and that the king began to liſten to the enemies of the reformation, in ſuch a manner as made them dread the conſequences, deemed it neceſſary to ſupport their party by means of a queen, who ſhould afford them protection [q]. They had happily experienced how much Anne Bullen and Jane Seymour had helped to ſoften the king's temper towards the reformed, and they did not queſtion that, in caſe they could give him a wife of the like diſpoſition, ſhe would produce the ſame effect. For this reaſon, they turned their eyes towards Germany, and Cromwell undertook to negotiate a marriage between the king and Anne of Cleve, ſiſter to the duke of Cleve and the ducheſs of Saxony. We ſhall ſee the next year the ſucceſs of the negotiation, after a brief mention of the foreign affairs.

The emperor and the king of France's forces were too equal for either to expect any great advantages from a war they were left to wage all alone. Francis had ill taken his meaſures, in imagining that Henry would declare for him, that the potentates of Italy would endeavour to ſhake off the emperor's yoke, and that the proteſtants of Germany would embrace the opportunity of the war to eſtabliſh the liberty of conſcience to which they aſpired, and of which they were threatened to be deprieved. But nothing of all this happening, he ſaw himſelf charged alone with almoſt an inſupportable burden. On the other hand, the emperor was afraid Francis would at length unite all theſe powers againſt him, and the emperor of the Turks improve ſo favourable a juncture to invade Germany. The pope alſo feared the ſame thing, and that the coaſts of Italy would be infeſted by the infidels. This, added to the deſire of being revenged of the king of England, put him upon ſeeking means to procure a peace between the emperor and the king of France, that Henry, being left alone, might be more eaſily invaded. To this end he propoſed to the two hoſtile monarchs a meeting at Nice, where he offered to come and act as mediator. The propoſal being accepted, they all three met at that place about the middle of June, the pope conferring ſometimes with one, ſometimes with the other, without the two monarchs ever ſeeing each other during the whole negotiation. The pope had his reaſons for hindering them from conferring together but by his means. He had a mind to treat privately of a marriage between Octavian Farneſe his nephew, and Margaret the emperor's natural daughter, widow of Alexander de Medici, and indeed the project ſucceeded to his wiſh.

Mean while, as the peace between the emperor and the king of France could not be effected, by reaſon of the many difficulties which occurred, the pope obtained of the two monarchs at laſt their conſent to a ten year's truce, which was almoſt as effectual as a peace. The truce being concluded, Paul III. immediately thought of means to form a league againſt the Turks. But as ſeveral reaſons hindered the kings of France and England from coming into it, he was forced to conclude it with the emperor, the king of the Romans, and the Venetians.

When Francis had nothing more to fear from the emperor, he grew very cool to Henry, though he had extremely careſſed him ſo long as he ſtood in need of him. Henry was exceedingly incenſed, and ſhewed his reſentment, by ordering Bonner in his return from Spain to ſtop at the French court, and demand an Engliſh rebel, who was retired into France, and the arrears of his penſion, there being now four years due. Bonner, who was naturally very bold, delivered his meſſage ſo haughtily, that Francis, offended at his inſolence, ſent an expreſs to Henry to know whether he had ordered his embaſſador to uſe ſuch language, and to deſire Bonner might be recalled. Henry thought fit to comply with his demand. But it appeared he was not very angry with Bonner, ſince at his arrival he promoted him, as has been ſaid, to the ſee of Hereford, and ſhortly after to that of London.

Whilſt Henry uſed all poſſible precautions to ſecure himſelf from the attacks of his enemies, cardinal Pole was labouring with all his power, by means of his correſpondents in England, to alienate from him the hearts of his ſubjects, by publiſhing every where that he had ſubverted all religion to ſet up his own fictions. This accuſation was the moſt ſenſible wound that could be given the king, ſince he pretended, religion conſiſted not in the things he had changed, but in thoſe he had retained. This is what he ſtrove to demonſtrate to the people, becauſe he plainly perceived the general accuſation of having ſubverted religion could not but greatly poiſon their allegiance. Accordingly, Pole and his emiſſaries chiefly inſiſted upon this, in order to raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom. Several have thought the cardinal had ſome private views which concerned not religion. He was of the houſe of York by his mother, and is ſaid alſo to have an inclination for the princeſs Mary, and to beſtir himſelf thus, in order to marry, and ſet her on the throne, in the room of her father. At leaſt, there is reaſon to ſuſpect his extraordinary zeal was fortified by ſome hidden views, and that, in acting for the pope, he was labouring his own advancement. But this is only conjecture. However, Sir Jeffrey Pole, near relation of the cardinal [r], privately acquainted the king, that he had correſpondence with Henry Courtney, marquis of Exeter, grandſon of Edward IV. [s]; with Henry Pole [t], lord Montague; with ſir Edward Nevil [u]; and with ſir Nicholas Carew, maſter of the horſe, and knight of the garter; and that his inſtruments were a prieſt and a mariner. Upon this information, theſe perſons were apprehended, condemned, and executed [w]; but the informer was pardoned, as a reward for his intelligence. No other circumſtances of their trial are known but their correſponding with Pole, an unpardonable crime, as the king then ſtood affected to that cardinal.

During the courſe of this year, Henry eſtabliſhed ſeveral ſuffragan biſhops. He required alſo of all the religious a new oath, whereby they expreſly renounced the papal authority, and acknowledged the king's ſupremacy. There were ſome that refuſed to ſwear, but I know not in what manner their obſtinacy was puniſhed.

The pope and the emperor, being then employed in their preparations againſt the Turk, his holineſs made uſe of that pretence to put off the meeting of the council of the 1ſt of May 1540, and at the ſame time removed it from Mantua to Vicenza.

The marriage between the king of Scotland and Mary of Lorrain, being concluded this year, the new queen came to Scotland about the middle of June.

The laſt viſitation of the monaſteries tended only, as has been obſerved, to ſeek apparent reaſons to ſuppreſs them. The king had now reſolved it, and the enormities, true or falſe, of the monks, were only a cover for his revenge, and perhaps for his avarice [x]. The viſitation being over, he ſent into the ſeveral counties commiſſioners to receive the ſurrenders the abbots and priors were to make of their houſes [y]. There are extant, in the Collection of the Public Acts, many of theſe ſurrenders, which, though very involuntary, contained, however, the feigned reaſons which had moved the monks and their ſuperiors to reſign of their own accord all their lands to the king. In ſome, they were made to ſay only, they were induced thereto by juſt and reaſonable cauſes; but, in others of greater length, they were made to allege, "That what they had hitherto obſerved, conſiſted only in dumb ceremonies, and conſtitutions of the biſhops

[x] Though great faults were diſcovered by the viſitors, yet it is certain that they were themſelves guilty of great acts of violence and injuſtice. They embezzled moſt part of the plate and furniture that was found in the monaſteries. Doctor London, one of the viſitors, corrupted ſeveral of the nuns belonging to Chepſtow; and generally it was cried out, that underhand and ill practices were uſed. Therefore, to quiet theſe reports, and to give ſome colour to what was done, all the foul ſtories that could be invented were publiſhed to defame the viſited monaſteries. Burnet, tom. I. p. 241.

[y] During the year 1538, there were twenty-one monaſteries ſuppreſſed, and in 1539, a hundred and one. See the names of them in Rymer's Fœd. tom. XIV. p. 590, &c. and Burnet, tom. I. Collect. p. 144, 145.

The

of Rome and other foreign potentates, who had taken no care of their inſtruction, or to reform the many abuſes which had hitherto prevailed in their houſes; but that, deſiring to live for the future according to the rule preſcribed by Chriſt, the evangeliſts, and the apoſtles, they deemed it expedient for them to be governed by the king, their ſupreme head on earth: that therefore they ſubmitted themſelves to his mercy, and ſurrendered to him their houſes, with all things belonging thereto: that they beſought him to grant to each of them a penſion for their ſubſiſtence, and an expreſs licence to take a ſecular habit, and be admitted into livings like other eccleſiaſtics." Others ſaid, "They had conſidered that chriſtianity conſiſted not in the practice of ceremonies, in wearing black, grey, or white habits, and in nodding with the head, wearing cords with great knots about their middle, and the like, wherein they had been inſtructed and ſeduced. But that the true way of ſerving God was taught in the goſpel. And therefore, deſiring for the future to walk by that good rule, they ſubmitted themſelves to the ſupreme head of the church of England, and renouncing all ſuperſtitions and foreign traditions, they reſigned their houſes to the king, with all things thereunto belonging." Others ſurrendered their houſes by way of agreement between them and the king, for the cauſes ſpecified in the deed itſelf [z]. But there are not in the Collection of the Public Acts any deeds of this kind at full length, where any of theſe cauſes may be ſeen. It can only be gathered from what ſome authors ſay, that theſe cauſes were, either the houſes were overwhelmed with debts, or the revenues had been ill managed [a], or there had been committed crimes deſerving a ſevere puniſhment, from which they were exempted on account of the ſurrender. Be this as it will, the king having reſolved at any rate to ſuppreſs all the monaſteries, the oppoſition of the abbots, priors, and monks, would have been ineffectual. Accordingly, perceiving plainly, that by fair means or force they ſhould be compelled to ſubmit to his will, the greateſt part thought it moſt prudent to do it with a good grace, and make the beſt bargain they could for themſelves. The abbot or prior, with the chief monks of each houſe, being gained beforehand either by promiſes or threats, the reſt had hardly courage enough to make a fruitleſs reſiſtance [b].

The firſt ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries was done by act of parliament. But the king was pleaſed this ſhould appear to be entirely voluntary, as if the abbots, priors, and monks, had been induced of themſelves to ſurrender their houſes. A thing however ſo notoriouſly falſe, that not a man could be ignorant how forced theſe ſurrenders were. It muſt be confeſſed, that herein Henry ſtrangely abuſed the abſolute power he had acquired over his ſubjects, of whom not one dared publicly to find fault with his conduct, and ſtill leſs openly to oppoſe his will. However, he uſed artifice to make the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries to be received with leſs concern. Whilſt the commiſſioners were receiving the ſurrenders, he called a parliament for the 28th of April. At the ſame time he cauſed a report to be ſpread, that the kingdom was going to be invaded [c]. He confirmed the report, by going in perſon to viſit the coaſts, by commanding forts and redoubts to be built in ſeveral places [d], and by giving preſſing orders to fit out a fleet, and keep the troops in a readineſs to march upon the firſt notice. The intent of all theſe proceedings was, to let the people ſee that the parliament would be obliged to lay heavy taxes to reſiſt the pretended invaſion, but that the king acquiring a large revenue by the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries, would have no occaſion for a ſubſidy. The yearly value of the religious houſes amounted to one hundred ſixty-one thouſand one hundred pounds ſterling, according to the rate they had been laſt farmed at [e]. But it muſt be obſerved, that abbots and priors, foreſeeing the impending ſtorm, had ſet the yearly rents very low, and raiſed the fines very high, that they might have wherewithal to ſubſiſt when they ſhould be turned out of their houſes [f]. The king pretended not to mind it, being on the contrary very glad the people were not acquainted with the whole profit which accrued to him from theſe ſuppreſſions. Beſides the rents of the lands belonging to the monaſteries, the king had moreover a very conſiderable ſum ariſing from the church ornaments, plate, goods, lead, bells, materials, which he thought not proper to have valued; but it may be judged of by this ſingle article, namely, that in the abbey of St. Edmundſbury alone, there was found five thouſand marks of gold and ſilver in bullion [g].

The ruin of the monks was a great occaſion of joy and triumph to thoſe who had already embraced the reformation, or who wiſhed it could be embraced without danger. But they had not cauſe long to rejoice. Henry, reſolving to ſhew that, in aboliſhing the papal authority, and deſtroying the monaſteries, he had not changed his religion, gave very ſoon an unqueſtionable proof of it. The parliament, meeting the 28th of April, immediately made, by the direction of the court, a law, entitled, "An act for aboliſhing diverſity of opinions in certain articles concerning chriſtian religion." This is the law that is more commonly known by the name of the Bloody Statute. The penalty of burning or hanging was enacted againſt thoſe,

I. Who, by word or writing, denied tranſubſtantiation.
II. Who maintained, that communion in both kinds was neceſſary.
III. Or, that it was lawful for prieſts to marry.
IV. Or, that vows of chaſtity may be broken.
V. Or, that private maſſes are unprofitable.
VI. Or, laſtly, that auricular confeſſion is not neceſſary to ſalvation [h].

[z] The general form in which moſt of the ſurrenders begin is, "That the abbot and brethren, upon full deliberation, certain knowledge, of their own proper motion, for certain juſt and reaſonable cauſes, eſpecially moving them in their ſouls and conſciences, did freely, and of their own accord, give and grant their houſes to the king." See Rymer's Fœd. tom. XIV. p. 604. Burnet, tom, I. p. 238.

[a] The viſitors found ſuch depredations committed in the rich abbey of St. Albans, that an abbot could not ſubſiſt any longer, the rents being ſo low. Burnet, tom. I. p. 236, &c.

[b] Beſides promiſes and threats, the king had another way of gaining the abbots to his will. Upon a vacancy, an abbot was put in only to reſign up the houſe. For after the king's ſupremacy was eſtabliſhed, the abbots, formerly confirmed by the pope, were placed in this manner. The king granted a congé d' elire to the prior and convent, with a miſſive letter, declaring the name of the perſon whom they ſhould chuſe; then they returned an election to the king, who, upon that, gave his aſſent to it by a warrant under the great ſeal, which was certified to the vice-gerent; who thereupon confirmed the election, and returned him back to the king to take the oaths; upon which the temporalities were reſtored. Thus all the abbots were now placed by the king, and were generally picked out to ſerve his turn. Burnet, tom. I. p. 236.

[c] By ſeveral princes, who were ſtirred up by the pope and cardinal Pole. Stow, p. 576.

[d] Many of which we have at this day. He built particularly Dover-pier. Strype's Mem. tom. I. p. 306. Herbert, p. 217.

[e] They were given in at one hundred and fifty-two thouſand five hundred and ſeventeen pounds eighteen ſhillings and ten pence. Stephens's Hiſt. of taxes, p. 215. The number of monaſteries ſuppreſſed firſt and laſt, in England and Wales, according to Camden, were ſix hundred forty-three, together with ninety colleges, two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four chantries and free chapels, and one hundred and ten hoſpitals. Herbert, p. 218.

[f] This had been the practice all along, as well as juſt before the diſſolution of the abbies. The abbots were wont to hold the leaſes low, and raiſe great fines; by that means they were not obliged to entertain a greater number in their houſe, and ſo enriched themſelves and their brethren by the ſaid fines. This turned greatly to the king's advantage. Burnet.

[g] As this was the laſt parliament the abbots were ſummoned to, it will not be amiſs to inſert the names and number of the mitred or parliamentary abbots, who, in the journals of parliament in this reign, had their writs, being twenty-eight; Abington, St. Alban's, St. Auſtin's, Canterbury, Battel, St. Bennet's in the Holm, Berdeney, Cirenceſter, Colcheſter, Coventry, Croyland, St. Edmundſbury, Eveſham, Glaſſenbury, Gloceſter, Hide, Malmſbury, St. Mary's in York, Peterborough, Ramſey, Reading, Selby, Shrewſbury, Taveſtock, Tewkſbury, Thorney, Waltham, Weſtminſter, Winchlecomb; to whom the prior of St. John may be added. Burnet, tom. I. p. 268.

[h] There was firſt a committee appointed for examining the different opinions, and drawing up articles for an agreement: conſiſting of Cromwell, the two archbiſhops, the biſhops of Durham, Bath and Wells, Ely, Bangor, Carliſle, and Worceſter. But having ſpent eleven days in debates, the duke of Norfolk, on the 16th of May, told the lords that the committee had made no progreſs, not being of one mind. Therefore he offered ſome articles to their conſideration, that they might be examined by the whole houſe, and a perpetual law made for the obſervation of them. Theſe were the ſix articles above. Cranmer argued againſt them three days together, though his arguments are loſt, there being nothing remaining of what paſſed in the houſe, but of what is conveyed to us in the journal, which is ſhort and defective. On the 24th of May, the parliament, for what reaſon is not known, was prorogued to the 30th; when, being met, the chancellor moved, in the king's name, that a bill might be brought in for puniſhing ſuch as offended againſt theſe articles; whereupon a bill, drawn up by the archbiſhop of York, was, after long conteſt, brought to the houſe the 7th of June; it was read a ſecond time on the 9th, and on the 10th it was engroſſed, and read the third time. When it paſſed, the king deſired Cranmer to go out of the houſe, ſince he could not give his conſent to it; but he humbly excuſed himſelf, for he thought he was bound in conſcience to ſtay and vote againſt it. On the 28th, after paſſing in the houſe of commons, it had the royal aſſent. Beſides the ſix articles, "All the marriages of prieſts are declared void; and if a prieſt lived with a woman as his wife, he was to be judged a felon; and if as his concubine, upon the firſt conviction, to forfeit all his benefices, &c. and, upon ſecond conviction, to ſuffer as a felon. The women ſo offending were to be puniſhed in the ſame manner. For the execution of this act, commiſſions were to be iſſued out to all archbiſhops, biſhops, their chancellors and commiſſaries, and ſuch others as the king ſhall name, to hold their ſeſſions quarterly, or oftener, and to proceed upon preſentments by a jury." Burnet, tom. I. p. 257, &c.

He

be believed in matters of religion, all the ſubjects were almoſt equally liable to the pains enacted therein. Indeed, this laſt law, with thoſe that were made before, againſt the pope's authority, contained the king's belief, but not the nation's. There was hardly a perſon in the kingdom but what believed either more or leſs, and yet no one dared openly to ſwerve from it, either to the right or left. The reformed, however, were the greateſt ſufferers by it, and indeed it was levelled againſt them. Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, was the real author of it. He had intimated to the king, that it was the only means to hinder a league from being formed againſt him; that what he had aboliſhed, not being eſſential to religion, nor conſidered as ſuch by the generality of chriſtians, no man of ſound judgment could deem him heretical, ſo long as he maintained theſe ſix articles, which entirely diſtinguiſhed true catholics from ſectaries and innovators. This was really taking the king by his weak ſide. But, beſides this motive, the king had another which was no leſs powerful; namely, by adding this law to thoſe already made againſt the pope, he rendered his ſubjects ſo dependent upon him, that there was ſcarce a man but what was obnoxious to be called to an account. So the pope's friends and the reformed were equally in his power; conſequently they were equally concerned not to diſpleaſe him in any thing, but rather blindly to ſubmit to his will. Cranmer alone ventured publicly, and for three days together, to argue againſt the bill before it paſſed. But as ſoon as it had received the ſeal of the public authority, he ſent away his wife into Germany till better times[i].

By another act, the parliament granted to the king the lands of the religious houſes, which were ſuppoſed to have been freely ſurrendered to him. So this ſtatute was rather a confirmation of what had been done, than an ordinance for the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries[k]. As the king had intimated that he intended to employ the revenues he had acquired, in uſeful foundations, the parliament paſſed a bill for giving him power to erect new biſhoprics.

Never was parliament more devoted to the king's will. They were not ſatisfied with approving whatever the king had done, but alſo whatever he might do for the future. It was enacted this ſeſſion, that the ſame obedience ſhould be paid to the king's proclamations, or to the orders of the council during a minority, as to the acts of parliament. It was pretended, that caſes might happen where the king had not time to call a parliament, and yet it was neceſſary, for the good of the realm, that his orders ſhould be executed, otherwiſe there might be danger of falling into great inconveniences. Thus, to avoid a poſſible, but withal an uncommon, inconvenience, another much more conſiderable was run into, by giving the ſovereign a deſpotic power. For, if his orders were to be obeyed without the concurrence of the parliament, he had no occaſion to call one if he did not think it proper. It is true, there were ſome limitations in the act; as, that no perſon ſhould be deprived of life or eſtate by virtue of the king's proclamation, nor any laws or cuſtoms broken or ſubverted thereby. But theſe reſtrictions were ſo ambiguouſly worded, that it was eaſy for the king to evade them. Upon this act were grounded the great changes of religion in the nonage of Edward VI.

In this ſame ſeſſion the parliament paſſed an act to regulate the precedency of the officers of ſtate, by which Cromwell, the king's vicegerent in eccleſiaſtical affairs, though a locksmith's ſon, had the precedence of all perſons next the royal family[l].

Laſtly, the parliament confirmed the ſentence of death paſſed upon the marquis of Exeter, and the reſt who had been executed for holding a correſpondence with cardinal Pole. Moreover, for the ſame reaſon, they attainted the counteſs of Saliſbury the cardinal's mother, and the marchioneſs of Exeter, without bringing them to a trial. This laſt act met with great oppoſition in the parliament, many objecting, that to condemn perſons unheard, was a breach of the moſt ſacred and unalterable rules of juſtice. But Cromwell, having ſent for the judges to his houſe, aſked them, whether the parliament had power to condemn perſons accuſed without a hearing? The judges replied, it was a nice and dangerous queſtion; that equity, juſtice, and all ſorts of laws required, that the accuſed ſhould be heard; that however, the parliament being the ſupreme court of the realm, from which there could be no appeal, the validity of their ſentences, of what nature ſoever they were, could not be queſtioned. This was ſaying, in other words, that the parliament would therein commit an injuſtice, for which they could not be called to an account. Cromwell having reported to the parliament the opinion of the judges, the two ladies of the blood royal were condemned to die, by a ſentence which eſtabliſhed a precedent the moſt pernicious that had ever been ſeen in England, and which proved fatal to its author, as will appear. Mean while the king granted a full pardon to the marchioneſs of Exeter, and a reprieve to the counteſs of Saliſbury, who was not executed till two years after. Thus the king daily acquired ſome freſh degree of authority. It might be ſaid, he uſurped it not, ſince it was given him by the parliament, if the circumſtances of the times had not rendered the very parliament ſlaves to his will.

Cranmer had ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the law of the ſix articles; and ſuch an oppoſition would have infallibly ruined any other perſon but that prelate. But the king had an eſteem for him which could not be eaſily changed, becauſe he was perſuaded the archbiſhop acted according to the dictates of his conſcience, whereas he had a quite contrary notion of the reſt of his miniſters and courtiers. Their blind compliance ſerved only to make him deſpiſe them, though he liked to reap the advantage of their baſeneſs. So having a real eſteem and ſincere affection for Cranmer, and imagining he muſt have been extremely mortified that the act had paſſed contrary to his opinion, and even apprehenſive of having diſpleaſed him by his oppoſition, he ſent the duke of Norfolk to encourage him, and aſſure him of his conſtant kindneſs. Cranmer[m] very thankfully received this teſtimony of the [i] He married a kinſwoman of Oſiander's, the divine of Noremberg, during his embaſſy with the emperor, about the year 1532. Herbert, p. 219.

[k] This act paſſed in the houſe of peers without any proteſtation made by any of the abbots, though it appears, by the journal, that at the firſt reading of it, there were eighteen abbots preſent, at the ſecond twenty, and ſeventeen at the third. It was ſoon diſpatched by the commons, and offered to the royal aſſent. By it no religious houſes were ſuppreſſed, as is generally taken for granted, but only the ſurrenders that either had been, or were to be made, were confirmed. The laſt proviſo in it, for annulling all exemptions of churches and chapels, had been a great happineſs to the church, if it had not been for the clauſe, "That the king might appoint others to viſit them." For many of thoſe who purchaſed theſe lands with the impropriated tithes, got this likewiſe in their grants, that they ſhould be the viſitors of the churches formerly exempted; from whence great diſorders have ſince followed; for the incumbents, being under no reſtraints, have often been ſcandalous to the church. This abuſe, which firſt ſprung from the ancient exemptions granted by the ſee of Rome, has not yet met with an effectual remedy. It was queſtioned, whether the lands belonging to the abbies ought to have returned to the founders and donors, by way of reverter, or to have fallen to the lords of whom the lands were holden by way of eſcheat, or to have come to the crown. The endowments of the heatheniſh temples were, in Theodoſius's time, after a mature debate, adjudged to the emperor's exchequer, upon this reaſon, that, by the will of the donors, they were totally alienated from them and their heirs. But in England it went otherwiſe; for, when the order of the knights templars was diſſolved, it was then judged in favour of the lord by eſcheat. And this muſt have held good, if thoſe alienations and endowments had been abſolute without any condition. But the endowments being generally made in conſideration of ſo many maſſes to be ſaid for their ſouls, then it was moſt juſt that, upon a nonperformance of the condition, and when the cheat which the monks had put upon the world was diſcovered, the lands ſhould have returned to the founders, and their heirs and ſucceſſors. Now, was there any grounds for the lords to pretend to them by eſcheat, eſpecially when their anceſtors had conſented and confirmed thoſe endowments? Therefore there was no need of excluding them by any ſpecial proviſo. But, for the founders and donors, certainly if there had not been a particular proviſo made againſt them, they might have recovered the lands their anceſtors had ſuperſtitiouſly given away, and the ſurrenders to the crown could not have cut off their title; but this act did that effectually. It is true, many of them were of royal foundation, and theſe would have returned to the crown without diſpute. See Burnet, vol. I. p. 262.

[l] By this act it was ordered, 1. That no perſon, of what ſtate, degree, or condition ſoever, except only the king's children, ſhall thenceforward ſit at any ſide of the cloth of eſtate in the parliament chamber (as the two archbiſhops uſed to do. See Fiddes's life of Wolſey, p. 302.) 2. That the biſhops ſhall ſit in this order, on the right hand ſide of the parliament-houſe; firſt, the two archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, then the biſhops of London, Durham, and Wincheſter, and the reſt according to the time of their creation. 3. That the lord chancellor, treaſurer, preſident of the council, and lord privy ſeal, being barons, ſhall ſit on the left ſide of the parliament-houſe, above all dukes, except the royal family. 4. That the lord chamberlain, marſhal, high admiral, lord ſteward, and chamberlain, ſhall be placed above all perſons of the ſame eſtates and degrees they ſhall happen to be of. 5. And the king's ſecretary, being a baron, ſhall ſit above all barons. See Statute 31 Henry VIII. c. 10.

[m] Burnet ſays, the king ſent for him firſt, June 28, and next day ordered the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and Cromwell, to dine with him. When they were at table with him at Lambeth, they ran out much in his commendation, and acknowledged he had oppoſed the act with ſo much learning, gravity, and eloquence, that even thoſe that differed from him were much taken with what he ſaid, and that he needed to fear nothing from the king. Cromwell ſaid, when complaints were brought againſt any of his counſellors, the king received them, but would not ſo much as hearken to any complaint of the archbiſhop. From that he went on to make a parellel between him and cardinal Wolſey: that the one loſt his friends by his haughtineſs and pride, but the other gained on his enemies by his mildneſs and gentleneſs. Upon which the duke of Norfolk ſaid, he might beſt ſpeak of the cardinal, for he knew him well, having been his man. This nettled Cromwell, who anſwered, that though he had ſerved him, he never liked his manner, and that though the cardinal had deſigned (if his attempt for the popedom had ſucceeded) to have made him his admiral, yet he reſolved not to accept it. To which the duke of Norfolk replied, with a deep oath, "That he lied," with other reproachful language. Collier ſays, Cromwell told the duke, that he (the duke) offered to ſerve the cardinal as his king's eſteem and goodneſs. Shortly after, the king talked with him himſelf concerning the law of the ſix articles, and was pleaſed that he explained to him the reaſons which led him to oppoſe it. Nay, he ordered him to put all his arguments in writing, though, by the ſtatute itſelf, it was a crime worthy of burning. But Cranmer, truſting to the king's equity, drew up a memorial which he intended to give him. This writing, being accidentally loſt, was found by one who was going to carry it to the king, if Cromwell had not prevented him [n]. Dr. Burnet repreſents this to be an unexpected and happy eſcape for Cranmer. But ſince the king himſelf ordered him to compoſe the writing, the danger does not ſeem to be ſo great, unleſs it be ſuppoſed the king would have condemned him unheard. But this ſuppoſition deſtroys itſelf by the particular eſteem the king had for him.

Shaxton, biſhop of Saliſbury, and Latimer of Worceſter, were not treated ſo favourably. As they could nor reſolve to approve of the law of the ſix articles, they believed that in reſigning their biſhoprics they ſhould be leſs expoſed to the attacks of their enemies. But they did not come off ſo eaſily. They had no ſooner put the inſtruments of reſignation into the king's hands, but they were accuſed as having ſpoken againſt the ſix articles, and committed to the Tower.

When the parliament broke up, the king ſent commiſſioners into the ſeveral counties, to make enquiry of thoſe who were againſt the ſix articles, being determined rigorouſly to execute the ſtatute. As Cromwell and Cranmer could not but be ſuſpected in this affair, the enemies of the reformation eaſily made the king ſenſible, that to leave to them the nomination of the commiſſioners would be labouring in vain. And indeed perſons who ſtrongly oppoſed the act were very unfit to ſee it executed, as the king deſired. Some of the contrary party therefore were appointed, who diſcharged their commiſſion with ſuch immoderate zeal and paſſion, that they fruſtrated the deſigns of thoſe who employed them. In the city of London alone, there were within a few days above five hundred perſons thrown into priſon, and involved in the breach of the ſtatute. Nay, the king was ſhewn, that, contrary to his intention, the commiſſioners had laid ſnares for theſe priſoners, to oblige them to diſcover opinions, which they intended to conceal, in obedience to the laws. Beſides, ſince in ſo ſhort a ſpace, ſuch numbers were impriſoned in London, it was eaſy to judge how many there might be in all the reſt of the kingdom, and of what ill conſequence it would be to execute the law upon numberleſs perſons of all ages and ſexes. This the chancellor, who was no enemy to the reformation, repreſented to the king, and prevailed with him to pardon all the priſoners. From this time to Cromwell's death, the proceedings upon the act were ſuſpended, though it ſtill ſubſiſted, and might have been executed if the king had pleaſed. Thus every thing was regulated by the king's will; who haſtened or retarded the execution of the laws, according to the times and perſons. This gained him a blind condeſcenſion from both parties; every one having to fear his own ruin, according to the king's humour and diſpoſition. It is certain, thoſe that deſired a reformation were conſtrained to feign an approbation of many things which in their hearts they deteſted, and that Cromwell and Cranmer, who had the moſt acceſs to the king, dared to preſs him only indirectly to advance the work already begun. Hence they preſerved their credit, and were enabled to do their party ſervice. Their adverſaries took the ſame courſe, and went ſtill greater lengths in their compliance, well knowing it was the only way to gain the king's confidence. Bonner, biſhop of London, though a favourer of the pope, and perſuaded that the king had no ſpiritual authority, took a commiſſion from him, which adjudged to him both the ſpiritual and temporal power of his biſhopric, during his good pleaſure [o]. After this, the exceſſive power which the king daily acquired, muſt not be thought ſtrange, ſince every one ſtrove to ſubmit to his will. Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, was one of the principal favourers of the old religon, to which he was very ſerviceable, by a profound diſſimulation. He expreſſed great zeal to execute, as well the act of the ſix articles, as thoſe made againſt the pope. He thereby maintained his credit, though the king had but little eſteem for him.
